The Holy Spirit, Spiritual Gifts, and their claimants in Modern times.

I. THE LATTER DAY SAINTS.

There can be no doubt that the Holy Spirit is the agent through which most, if not all of the divine purposes are executed, whether of a mental or merely physical character. We are informed that Jehovah "by his Spirit garnished the heavens,"—that the Spirit of Jehovah came mightily upon Samson and he rent a lion with nothing in his hand,"—that Jehovah filled Bezaleel with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, to devise cunning works, to work in gold and in silver and in brass, and in cutting of stones to set them, and in carving of timber," etc., that our Lord "cast out demons by the Spirit of God." Through the same agent, the apostles of our Lord were enabled to speak languages they had not learned in the ordinary way, and were thus qualified to demonstrate the truth of their message to their Jewish brethren, to the number of thousands, namely that Jesus whom they had crucified was the Anointed of Jehovah, raised up from the dead to sit on David's throne, and to induce them to put on his name by immersion for the remission of their sins. In a variety of ways this agent was employed by God for qualifying the apostles and others in the early church to instruct and build up the members of the body of Christ. "To one was given (by the Spirit) the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith (confidence) by the same Spirit, to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit, to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy, to another discerning of spirits; to another kinds of tongues, to another the interpretation of tongues." Through the Spirit John the apostle was presented with many remarkable visions of events then future, which he was directed to put on record for the benefit of the churches. Still in wider sense—"Prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," and wider still, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God."

The foregoing are a specimen of the lines in which Jehovah effected his purposes through the operation of the Holy Spirit. In a certain sense all the operations and effects which we find in the realms of so-called mind and matter, may be ascribed to the agency of the Holy Spirit. The Psalmist's question—"Whither shall I go from thy Spirit," admits of no satisfactory answer. "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there, if I make my bed in hell (sheol) behold, thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost part of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me; if I say surely the darkness shall cover me, even the light shall be light about me."

As with most subjects of Divine Revelation much misconception exists in the religious world regarding the nature and operations of the Holy Spirit. It is not my purpose here to discuss the nature of this remarkable agent, but simply to point out some of the fallacies which now obtain as to its possession and operations. What is known as the "Apostles' Creed" leaves the question quite open as to both the nature and operations of the Holy Spirit, the person confessing his faith simply saying, "I believe in the Holy Ghost." There is room left here for any view of the subject from what is termed the third person in the Trinity, down to a mere effect of truth upon the mind.

In all these manifestations of Divine power through the agency of the Holy Spirit, which must be acknowledged to be what is termed miraculous and supernatural, there was a real reality, which in those cases were cognizance by intelligent beings ...ence and good hearts was possi... must have impressed itself at once ...e mind. The preaching of ..., for example, was said to be "in demonstration of the Spirit," an illustration of which was given on the day of Pentecost. So much was this the case in those days when oral communication was the only mode of making known the truth, "faith came by hearing," that Paul could write to the Corinthians that "no man could say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost. Not that the Holy Ghost was possessed by the person making this confession, but because the person making known the truth was so endowed, and consequently enabled by some means to give sensible demonstration of the truth of his statements.

Notwithstanding the force of this demonstration in ordinary circumstances it was yet capable of being resisted. The Martyr Stephen told his persecutors this in language not to be mistaken or explained away. "Ye stiffnecked and uncircumcised in hearts and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost, as your fathers did, so do ye. According to Isaiah, "they rebelled and vexed his Holy Spirit." And at a very early period of the world's history the same thing occurred. "The Lord said, my Spirit shall not always strive with man." The words of Stephen afford a little insight into the reasons for the resistance of the Jews. He calls them "uncircumcised in heart and ears." They had no ears to hear the truth because their hearts were set against it. Our Lord often said, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear; but many closed their ears because they had no desire to hear. See Matt. xiii. 15. The function of the Holy Spirit was to bring the truth before men, and to give demonstration of its divine source, but man has been endowed with the power of choice, and in refusing to choose the truth he rejects and resists the agency by which that truth is enforced. In rejecting the truth they also rejected the human agents by which it was set forth, but above all they resisted God himself, who had graciously provided the means of salvation, the message concerning it, and the agent for its demonstration this message is sometimes designated "the word of God," and we have a remarkable instance of metaphorical speech in Paul's description of the Christian's armor where he says, "Take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." This weapon (the word of God), is to be wielded by the disciple, but having been provided through the agency of the spirit it is appropriately termed "the sword of the Spirit." The sufficiency of "the word of God," therefore, for making known the truth to enlighten the ignorant, and for disconcerting the enemies of God and his truth, is thus evident, as truly as it is profitable for doctrine, reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness; "able to build us up and to give us an inheritance among all them who are sanctified." As our Lord himself prayed for his disciples—"sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth." Let it not be forgotten that while faith cometh by hearing, hearing cometh by the word of God." If this be not spoken (or written) faith cannot be expected to result.

The popular theory of the possession of the Holy Spirit is that there is a two-fold endowment, ordinary and extraordinary. The latter is such as we have been considering, the miraculous and supernatural, while the other is something professedly far short of that, but in reality quite as miraculous and supernatural as the other. The following brief extracts from the Westminster Confession may serve to show what is held on this point—"promising to give unto all those that are ordained unto life, his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe," in another section treating a similar subject "effectually persuading them by his Spirit to believe and obey." "All those whom God hath predestinated unto life, and those only, he is pleased in his appointed and accepted time, effectually to call, by his word and Spirit, out of that state of sin and misery." "This effectual call is of God's free and special grace alone, not from anything at all foreseen in man, who is altogether passive therein until, being quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit, he is thereby enabled to answer this call, etc." "Elect infants, dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth. So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word." "They are not justified, until the Holy Spirit doth in due time actually apply Christ unto them." "Are farther sanctified really and personally through the virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, by his word and Spirit dwelling in them." It is evident that, notwithstanding the trimming to which this Confession was subjected from the influence of the Arminian element in the Westminster Assembly, the drift of these quotations is in the direction of an endowment of the Holy Spirit on the part of believers and unbelievers, which is as really miraculous and supernatural as the gift of tongues.

But we are more particularly concerned, in these papers, with another class of claimants, namely those who profess to have possession of what are generally admitted to be extraordinary gifts. The principal of these are those who call themselves, "Latter Day Saints," commonly known as "Mormons;" and those who term themselves "The Catholic Apostolic Church," more commonly known as "Irvingites."

It is well know that the "Latter Day Saints" claim direct revelations from God, and that most of their civil as well as ecclesiastical institutions profess to be based upon such. A few brief extracts from their acknowledged writings must here suffice to show this. "The Book of Mormon," says one of their so-called "Apostles," was found in the year of our Lord 1827, in Ontario country, New York; was translated and published in the year of our Lord 1830. It contains the history of the ancient inhabitants of America who were a branch of the house of Israel of the tribe of Joseph; of whom the Indians are still a remnant; but the principal nation of them having fallen in battle in the fourth or fifth century, one of their prophets whose name was Mormon, saw fit to make an abridgement of their history, their prophecies, and their doctrine, which he engraved on plates; and afterward being slain, the record fell into the hands of his son Moroni; who, being hunted by his enemies was directed to deposit the record safely in the earth, with a promise from God, that it should be preserved, and should again be brought to light in the latter days by means of a Gentile nation who should possess the land. The deposit was made about the year 420 on a hill then called Cumora, now in Ontario country, where it was preserved in safety, until it was brought to light by no less than the ministry of angels, and translated by inspiration. And the great Jehovah bore record of the same, to chosen witnesses, who declared it to the world." Voice of warning, etc., by P. P. Pratt, 1837.

This supernatural revelation is the model as well as the basis of all subsequent institutions of the Latter Day Saints. The same writer says, in allusion to prophecy, miracles, healing, etc. "Without these gifts the saints cannot be perfected, the work of the ministry cannot proceed; the body of Christ cannot be edified." In their book of "Doctrines and Covenants," "carefully selected and compiled from the Revelations of God" by certain presiding elders (1835) this is corroborated. "And as I said unto mine apostles, even so I say unto you; for ye are mine apostles," " " "that every soul who believeth on your word, and is baptized with water for the remission of sins, shall receive the Holy Ghost; and these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils, heal the sick, open the eyes of the blind, unstop the ears of the deaf, and if any man administer poison unto them it shall not hurt them." The same book declares, "Behold, verily, verily, I say unto my servant Sidney Rigdon,—I give unto thee a commandment, that thou shalt baptize with water, and they shall receive the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands, even as the apostles of old." And again, "they shall speak as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost; and what they shall speak when moved upon by the Holy Ghost, Scripture." According to Chambers' Encyclopædia, "The fifth article of the Mormon creed declares that 'men must be called to the work of God by inspiration.'"

But they go even much farther than this, as the following extract from a work written by one of their officials, Mr. Orson Spencer shows. He says, "No person ever did partake of the gospel of salvation, or ever will partake of it without the spirit of revelation dwelling in his breast . . . without the same spirit of revelation that dwelt in the ... of prophets, patriarchs, and ... ples in ancient times, no man can begin to know God, neither can any man or set of men make any progress in the knowledge of God when that spirit is withdrawn from him. . . . The Gospel never took any effect upon men's hearts, unless the Spirit of God attended it. . . The gospel of Christ is brought only to such as have faith. But what faith are they to have in order to receive it? The answer is, the faith of immediate revelation, or of the supernatural agency of the Holy Spirit.

The question that readily occurs here is—what is the use of written revelation, if immediate revelation is given to every man before he can begin to know God? And, again, what is the use of preaching, and even Mormon missionaries, termed by them apostles, compassing sea and land to make proselytes? Is not this latter a practical repudiation of their professed doctrine, and an acknowledgement that, "after all, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" already recorded in the Scriptures.

As the principles maintained by the "Latter Day Saints," regarding the Spirit, Spiritual Gifts, etc., will come more especially under consideration in our next article on the "Catholic Apostolic church," we shall close here for the present.

THE LOVING-KINDNESS.

"For the mountains shall depart, and the hills shall be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee."—Isa. liv. 10.

"I have redeemed thee," like a signet ring.
Pro claimed thee on thy hand to keep and save,
Though both its bosom, dear as life, shall engraving
Shall bring my plants of beauty from the grave.

All things shall work together for thy good,
"For thou art mine," though perils shall be...
I'll bring thee safely through the teeming flood,
And, though like Ed sanctified, in perfect peace.

More than my life I've loved thee, fearful one!
My blood...dered for thee from my wounded side.
And though thy Father loved his only Son,
He freely gave me up to be crucified.

For thee I wandered homeless, and the mountain air,
With chilling dews, swept o'er my grassy bed;
Bright angels heard my agonizing prayer,
While sin-ic shone dimly on my weary head.

With ravishing love I've gazed on earth's crowned joys,
And throbbing temples whispered to my pain;
While I was mocked by conquered priests,
"Trust for thy solace, and count them doubt again!"

I've sitting thro' a home, where gold and gems
Are shining in their native beauty fair,
With golden harps and starry diadems,
And garments of rejoicing deck and gare,

And while the welfare is accomplished here,
And in the furnace thou art sanctified,
My hand shall wipe thy tear, thy brightest wear,
And thou shalt reign with me my spotless Bride.

God has written on the flower that sweetens the air—on the breeze that rocks the flowers upon the stem—upon the rain-drop that refreshes the sprig of moss that lifts its head in the desert—upon its deep chambers, upon every pebbled sheet that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, no less than upon the mighty sun that warms and cheers millions of creatures which live in its light—upon all its works he has written, "more liveth for himself."

RIGHTEOUSNESS AND PEACE.

The only secret of tranquility is to be holy. "First of all, King of Righteousness, and after that King of Salem, which is King of Peace." "The effect of righteousness shall be peace," as Isaiah, the brother in ... Psalmist, says; and ... as the same prophet ... is like the ... rest.

which flow into the ma... on the Lord, and opens ... Him in prayer and communion. He is ... Bread for the soul. He that eateth Him shall live by Him. He that abideth with Him shall partake of his spirit, shall be conformed to His image, shall reflect His glory; shall escape from all fetters that enslave, all corrupt things that debase, all mean things that destroy, all vain things that beguile; shall learn the use of all his noblest powers; shall grow rich in the incorruptible treasure of heaven; shall be made blessed with the peace which passeth all understanding; shall rejoice with the joy that is unspeakable; shall have life, even the life which is eternal. It is due to ourselves that we should not forsake Him, or forget Him. We cannot afford to do it. The Divine charm of his presence is the surest safeguard against innumerable spiritual perils that beset us. It is the genial atmosphere in which all fair things will bloom, and all fruitful things will ripen. To be without Him is to be without the sun, without warmth, without a home, without food. It is to languish, and starve, and die. Let us not think, if that should happen, that it will be some compensation, at least, that we have done a good day's work in the world. That is a fragment of comfort at which some may be snatching who have grave misgivings about themselves. They dare not ask what the motive is. They are afraid to examine themselves to see whether they are still in the faith. They evade the inquiry whether their first love has not been lost. They are useful men; at least, they are doing good to others, whatever their own personal state may be, and they will not trouble about themselves so long as they are of service to the world. That is not the true self-forgetfulness. What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own life? What shall anything profit him if he lose his own life? and, without spiritual fellowship with Christ, though he may be useful, as a piece of mechanism is useful till it is worn out, his life must wither and die. But the work presses so deeply; the calls to active service are so many and so urgent, what leisure is left us for meditation and prayer? There is much work to be done, it is true; but what is our work, and how do we become qualified for it, and what are the conditions of success in it? Is it not possible for us to compound our work with the methods we adopt—the machinery we use in the accomplishment of it? Our work is not preaching, or teaching, or visiting, or organising, or attending in the committee-room, or writing letters. These are but the methods, the instruments whereby the work is to be done. The work itself is something higher. It is the manifestation of Christ by the witness we bear to the truth as it is in Him, and the revelation we make of His Spirit. That is our work as the prophets and the priests of the spiritual dispensation. The question is not how many sermons are we preaching, or how many visits are we paying, but rather how far are we convincing men, how far are we bringing the truth home to their consciences, how far are we moving them, guiding them, comforting, encouraging, saving them? And how shall a man learn to declare the truth with authority and power, and how shall he learn how to become a blessing to his neighbors and a channel of the heavenly grace? Are not both lessons to be learned in the solitary place wherein Christ reveals Himself to the heart that truly seeks Him. The prophet must first be seer. We ... quately declare to ... selves have ... God must ... have a mes... in it to ... is a sense ... able to ... Lord ...

...on the ... the reality ... home to us, ... presence, and wait for the vision ... God has to reveal to them which love Him. That we may speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen, we must learn in secret of Him who is the very Truth of God. But we are called to be priests as well as prophets. Our work is to bring men near to Christ. And how is this to be done? Only in one way. Only by becoming ourselves imbued by His Spirit, filled with His love, irradiated by His glory. There have been men whom we have known, men or women, who have been like the angels of God to us. They have brought to us peace in our pain, light in our darkness, strength in our weakness. They have made it easy to us to believe in heaven. We were subdued by their presence, and yet strangely uplifted. It was as through the light of a better world were breaking upon us. It was as though Christ and come back. What was the explanation. Christ had come back. He was there in them. That spirit which held us captive was His Spirit breathing through them. They had an unction from the Holy One. If we would be the true benefactors of our kind, it will not be wasted time we shall spend in the presence of our Lord and in fellowship with Him. It is not what we say to men, or what we do for them, that counts for so much. It is to what we are to them. It is the love we bear them that will not be wholly concealed, it is the sympathy which glistens in the eye and trembles in the voice; it is the respect which is in all our demeanor and bearing. And where do we learn how to respect men, and to feel for them, and to honor them because they are men? Where but by the side of Christ and in the shadow of His cross? There are the lessons which He teaches. This is the spirit which He imparts. It is He who must qualify us for our work, and who alone can make it a success. Nor are other reasons wanting why we should be often in His company, whatever may be the demands upon our service. It is well for the man who has learned to be at home with God. He has a hiding-place always at hand, a sure refuge from all care and trouble. We know not what may be on the morrow. To-day our work prospers, our friends are kind, our hearts are light; but disappointment may come, failure, desertion, weariness of mind and spirit. It matters not, or it matters little, what may befall, if our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ; but if, when we are forsaken there is none to whom we can turn; if, when we are weary and worn out, and heart and flesh fail, there are no everlasting arms beneath us into which we can sink, like a tired child, that in their embrace we may rest in peace; if we have been allowing ourselves to be separated from Christ, so that we shall not know where to find Him in our extremity, or shall not recognise Him, if He should appear, alas for us then! God grant us a happier fate.—H. Arnold Thomas, in Christian World of May 20. 1881.

The Need of Cultivating the Devotional Spirit.

A man's life is not in the multitude of things which he does, any more than in the abundance of things which he possesses. His life is hidden from the world. It is in the secret movements of his soul, in the direction of his desire, in the nature of his hope, in the habit of his thought, in the quality of his taste, and the tone of his sympathies. In such things the life of a man consists. And how is this love, which is a life, a vital energy, deep seated in the soul, penetrating every part—how is it to ... fit to be made ...

Purifying Silver.

And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Mal. iii. 3.

That the church is designed to be a princely priesthood is pointedly declared. "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood." 1 Pet. ii. 9. "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign upon the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10. It is by the election of God that this royal family attain to this exaltation.

In this imperial household the Son of God holds, as First-born, the title of pre-eminence as heir to sceptre, crown, and throne. It is also in the divine arrangement that the gospel shall call out a people for God's name destined to share with Christ, as joint heirs, in his princely honors. This royal house is termed, in the aggregate "The general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven:"—Gr. πανηγυρει και εκκλησια πρωτοτοκων απογεγραμμενων—the-full-jubilant-company and church of first born-ones enrolled in the heavens. To acquire this patent of heavenly nobility God has predestined that the called according to his purpose must be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren. Rom. viii. 28, 30. Hence, to inherit the royalties of the kingdom, we must be like Christ in moral character as well as in physical perfection; the first of which is wrought out in us during our probationary discipline in this life, and the second effected through the resurrection from the dead. The beloved apostle says:—"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the Sons of God; therefore the world knoweth us not, because it know him not. Beloved, now are we the Sons of God, and doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear we shall be like him for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." 1 Jno. iii. 1-3.

Our text from Malachi illustrates this essential purification. All the gold and silver used about the Earthly Sanctuary was pure—unalloyed. As the purification of silver is chosen for illustrating personal purification we will quote such authorities as we have at hand as descriptive of the process.

Silver is one of the precious metals, distinguished by its whiteness, beauty, lustre, and permanence. "From its purity of color it is the most perfect reflector known, and is always employed in reflecting surfaces when practicable." Zell's Encyclopedia.

On purifying silver from baser metals we quote a note from the commentary of Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown on our text:—"SIT—The purifier sits before the crucible, fixing his eye on the metal, and taking care that the fire be …ing the metal in, …dross to be …oving his …29)

…kind of …ling over …as proceed. …and in a little …fused metal becomes …this stage the refiner …tion of the operation, either standing or sitting, with the greatest earnestness, until all the orange color and shading disappear, and the metal has the appearance of a highly-polished mirror, reflecting every object around it; even the refiner, as he looks upon the mass of metal, may see himself as in a looking-glass, and thus he can form a very correct judgment respecting the purity of the metal. If he is satisfied, the fire is withdrawn and the metal removed from the furnace; but if not considered pure more lead is added and the process repeated."

From Chamber's Encyclopedia, article Assay, or Assaying we quote the following account of the utensils cupel and muffle employed in assaying small quantities of silver. "In the assay of compounds containing silver, the apparatus employed is a cupel—a small basin-shaped vessel made of bone-ash; and a muffle composed of fire-clay, about eight in. in length and three to four inches in diameter, shaped like a miniature railway tunnel open at one end, and having numerous slits or air-holes along the side. The most simple assay of silver consists in the examination of argentiferous lead ore. By a preliminary process, the sulphur is separated and weighed fragments of the lead and silver being placed on cupels, the latter are introduced into the muffle, which has been previously heated in a furnace where it still remains. The fire is then increased, and air being admitted into the muffle, the oxygen of the air unites with the lead, forming oxide of lead (PbO), which in fact volatilizes through the opening in the side of the muffle, and in other part sinks into the porous bone-earth of which the cupel is made. While the lead is carried away, the silver remains behind as a molten metallic globule, and when the last traces of lead-fumes leave the silver bead, the latter suddenly lightens, and immediately thereafter becomes brilliant and white." To show the antiquity of this process we quote from the American Cyclopœdia, vol. X. p. 260:—

"Silver is extracted from lead by exposing the melted argentiferous lead to the action of a blast of air at a temperature above the melting point of litharge. The lead is converted into oxide, while the less oxidable silver remains unaffected. The process called cupellation, is of great antiquity. In the opinion of Percy it is plainly indicated in Jer. vi. 29, 30: 'The bellows are burned, the lead is consumed in the fire: the founder melteth in vain; for the wicked are not plucked away. Reprobate [refuse] silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them.' 'In this passage all the essential points are mentioned: the artificial heat, the oxidation or consumption of the lead, and the 'reprobate silver,' silver dross or litharge. There is no residue of precious metal, or what remains is contaminated with impurities, so tenaciously adherent as not to admit of being separated by the oxidizing and solvent action of molten litharge."

On a large scale as much as 37000 lbs. of lead containing silver are treated in one operation by the Germans in cupelling furnaces properly constructed, which our space forbids describing at length. We merely cite the conclusion of the fuller account:—"When the operation is nearly completed the thin layer of molten litharge covering the silver breaks away leaving the bright surface of the silver exposed. The silver is then said to 'blick,' and the mass is …silver." In another vol… Cyclopœdia—vol. II. …ing the process of …the lead by the …muffle till the …ure, and the …brightens up, …taken to …this may

…beginning the earth, for man's transgression, is cursed with thorns and thistles; at the end, "there shall be no more curse; but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it." At the beginning, we find the tree of life in Paradise, from which the sinner is shut away by a flaming sword, lest he eat and live forever; at the end, we find the tree of life again "in the midst of the Paradise of God," and the blessed and the blood-washed ones have a right to the tree of life, and "enter in through the gates into the city." At the beginning, man was brought beneath the dominion of death and the grave; at the end, "the dead, small and great, stand before God," the sea gives up its dead, and death and hell are destroyed in the lake of fire. At the beginning, the first Adam lost his dominion over earth, and was driven out of the garden of Eden in shame and sorrow; at the end, we find the second Adam victorious over sin and death and hell, enthroned as King and Lord of all, and reigning in triumph and glory forever.

Now, when you get the plan of this book, you find that it is something more than a book of detached sentences, good maxims and comforting words. It is a book which unfolds the divine purpose, and not only reveals the way of salvation, marks the pathway of the people of God through this wilderness, and foreshows the destiny of the world which he has made and the church which he has redeemed.

When we look at these facts we see that this is no man's book. When Columbus saw the river Orenoco, some one said he had discovered an island. He replied; "No such river as that flows from an island. That mighty torrent must drain the waters of a continent." So this book comes, not from the empty heads of impostors, liars and deceivers; it springs from the eternal depths of divine wisdom, love and grace. It is the transcript of the divine purpose, the revelation of the divine will. God help us to receive it, to believe it, and be saved through Christ our Lord." (Amens from Audience).

Now I think I will surprise you. This Lecture filling over eleven columns in The Christian a paper not so long as THE RESTITUTION, but broader columns is furnished for one cent a copy with much other matter. Here it is—Copies of The Armory containing this lecture will be furnished at $1.00 per hundred. Orders may be sent to THE RESTITUTION office.

"Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." I see this vigilance in this standard being raised up against this tide of Infidelity that is now imperilling our sons and daughters. May the Lord help us to work while yet there is hope. Your sister in the work.

A Word to the Household of Faith in General.

Our quarterly assembly came off as usual, in Brother John J. Spaid's grove, including the fourth Sunday in May; and suffice it to say we had a good meeting. We had the pleasure of preaching the word to quite a respectable audience. The subject during the meeting was Paul's dying charge to Timothy—Preach the word—and while we endeavored to carry out that charge faithfully, to the best of our ability, as I understand it to belong to the Elders of the church today by transmission, I was made glad to see that the church in that locality was faithful, in the discharge of their duty, also by all of them assembling together on the first day of the week to break bread. It was truly a feast to meet with those much loved ones, who have so long stood as a golden candlestick, called to by the holy seer of Patmos, ever ready to bear up the true light (to a dying world,) which is to shine brighter and brighter until the perfect day. And now brethren one and all, who live at a distance, I will tell you the reason we did not give publicity to the quarterly meeting. We want you all to meet here at the House of the Brethren in annual assembly, regardless of different opinions and express yourselves freely without any dread of contention, for the church of God hath no such custom. Where the Spirit of the Lord is brethren there is liberty. Now will all of the one faith go to work at once, and get up a general correspondence and fix on a time for the meeting and let us know in good time. All you will have to do, brethren, will be to get here.

We have gone to work and furnished the House of the Brethren in modern style so as to make all who may come at home, upon the principle of the primitive saints, who had all things common. So let me say once more, brethren, let us go to work and assemble together, and spend a few days in the good old way, in the tracks the trod.

Conference Report.

The Third Quarterly Conference of the State of Indiana, met as announced at Antioch, Marshall Co., Friday, June 6, 1884, and continued over Sunday. Among the friends present from a distance were C. C. Ramsey and C. H. Jones of Chicago, J. W. Wilson of Austin, Ill., R. S. Duiggins and D. T. Halstead and wife of Rensselaer, S. Andrews and Z. Kinney of Michigan, Abby A. Perry of Connecticut, J. L. Winee of Pierceton, R. Carter of Ligonier, and many others.

The speaking was good and the interest by the congregations excellent, but as usual the Sunday morning Social meeting was the best, about forty brethren and sisters testifying to the goodness of God, and telling of their love for the appearing of the Master. Could the walls of old Antioch speak they could tell of many joyful meetings, but of none better than the one just over.

The work of compiling a new Hymn Book was reported on as progressing, and a committee was appointed to act with Bro. P. McDonald, who has the work in charge, consisting of B. W. Woodward, J. W. Wilson, S. A. Chaplin, and W. D. Thompson. This committee will perfect the work of compiling and attend to publishing the book. The money has been raised to forward the work, and it is expected that our new Hymn Book will be ready in about three or four months. The plan and price of the work will be given hereafter. Our brethren who need new books can now be assured that they can soon be supplied. Wait for it.

The next meeting was appointed to be at Rensselaer, and will be the latter part of August, or first of September, notice of exact time will be announced in due time.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

Sententions.

Trust in God, but do not stumble yourself.

Those who live by manual toil can find time for Christian work.

It is wise to lay out our best strength in centres of influence.

The very worst places may be hopeful fields for Christian effort.

The soul elevating influence of the cross is a dew drop from heaven.

There is no sunshine that hath not its shade,
Nor shadow that the sunshine hath not made;
There is no cherished comfort of the heart,
That doth not own its tearful counterpart.

There is hardly any more hopeless sign in a nation, or in a man, than contempt for rightful authority.

Wherever a proposition is self evident it is but weakening its strength to bring forward arguments in its support.

ADAY'S RECORD.

Folded up and laid away,
To be opened not till the Judgement day
Folded away with its thoughts and cares,
Its good seed sown among the tares—
Oh, what shall the harvest be?

Minute by minute the hours fled,
A duty done or a kind word said;
A sin committed, a penitent tear,
A prayer breathed into a listening ear—
And so the day was done.

—Charlotte Cronier.

Sin, ever since its first entrance into this world, has owed its chief power to the fact that it presents allurements and conceals consequences. Satan, in the garden of Eden, promised only south winds and smooth seas. "The serpent said unto the woman, ye shall not surely die; ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." So, when the woman saw that the tree was pleasant to the eyes, and to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat. So has it ever been from that hour to this; the power of sin lies in its deceitfulness. When I was in the Orient, I saw a most attractive tree laden with blossoms of a delicate lilac tint. The beauty of the flowers attracts insects, and bees are drawn to them to gather honey. But from the blossoms the insects extract a fatal poison, and often drop dead under the branches. It is called the Judas tree, and is a vivid emblem of the deceitfulness of sin. For sin always has two aspects: the one is that which she assumes before the deed is done, the other is that which she puts on after she has ensnared her dupe and is administering the retribution. She approaches with her allurements as Joel came to Sisera, bringing "butter in a lordly dish;" but the hammer and the nails she keeps out of sight until her victim is fast asleep in her power. The wages of sin are paid promptly; they are death.—Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

"THE OLD LANDMARKS."

Certain persons, with an air of caution respecting the "new doctrines," say they ought not to forsake the old landmarks. Well, that is exactly our case. We have such profound reverence for the old landmarks, that we are doing our best to get people to recognize them. They have been submerged for ages by the dead sea of paganism, popery, and orthodox theology. To search for the true landmarks in these regions, is to search in vain. These speak of the immortal soul, of immediate glorification in heaven at death, in the case of the saved, and immediate damnation in hell at death, in the case of the lost. But the Divine landmarks set up by prophets and apostles, know nothing of these corrupt importations amidst revealed truth. The "intermediate state" of current teaching, is also unknown to Scripture. It is has been a mine of filthy lucre to the priests of the apostasy, the broad foundation of their lying purgatory. Heaven and hell are the termini of the pulpits of Christendom. Life and death are the termini of Divinely inspired teachers. So far, therefore, from removing the old landmarks, our life-work is to draw attention to them. We travel up the centuries until we find them as they were traced by the Owner of the entire field, or by His servants under His direction. To find them, you must not stop at Rome, Constantinople, or Geneva, but go on till you reach Immanuel's land!

"Comforted of God." There is something so delightfully genuine and soothing in the thought of being comforted of God, that the heart instinctively turns to it, as the little child in trouble instinctively turns to its mother's breast. There is no disappointment here; it is always perfectly adapted to the kind of sorrow that needs the comfort. But Paul understood the comforts he had from God under affliction, as part of the ministerial experience with which he was to comfort others. It is a beautiful thought. Here it is: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God." Exactly so. Don't keep the Divine consolations, with which you are favored in stormy days, a profound secret from your brother, who is exposed to the same rough weather. Tell him that you have had a loving visit from the Unseen, and he, too, will thank God, and take courage. Ministerial education, that is to say, the education which serves the highest interests of others, is not to be had in any college on earth. It must come from the Lord; and, though the process by which it is acquired is often very painful, yet, as it is priceless valuable, the pain is not worth naming.

The aid which one branch of knowledge may receive in its investigations by another branch is prettily illustrated in connection with the story of the mummy garlands, which come to us from Egypt. In some of the tombs the process which preserved the bodies has preserved the flowers used in the burial of the dead. In the wreath on the Princess Ugi Khouni, of the Twenty-first Egyptian dynasty, flowers of Picris coronopifolia were found. This blooms only in March or April now, so that unless the climate has changed and altered the time of blooming, which is not likely, the botanist can inform the anthropologist that the Princess died in one of these months; and this fact might again decide some very important historical questions.

Moral decay in the family is the invariable prelude to public corruption. It is a false distinction which we make between integrity and private honor. The man whom you cannot admit into your family, whose morals are corrupt, cannot be a pure statesman. Whoever studies history will be profoundly convinced that a nation stands or falls with the sanctity of its domestic ties. Rome mixed with Greece, and learned her morals. The Goth was at her gates, but she fell not till she was corrupted and tainted at the heart. The domestic corruption preceded the political. When there was no longer purity on her hearth-stone, nor integrity in her senate, then, and not till then, her death-knell was rung.

My Beloved Sisters:

Having enjoyed such a precious season this morning—the last morning in May—in meditating and committing a God-given portion of Scriptures—Psalm cxxi.—thought to share my overflowing cup with you.

What a book the Bible is! Never was there any thing like it on the earth! Let me ask if you have read Bro. Hastings' Lecture—"The Inspiration of the Bible."

I have read it over and over and each time I am more and more captivated with the Bible. It is God's Book and no mistake. This Psalm, written centuries ago, is to my soul as fresh this morning as if written this morning, and handed down from heaven solely to me. This is the grandest secret of the whole Book, it individualizes so. It makes you feel for the time being that you are the only individual that God cares for, …ing eyes upon …

…and pain and sor… …th find en… …there …ce the nations no more." …

HOW SAD, O TRUTH!

[The following lines were suggested by reading Lord Lytton's poem entitled, "There is no Death!"]

How sad, O Truth! that all the light
Which thou hast shed in golden rays,
Should yet have failed to banish night
Or guide the World to heavenly ways.

The World, O synonym of death!
The World would teach us with a rhyme
"There are no dead," the while its breath
From pallid lips goes forth to Time.

"There is no death!" O Patient one!
Who suffering hung on Calvary;
Was death, to Thee, a thing unknown,
Did'st thou not feel its agony?

"There is no death!" are these will cries
From nations in the throes of war;
The cries of life that rend the skies,
In life writ in this ghastly scar?

"There is no death!" what means this pall
This silent throng and open grave;
Why do the tears unbidden fall,
And grief in anguished accents rave!

O Poet! great may be thy fame!
But greater fame hath Israel's lore;
Though distant shores have caught thy name,
Thou hast a Teacher in thy Lord.

"There is no death!" then is [illegible]
Why attack and jeer and spurn and [illegible]
Who "tasted death"? then cease it raw,
Or else thou art forever blind!

Yes I [illegible] the sweetest flow'rs
May [illegible] the dying year
The past extends our happiest hours,
And all that's left us is a tear.

But there is Life, O life eternal!
Eternal and unchanging as God,
Life that will when in [illegible] time
When He shall come whose feet rest on sea and land.

The bitter way of earth and grave
A mystery and a [illegible]
Since Jesus died and left the grave
And still as we live we live again.

"HE SHALL SIT AS A REFINER AND PURIFIER OF SILVER."

I observed in your Jewel Casket of May 21st, a short article on the refining of silver that I thought I might take the liberty of making some remarks on, the more especially as the same article, or something similar to it, has had a very general circulation, and correction might be in order.

By way of apology for discussing such a matter in THE RESTITUTION, I may say that there is nothing, to my mind, so absurd as a public speaker or writer making use of some figure of speech borrowed from art, science, or manufacture, which brings the smile from those it was intended to impress otherwise. We often have heard the young student, perhaps with flowery rhetoric, expound the secrets of the workshop which he has borrowed from books and which proves to the entire satisfaction of the workmen present that the learned speaker never sat at the bench, and I would recommend to speakers and writers never to be drawn off in any wise to use figures of speech that are not perfectly familiar to them, and if possible, to every one of their hearers. I think that no man should aspire to be a teacher of men unless he has a general, practical knowledge, and it ought to be the aim of every Christian to aspire to all kinds of it, which alone, in my opinion, is the grand antidote to vain philosophy, falsely so-called.

But to return to our heading and the article before mentioned, where I read that a lady called on a silver smith and asked him, "Do you sit while refining?" to which he replied, "Oh, yes madam, I must sit with my eye steadily fixed on the furnace, since if the silver remains too long it is sure to be injured." She asks again, "How do you know when it is sufficiently refined, sir?" to which he replies, "When-ever I can see my own image reflected in it, I know the process is complete."

Now Mr. Editor, I served six long years apprenticeship in a silver-smith shop and have been in the business ever since, and although not practically in the refining line, I have in boyhood driven the fanners, they used to use a blast forge, to refine and melt many hundred ounces, and I think I may safely pronounce the statement of that gentlemen—I doubt if he was a silver-smith—false all the way through. Some very beautiful, sentimental sequences may fall to the ground, but I am one of these iconoclastic vandals that follow truth after which sentiment may fall in line.

There are two processes to refine silver—fire and acid—but in the text mentioned the process referred to is undoubtedly fire. In this case the dressy silver, generally filings and sweepings, are placed in a crucible of earthenware or plumbago, and certain proportions of salt petre, borax, and [illegible] a few other chemicals according to the judgment of the workman. [illegible]ible is then put in the fire, [illegible] a furnace, but a large forge [illegible] furnace, however, is al[illegible]bly used. If in a furnace, [illegible]ped all over it, a cover [illegible] the crucible and the [illegible]on to exclude all air and produce draft; if in a forge the cover is placed over and the coal heaped up. Of course the absurdity of a man seeing through one or two inches of iron plate and a peak of coal at once suggests itself, and yet this gentleman insists that he must sit with his eye steadily fixed on the furnace.

Now as to the sitting it makes no difference to a fire of any kind whether you sit or stand or walk around, and a furnace fire with silver in it just comports itself in exactly the same way as if it had only brass. I might also state that nothing on earth can injure refined silver that I am aware of, unless the heat of the furnace could be raised sufficiently to evaporate it, and I do not believe that could be done to any extent.

Silver in the refining pot is never seen during the process, seeing that it requires a white heat to melt it the other chemicals are melted also, and form a substance something like colored glass when cold; the silver of course being the heaviest sinks to the bottom, and the operator only knows by continued practice and his own judgement when it is time to take it out of the fire. When it is "done" it is set aside to cool, the crucible broken, and the "flux" as the glassy substance is called, thrown away, the metal being in a "button" at the bottom. As to the gentleman seeing his reflection in it I refrain from remarking thereon. If he had been speaking of "making" silver it might be different, as that, when it is ready to pour, presents a smooth, metalic surface like melted lead only at a white heat. It would be utterly impossible to see one's reflection in it, however, as the cooling action of the atmosphere even in the middle of the furnace causes a curious quivering movement on the surface of the metal; moreover the heat is so intense that no human eye could get close enough to see that much and live.

To any one not accustomed to look into a furnace in full blast, the white heat is so terrific that such a one can not even distinguish the pot from the coals, the whole thing being one white glare, and workmen engaged sometimes bandage the face to prevent the heat from affecting the skin, even at a considerable distance. The tongs used for handling are from 3 to 5 feet long. I state these facts as facts. I have no particular theory to promulgate, but it gives me pain to see simple, plain, scriptural figures hunted and searched to find some deep and far-fetched meanings, when in childlike simplicity the meaning can be found on the surface where the untutored may find it, while the learned in their digging cover it all up.

The Testimony of Solomon and John the Evangelist, and Luke and Matthew. The Harmony of the Old and the New. Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom.—Wisdom of Solomon viii. 21, and all of chap. ix.

Chap. viii. 21. And apprehending that in no other way should I obtain the mastery of myself except as God should give it; and moreover that it was the part of thoughtfulness, to know which is grace, I entreated the Lord and besought him and said with all my heart,

Chap. ix. 1. O God of fathers and Lord of thy mercy, thou who didst create all things by thy word;

2. And in thy wisdom didst fit man to be a despotic lord over the places elaborated by thee,

3. And sway the affairs of the cosmos in holiness and righteousness, and administer judicial rule in uprightness of mind;

4. Mayest thou have given unto me the wisdom that sitteth beside thy throne, and mayest thou not cast me away from among thy children as of no approved value.

5. Because I am thy bond-servant and the son of thy bond-maid, (Zion) a man weak and *short*lived, and inferior in understanding of a judicial way and of laws.

6. Yea if there be any one perfect among the sons of men, he will have been accounted of no value when compared with the wisdom that cometh from thee.

7. Thou hast preferred me to be a king of thy royal people and a civil judge of thy sons and daughters:

8. Thou hast told me to build a sanctuary on thy sacred mount and an altar in the city of thy encampment, an imitation of thy sacred tabernacle which thou didst pre-arrange from the outset

9. And with thee is the wisdom that knoweth thy works and that was present when thou didst create the cosmos, and that knoweth well what is pleasing in thine eyes and upright in relation to thy commandments.

10. Send it forth from out the sacred heavens, and commission it [illegible] present and toil along with me, that I may know what is pleasing in thy estimation,

11. For it knoweth all things and understandeth and will guide me wisely in what I do; and will watch to guard me in its glory

12. And my deeds will be acceptable and I shall judge thy royal people justly, and shall be worthy of the thrones of my father.

13. For what man may apprehend the counsel of God? or who will have thought out what the Lord doth purpose?

14. For the reasonings of mortals are ignoble and the results of our reflection unreliable;

15. For a mortal body weigheth down the life, and the earthly tabernacle encumbereth the much-thinking mind;

16. And with difficulty do we image the things upon the earth, and with toil do we find the things that are at hand; and the things in heaven who will trace out?

17. And thy counsel who hath apprehended it except as thou hast given wisdom and sent thy (Holy) Sanctified Spirit from on high?

18. And in this way have the paths of some upon the earth been changed to uprightness, and men have been taught things pleasing to thee,

19. And saved by wisdom.

John xv. 26. And when the Advocate shall have come, which I shall commission (same word as in chap. ix. 10, wisdom sicame) unto you from the Father, namely, the Spirit of the truth, which goeth its way forth from the Father, it will testify of me.

Chap. xvi. 7. Moreover I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away. For if I go not away, the Advocate will not come unto you; but if I shall have gone my way, I will commission it unto you,

8. And when it shall have come it will convict (it is a loyal Advocate remember) the cosmos of sin and of righteousness and of a judicial way.

9. Of sin, because they do not believe in me;

10. Of righteousness, because I go away unto my Father and ye beheld me no more;

11. Of a judicial way, because the ruler of this cosmos hath been judged.

12. I have many more things to tell you; but ye are not able to bear them just now.

13. But when it, the Spirit of the Truth, shall have come, it will guide you into all the truth; for it will not talk of itself but whatever it shall have heard will it speak, and it will declare unto you things to come.

14. It will glorify me, because it will take of mine and declare it unto you.

15. Everything that the Father hath is mine. Therefore I said that it will take of mine, and declare it unto you.

Acts i. 8. But ye will receive ability (dunamis) when the Holy Spirit hath come upon you, and ye will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and unto the end of the earth.

Matt. xiii. 54. And when he had come into his native province, he taught them in their synagogue, so that they were dumbfounded and said, whence hath this one this wisdom and these abilities (dunamis)?

EXEGESIS.

These passages in their harmonic relation to each other are in the highest degree interesting and instructive, and we find the testimony agreed in making more human wisdom fallible and mere human ability weak and unreliable. More over that it is possible for a mere human being to be "endued," with wisdom and ability, from "on high" and that the "Efficient Cause," and "Source" of this wisdom and ability is a person, here variously denominated as "The Lord," "The God of Fathers," "The Father," "my Father," "The Lord of thy mercy," but always the same infinite person. We also find a clear distinction drawn between wisdom and the truth that inheres in wisdom; and the way and result of its enforcement. We find that "the wisdom" and "the truth" inhering in it relates to the cosmos elsewhere defined as the outward expression of God's plan and purpose in the creation of man and the harmonic universe over which he is destined to rule as a despotic lord, and this wisdom we find sooner or at least with the cosmos to which it relates, if not with God himself in whom it inheres, and from whom it proceeds. We also learn that he gives and withholds it as he will, and that when he gives it, the giving is not according to any of the laws of natural generation and natural life. "The natural man cannot apprehend spiritual things," and the wisdom of God, the wisdom God conferred upon Solomon, yea the wisdom in which "the truth as it is in Christ" inheres, is not [illegible] this cos[illegible] might reasonably [illegible] not rise higher than [illegible] man is to rule as despotic [illegible] cosmos natural, he must be [illegible] his attributes above it, not lift[illegible] fictitiously in pride or presumption, [illegible] but raised in some way to an actual and conscious ability to sway its affairs in righteousness and holiness, and that too, judicially. Now when God thus lifts a man up above the level of the natural as he has been doing in all the ages it is with specific ends in view, and this endowment of Spirit until the Christ is "by measure," but that of the Christ, as we are told is "without measure," or an endowment with the completeness of the spiritual or divine attributes; the ability therefore of those thus endued is correspondingly limited, through transcending the natural; while that of the Christ is spoken of as limited only by that of the Father. "The Father is greater than I." Again the entirety of the gift and the inherit nature of it is spoken of in this way:

"For even as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given also to the Son to have life in himself." Now reasoning according to the analogy of the natural as well as according to what has been revealed, nothing has life in itself unless it be organic and individual. Every individual man, animal, bird, fish, insect or other animate organism has in itself according to genus and species the completeness of its individual life or natural life. So we have it recorded of the Christ that, according to a similar analogy, he unlike all others whom God had favored with an endowment of Spirit or "the Spiritual," whose endowment has been "by measure." "In him dwelleth the completeness of the Divine nature (not the personality) in bodily form." Then the ability (intelligent power) which belongs to this nature, we should expect, reasoning by analogy, to be an accessory or at least a phenomenon of its possession. For natural men and women, how natural the exclamation of his immediate neighbors and acquaintances then, "whence hath this one this wisdom and these abilities?" Of what were they speaking? Of his saying and doings transcending all known wisdom and ability, were they not? Bear in mind, reader, that the only word for a so-called "miracle," in the Greek of the Old or New, is this word dunamis ability, a word in its original use at least meaning intelligent power as contrasted with mere "machine power." All the "forces" of this cosmos even become intelligent powers in the hands of God and "his Christ" to obey their intelligent bidding. All the generic laws as the divine word obey to "create" or to "destroy." "For even as the Father hath life in himself (the spiritual life, "God is a Spirit;" so hath he given also to the Son to have life (the spiritual) in himself."

And power hath he given to him also to act judicially because he is a Son of man." Then the conferment of "the wisdom" or God's wisdom, as well as of "the ability" to use it, in a spiritual and not a natural way, according to the laws of spiritual not natural life, or as it is expressed in these harmonic passages, through "the Holy, (or more properly) Sanctified Spirit." Why? Because there is such a thing as unholy or unsanctified Spirit. And we are told "to try the spirits, whether they be of (or from) God." Now "God is a Spirit," or in other words a Spiritual Person. Then that in which his personality inheres is spiritual life and from this at his will proceedeth holy or sanctified Spirit—sanctified, or set apart to do his will; and in it inheres the ability which its conferment implies. To illustrate this distribution of sanctified spiritual wisdom and ability according to God's will and specific purpose, which looks beneficiently down the ages toward the specific ends to be accomplished, ("My word shall not return unto me void,") see the conferment upon Noah to be a "herald of righteousness," the conferment upon Joseph to be a ruler, second to Pharaoh alone, a clear type of the Christ in his relation to "the King of kings;" the conferment upon Moses to become a mediator of law, but an ineffectual law, a clear type of the perfect and efficient law; the conferment upon Joshua (Jesus), "to make the first distribution of the spoil with the strong;" the conferment upon Samson as a judge to judge in the might of physical strength, the son of a vow, as the Christ is a Son of another and better vow, the one a "Nazarite," the other a "Nazarine," the one [illegible] in obedience to the vow the [illegible] that obedience, the abilit[illegible] to physical strength[illegible] other the abili[illegible] sways [illegible]

Such [illegible] ment of idolatry, and the ac[illegible] and adoption of it in practice is the worship of an attribute of "the Creator" instead of "the Creator Himself" "who should be praised forever." We regard, respect, admire, approve, commend, yea fear a person's wisdom and ability; but we love and revere and worship the person himself, whether as little children according to the flesh or Spirit. Otherwise our conception of God becomes a cold and lifeless cosmogany of attributes merely as manifold as our powers of conception and as false when tried by the standard of God's word as the old Pantheon of Rome. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God (He is One God) with all thy heart and mind and strength and thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets."

Who is your neighbor in the highest sense? Who found you when you had fallen among robbers and left you half, yea more them half dead? Who took you to the wayside inn of Salvation and poured into your wounds the oil (holy spirit) and wine (life) of healing and after giving for you the two denarii (the gracious ministry for the natural and the spiritual, "my grace is sufficient for you") says, in the overflowing abundance of his generosity, to the All-receiving One (the landlord) whatever more thou shalt lavish on him, I will reply thee when I come again. "shall not a brother redeem? (brother, nearest neighbor except father). Will a man redeem himself? He shall not give unto God the gracious price of himself, the honor of the redemption of his life."

Why may we not approach directly unto God with our worship? Because God has conferred this "honor" upon this "Brother" this "Neighbor" "who sticketh closer than a brother." Because man could no more redeem himself than this man who went down from Jerusalem, (The High Place of God's appointment) and fell among robbers. Neither could he be redeemed (restored) to life by natural means, therefore the means of grace are spiritual and we have God, The Christ and the Sanctified (Holy) Spirit in the work of salvation as appears in these harmonic passages of the Old and New.

Unreasonableness of Observing "the Sabbath" (Seventh Day) as a Memorial Day, during the Christian Dispensation.

Is it reasonable to suppose that "the Sabbath" should be observed, during this age, when it was given to "the children of Israel," in their national capacity, over 2,000 years ago, and to no other nation upon earth? (Ex. xix: 3-9; xx: 18-21; Lev. xxxvi: 13-17; Deut. v: 1-3.)

Is it reasonable to suppose that the observance of "the sabbath" is obligatory, during the gospel dispensation when it is a purely Jewish institution, given by God, (through the mediation of Moses) as "a sign" between him and "the children of Israel" throughout their "generation," and has a death penalty affixed for its violation? (Exodus xxxi: 12-18.)

How can Christians consistently keep "the Sabbath," when it was given as a memorial of deliverance from Egyptian bondage? (Deut v: 15; xvi: 12.)

Is it reasonable to suppose that "the Sabbath" should be observed, today, when it stands connected with a law, given 430 years subsequent to the Abrahamic covenant, and which "was added because of transgression, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made;" closely implying that it would then cease, or run out by limitation? (Gal. iii: 17-19.) Verse 16 declares that the "seed" mentioned "is Christ." This is tantamount to the Apostle saying that the law (including of course the decalogue) would be of binding force till a specified event, the coming of Christ. The above language (with reference to "the law") designates its terminations, as will as clearly and unmistakably fixing the epoch of its commencement. The validity of the Mosaic law is spanned by these two epochs of [illegible] events [illegible] so th[illegible]

[illegible] contained [illegible] we are [illegible] the Scripture[illegible] "abolished in h[illegible] even the law of co[illegible] tained in ordinances; for[illegible] himself of twain one new [illegible] making peace." Eph. ii: 14-18; Col. i: 19, 20.)

Is it reasonable that we should be governed by "the handwriting of ordinances," since it "was against us," and "contrary to us," and has been blotted out, taken away, and nailed to the cross? (Colossians ii: 9-16.)

Is it reasonable to suppose that "the Sabbath" should be observed now, and has been in force from the commencement of the Christian era, when "the Apostle of the Gentiles" wrote to the church at Colosse, "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days?" (Col. ii: 13-16.)

Is it reasonable that Christians should cling to the "shadow," when they can grasp the substance, or "body?" (Col. ii: 16, 17.)

Is it unreasonable that Christians should prefer to follow a living "Leader" and Guide? (John. vii: 19; viii: 52, 53; Deut. xxxiv: 5; Rev. i: 18; Isa. lv: 4; Acts iii: 22, 23.)

Is it unreasonable to suppose that "the Sabbath" law, with its death penalty is void, when we find such language as this, in the book that antedates all other books—the Bible—"One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind?" (Romans xiv: 5, 13.) When the law was in force, the people to whom it was given (the Israelites) had to obey its requirements, according to their agreement, (Ex. xix: 1-8,) or suffer the penalty. As a case of sabbath-breaking, and its results, I cite you to Numbers xv: 32, 36.

Is it unreasonable to suppose that if "the law" it still in force, the penalties for its violation should be inflicted upon the disobedient? A law without a penalty is a nullity. If "the law" was in force, and its penalty for sabbath-breaking inflicted, (i. e. "death,") how many Sabbatarians would escape? "The law" prohibited the performance of "any work" on the Sabbath. The Israelites in the wilderness, were not allowed to gather or prepare food on the Sabbath day, but had to gather and prepare a double portion on the previous day. Although God miraculously rained "bread from heaven" for them, he would not have them violate his law, and incur its penalty, by gathering the food they ate, on "the Sabbath." So strict was his law. (See Exodus xvi: 1-6, 22-25.)

Is it reasonable to suppose that the observance of "days" is required at our hands, when Paul wrote to the Galatian brethren, "ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain?" (Gal. iv: 10.)

Would it not be far better to seek perfection through Christ, than through "the law," which was simply "a shadow of good things to come," and could not "make the comers thereunto perfect?" (Hebrews x: 1, 12-14; Col. ii: 16, 17.)

Is it reasonable to suppose that Jesus would have commanded persons to do things on "the Sabbath," for which they would have forfeited their lives, had the law been in force? (John v: 10-16; Jer. xvii: 19-22; Exodus xxxi. 12-18.

Is it reasonable to suppose that the observance of the Sabbath is binding upon people today, when the Apostle Paul has never once enjoined its observance, although he abounded not [illegible] declares "all the counsel of [illegible] "kept back nothing th[illegible] unto God's people[illegible] What do you in[illegible] silence upon t[illegible] that it is not[illegible] observe it, or[illegible] should [illegible]

THE GOSPEL OF GOD.—No. 2.

The kingdom of God shall be taken from you

A crisis is now impending. He had said to the Pharisees "Lo, hold the kingdom of God is within you." He had said to the multitude and to his disciples, "The Scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat;" but how soon was all this to end. There was a slumbering and deafness, and a blindness, a hardness and unbelief. There was coming a casting away, a breaking off, a bowing down, and a snare, and captivity, and scattering, and stumbling, and wasting away, to Israel. To Jerusalem, a breaking down and burning and blood and desolation, and a ploughing as a field, and the "abomination of desolation standing in the holy place."

Who can tell all about these great changes — their far-reaching consequences? "Who hath known the mind of the Lord?" Rom. xi 34. There were other changes also. No longer saying, Go only to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel." No longer telling them to say the "kingdom of heaven is at hand;" but hear him—"And he said unto them, these are the words that I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled that are written in the law and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me. Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 44–48.

We have now arrived at the point at which will begin to appear a statement in full of all that Jesus told his disciples to preach, and why they should preach it, and how they understood it, and what they thought about it, and what they preached unto the people; the very words they uttered, and what are the very things they said concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ. What they preach unto the people for gospel, and what they told the people they should do and believe, that they might be saved. We will hear the Master again: "All power is given unto me, in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, [immersing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Matt. xxviii. 18–20. "And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Mark xvi. 15, 16.

Now that we may know how they understood these commands, and how they acted on them, and what they have to say about these things, we will begin with Peter, on the day of Pentecost, with his Master's instructions during those forty days in which he [illegible] after his resurrection, [illegible] The things which [illegible] them during that [illegible] of God, [illegible] that [illegible] by the right hand of God, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, had shed it forth in their presence. The only reference to anything in the past history of Israel or its future hope, except this promise of the Spirit, was this, that David "being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, he, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ." Verses 30, 31. Peter quotes this fact of David's personal history and official character, to show why David did not speak as he did in the previous verses quoted by Peter concerning the resurrection of Christ, "that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption." Vs. 31. Verses 29 to 35 is the climax of Peter's argument, and the conclusion is as follows:

"Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made this same Jesus which ye have crucified both Lord and Christ." Vs. 36. This then is the conclusion of the whole matter, the all important truth that Peter presents to the people.

Verses 32–39 contain Peter's gospel as he preached it on the day of Pentecost. This argument may be stated in five distinct propositions. a. Jesus is Lord he proves by David who calls him Lord. b. Jesus is Messiah he proves from David's prophecy concerning his resurrection. c. The gift of the Holy Spirit he establishes by the prophet Joel. d. That Jesus was raised from the dead he proves in these words, "whereof we all are witnesses." v. 32. e. Repentance, immersion and the remission of sins he learned from his Master and Lord. His grand argument and the accompanying visible and oracular demonstrations, carried the castle of Jewish unbelief by storm, as the result showed. Will the reader now please turn to Acts iii, and read Peter's address to the Jews in Solomon's porch. He then tells them that they had killed the Prince of Life whom "God hath raised from the dead" "whereof we are witnesses." He exhorts them to repentance and to obtain remission of their sins; and concludes with a statement of the goodness of God, who, having raised up his Son Jesus, had sent him first to them, to bless them in turning every one of them away from their iniquities. Just then he was interrupted by the coming upon them of the priests and the captain of the temple and the Sadducees, "being grieved that Peter taught "through Jesus the resurrection of the dead." This was the rock on which he built.

In Acts iv. 33 is this important statement, "And with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus." Now hear another of Peter's words of power, "Then Peter and the apostles answered and said; we ought to obey God rather than men. The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged upon a tree. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Savior, to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins, and we are his witnesses of these things, and so is the Holy Spirit whom God hath given to them that obey him." Acts v. 2–32.

And here is another, "Then Peter opened his mouth and said, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him. The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ: he [illegible] That word I say, ye [illegible] published throughout [illegible] from Galilee [illegible] which John [illegible] anointed Jesus of [illegible] Holy Spirit with [illegible] his duty [illegible] ground? [illegible] tender, or fly? [illegible] By so much as he [illegible] he keep the field. And [illegible] struggle for immortality [illegible] simple and obvious affair. The [illegible] armor and saber, the powder and shot, are not in fact altogether the urgent and the tangible. The blood and dust and mortal cries may not be the opponent of the auditor. The soul in the hands of the silent tether grass in frass and fiber.

These are wonderful thoughts, and lest any might imply that only the strong and those able to contend in the field for spiritual life, should succeed to immortality, the writer proceeds to declare that sheer intellect has no greater chance at everlasting life than sheer muscle. Mere mind holds no passport to eternity. The observant mother, transmitting a pure heart to her boys, knowing no philosophy beyond her prayers, may enter into this higher contention with an equipment far beyond persons of greater knowledge. "Earnest-ness is the path of life: thoughtlessness, the path of death," quotes Miss Phelps from an old eastern adage. "He is the unit who is beaten to death on the spiritual side of his nature; he is the fit survivor who saves his soul alive."

We have given above only a hint of the remarkable article of Miss Phelps. It should be read to be fully comprehended and understood. The lady is an earnest Christian, and seldom do we see pages which glow with such warmth of conviction. They call to mind the words of Paul, who likened the Christian life to a race to be run, or a battle to be fought. Miss Phelps further expresses the belief that there will be no failures in such a race.

JUBILICAL RESEARCH.

Delitzsch on Sennacherib.

HEFT 125 and 126 of the second edition of "Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie" is a very rich number. It contains long and valuable articles on the Sabbaterians, by Dr. Erdmann of Breslau; on the Samaritans, by Professor Kautzsch of Tübingen; on Samuel (the prophets and the books) by Professor Orelli, of Basel; on Sanchoniathon, by Count Wolf Baudissin, of Marburg; on Sayonerola, by Professor Schaff, of New York. But its most valuable contribution, running from page 576 to 597, is an article on Sennacherib—the Sanzacherib of the A. V.—by Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch, of Leipzig. The article is an entirely original contribution for the new edition, and it embraces the latest and probably the most reliable results of Assyriology, and as further, its rich contents will not be utilized in the English Version of Herzog—this having already advanced beyond this latter—the Biblical scholars of our country have a right to know of its existence and merit. The article furnishes more than it promises, treating not only on this Jewish king, but giving a brief yet full sketch of Assyrian history, especially in its relation and connection with the Biblical records. That not only the investigation of other Assyriological scholars have been fully weighed and sifted, but that careful, independent research everywhere appears is no more than could be expected from the younger Delitzsch. In this connection, naturally, the account of the relations between Assyria and Judea, as we find it in 2 Kings 18 and 19, and in Isaiah 36 and 37, will be of special interest when compared with the cuneiform of the same events. These records, which are quite extensive, have been repeatedly published in translation; but Delitzsch has, in this article, offered a new version, differing not immaterially from those made by other scholars. As he is a man whose voice has weight and authority in these matters, a faithful English rendition of his translation will not be without value. His translation reads as follows:

"On my third expedition I marched to the country of the Chatti. The fear of the glory of my supremacy threw down Sulî, the king of Sidon, and he fled far away into the midst of the sea. I brought his land into subjection. Great Sidon, Lesser Sidon, Bit-Zite, Sarepta, Machalliba, Ushu, Akzib, Akko, his fortified and walled cities, the emporia for food and drink, the garrison cities, I threw down with the power of the weapons of Asur, my Lord, and they cast themselves down at my feet. I placed Tuba'al upon the throne over them, and imposed [illegible] on them tax and tribute of my power [illegible] arily and regular contributions. [illegible] Ramu, of the city Samsimuruu, [illegible] of Sidon, Abdilite of Arvad, [illegible] Zaibles, Mitinti of Ashdod, [illegible] Kummusunadbi [illegible] Idum—all [illegible] ...ary, a [illegible] me and kissed my feet; Zidka, however, the king of Ashkelon, who had not submitted to my yoke, together with the gods of his paternal house, himself, his wife, his sons, daughters, brothers, the family of the house of his father, I dragged away and led them down to Assyria. Sarruludari, the son of Rukibtu, their former king, I put over the inhabitants of Ashkelon; and I imposed upon him, as a subjunctive servant, the deliverance of the tribute and presents for my rule. In the course of my expedition I besieged, conquered and plundered the places Bit-Dagon, Joppa, Beni-Barak, Azuru, the cities of Zitka, which did not at once submit themselves to me. The rulers, the nobles and the inhabitants of Ekron, who had put into iron chains their king, Padi, who was obedient to the love and the oath of Assyria, and had delivered him over into the hands of Hezekiah, of Judah—in a wicked manner the latter locked him up in a dark cell—these began to fear in their hearts. They called together the Kings of Egypt, the bowmen, wagons, the horses of the kings of Ethiopia, warriors without number; and their came to help them. In front of the city they drew themselves up against me in battle array, calling out their weapons. With the assistance of my Lord Assur, I fought with them and overcame them. In the midst of the battle my hands took alive the commander of the wagons and sons of the king (or the kings) of Egypt, together with the commander of the wagons of the king of Ethiopia. I besieged, captured and plundered the cities of Eltekh, Timna. I advanced against the city of Ekron. The rulers and nobles who had committed the crime, I slew, and tied their dead bodies to the pillars of the city walls. I led away, as captives, those inhabitants of the city who had committed evil and wicked deeds. The rest of them, who had no trespass upon themselves the crime and crime, concerning whom no sin was found, I pardoned. I brought away from Jerusalem Padi, their king, and placed him upon his throne over them, and imposed the tribute of my supremacy upon him. But Hezekiah, of Judea, who had not submitted to my yoke, forty six of his fortified and walled cities and innumerable smaller places of his kingdom I besieged and took by trampling down the wall, and by storming them, by [illegible] battle, [illegible] of the feet by [illegible] (?), daughter, kallanuti. Two hundred thousand one hundred and fifty inhabitants, small and great, male and female, horses, mules, asses, camels, cattle and small domestic animals without number, I took away from them and accounted them booty. But the king himself I enclosed in Jerusalem, his royal city, locked in as in a cage. I threw up bulwarks against him, and whosoever came out of the city gate, him I injured. The cities which I had robbed I separated from his country, and gave them to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, to Padi, king of Ekron, and to Zilbel, king of Gaza, and thus made his country small. To the former tax I added tribute and presents for my supremacy, and imposed them upon him. But the fear of the glory of my supremacy cast him, Hezekiah, down, and the Arabians and his friendly dispossessed subjects, whom he had collected for the defense of Jerusalem, his royal city, were overpowered with terror. Thirty talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, jewels, gubbi diag-gurri, large gugune stones, ivory boards, ivory chamber-chairs, elephant skins and teeth, Ushu and Urkarina wood and many other articles, a heavy imposition, as also his daughters, the women of his palace, male lub and female lub, I had taken after me to Nineveh, the city of my supremacy; and for the purpose of delivering the tribute, and take the oath of subjection, he sent his ambassadors."

It can thus be seen that, with the exception of a few comparatively unimportant expressions, Delitzsch makes a smooth and intelligible translation of these records. In dispensing the historical problems suggested by them, and their keeping one's accounts found in the Bible, he says that these can be easily harmonized; that they agree throughout. Of course the narratives on the Assyrian tablets are under the spell of their boastful author; but even as they stand, they bear a strong corroborating testimony to the truth of the sacred record. Above all is the silence of the Assyrian as to the reason why he did not take and destroy Jerusalem, as he did the other rebellious cities, a loud commentary on the narrative in 2 Kings and Isaiah, concerning the destruction of the Assyrian hosts by the angel of Jehovah.

The student of history and chronology will also find a rich hint in this article of Delitzsch. He closes it with what is probably the most complete list of chronological data [illegible] alphabetical-cuneiform descriptions and eponyme lists. Altogether the article is one that exhibits more scholarship and patient research in a condensed yet clear language than is often put into work of this kind.

In this connection it might not be out of place to state that the new edition of Herzog will not, as was originally announced, appear in fifteen volumes; but that, owing to an increased number of topics treated, there will be sixteen volumes, the seventeenth to follow a year later, as the index.—*N. TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION addresses the daily "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." And it aims to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the final overthrow of the devil; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; reconciliation to God through Christ, and to each other in the truth. We cheerfully believe of the Gospel, repentance, and remission of sins, preached to the forgiveness of sins, and study to [illegible] for the Restitution.

THE PROMISE.

"IN THY SEED SHALL ALL THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH BE BLESSED."

What does this promise mean? Does it include only the living nations, after the wicked have been destroyed? Or, does it include the whole race of Adam? Whatever nations are included in this promise, the race will be wholly saved without any exception. The blessing of the nations contained in this promise will be universal. Of all the people who make up these nations, every knee will bow and every tongue will confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. The two propositions suggested above, seem to be the only ones that can be entertained. The promise must include either the whole race of Adam, or it can only include all the nations of the earth after the wicked have been destroyed. In either case the universal salvation of the nations which are contained in the promise, will be secured. The salvation will not consist in the offer of the blessing only, in giving them a chance to be blessed, but it will consist in being blessed, in the highest sense of the word.

The object of this article is to learn, if possible, which of these propositions is true.

THE PROMISE.

"And in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." "And in thee, and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." "In thee shall all nations be blessed." These promises are but one promise repeated on different occasions. The wording of the promise varies a little, but the meaning is the same. This promise cannot testify to this investigation, for it is a witness whose testimony is uncertain. We do not yet know what it means by the words it uses. The sense of the words it uses must be proved by other witnesses.

OTHER WITNESSES.

I will introduce three passages which use the exact words of the promise in relation to the nations, and two other passages which use the same words in relation to the kingdoms.

Jer. xxvi. 6, "Then will I make this house like Shiloh, and will make this city a curse to all the nations of the earth." Are these nations the living nations at the time referred to, or are they the whole race of Adam? Would the nations have been more or less, if a blessing had been named instead of a curse?

Jer. xxxiii. 9, "And it shall be to me a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth." Do these nations include the whole race? Or do they include only the living nations at the time referred to?

Jer. xliv. 8, "And that ye might be a curse and a reproach among all the nations of the earth." Do the nations in this passage include the whole race of Adam? Or do they include only the living nations at the time referred to?

In these three passages "all the nations of the earth" cannot mean the whole race of Adam. Then the same word in the promise may not include the whole race.

Isa. xxxvii. 20, "Now therefore, O Lord our God, save us from his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord." Do not all the kingdoms of the earth mean the same as all the nations of the earth? Are not the kingdoms and the nations often used interchangably? Then they must mean the same thing.

Jer. xxix. 18, "And I will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth to be a curse and an astonishment, and a hissing, and a reproach among all nations whither I have driven them."

Do not the kingdoms and the nations in this passage mean the same thing? Then these five passages, which use exactly the same words that are used in the promise, do not include the race, but only the living nations of the earth at the time referred to. We [illegible] all do will be saved and [illegible] give the one passage a sense entirely different from the sense of the five, without a precedent and without authority.

MORE THAN SEVENTY TIMES.

All nations, all the nations, and all nations of the earth, are used more than seventy times in the Bible, and not in a single instance does one of these descriptions include the whole race of Adam, but in every case it includes only the living nations of the earth. The promise made to Abraham [illegible] an exception. One part of that promise does not conflict with another part of the same promise. In connection with the promise, and as explanatory of the same, it is said, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Every one included in the nations of this promise are to be blessed. If this promise concerning the nations includes the whole of the race, it cannot be fulfilled. For some are to be cursed instead of being blessed. And when the time of blessing comes, all who have been cursed will not be blessed. The promise will lack fulfilment to the extent of those who have been cursed. For the same one who said I will bless them that bless thee, said also, I will curse him that curseth thee. If the blessing under the reign of the seed of Abraham is to be final, the curse under the same reign will be equally final. As God is one, all the nations of the earth do not include the whole race of Adam. But it includes only all the living nations, after the wicked have been destroyed.

A FEW ILLUSTRATIONS.

And thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and he shall bless those that bless Abraham, and curse him that curseth Abraham, and in his seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. The process is this, The seed takes possession of his enemies, the nations, then subdues them by cursing them that curse Abraham, and then blesses all who become loyal. Or, he takes possession of the kingdom, and gathereth out of it all things that offend and them that do iniquity, and then blesses all the nations of the earth.

Psa. ii. He shall take possession of the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession, and he shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel, and afterward bless all them that put their trust in him. The same process.

Psa. lxxii. He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall break in pieces the oppressor, and his enemies shall lick the dust. After this, in his days shall the righteous flourish; yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him, and call him blessed. And blessed be his glorious name forever, and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. The same process again.

Isa. ii. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; after this, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

Isa. xi. But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked; after this, the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. Here is the same process again.

Isa. lxvi. For behold, the Lord will come with fire, and render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire, and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many. After this all flesh shall come and worship before the Lord.

Matt. xiii. He shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. After this, the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

Acts iii. He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. When all things are put in subjection unto God, then God will be all in all. The same process every time.

This form of reasoning might be carried on in each of the [illegible] many more; however, I trust these are sufficient [illegible] the general tenor of the Bible on the subject, and he has now the promise will be fulfilled, and also to know what nations are included in "all the nations of the earth" to be blessed.

A FEW QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

1. Will not all who [illegible] heirs of the promise receive it?

2. Will not the nations who live after the wicked have been destroyed, be all the nations of the earth?

3. Can the people [illegible] be entitled?

JEWISH PRIESTHOOD.

The work of the priest, in itself, was [illegible] and holy, and the high priest was a national representative. However poor and degraded many of its members might be. Every priest was the lineal descendant of a priestly ancestry running back to Aaron, and as the wives of the order were usually chosen within its families, it was lofty pedigree in many cases matched both parents.

The law fixed no certain age at which the young priest should enter on his office, though the Rabbis maintain that he needed to be at least twenty-three. David and Solomon changed for the service. As in corrupt ages of the Church, however, this wholesome rule was not always observed, for Josephus tells us that Herod made Aristobulus high priest when he was seventeen, and so most of common priests whose boards were only beginning to grow.

The [illegible] consecration of the young priest [illegible] he was just only a lad. As soon as the down appeared on his cheek he had to appear before the Council of the Temple, that his genealogy might be inspected. If it proved faulty, he left the Temple clad in black, and had to seek another calling. If it satisfied the council a further ordeal awaited him. There were no bodily defects, any one of which would incapacitate him from sacred duties, and he was now carefully inspected to discover if he were free from them. If he had no blemish of any kind, the white tunic of a priest was given him, and he began his official life in its humblest duties, as a training for higher responsibilities in after years.

Ordination, or rather the formal consecration, followed, when the priest attained the legal age. For this, much more was necessary, in theory, than freedom from bodily blemish. The candidate must be of blameless character, though, in such an age, this, no doubt, was little considered.

The ceremony, as originally prescribed, was imposing. The neophyte was first washed before the sanctuary, as a typical cleansing, and then clothed in his robe. His head was next anointed with holy oil, and then his priestly turban was put on him. A young ox was then slain as a sin-offering, the priest putting his hands upon its head; then a ram followed, as a whole burnt offering, and after that, a second ram as an offering of consecration, and this was the crowning feature in the rite. Some of the warm blood of the victim was put on the right ear, the right thumb, and the right great toe of the candidate, to show his complete consecration to the service of Jehovah. He was then sprinkled with the blood floating from the altar, and with the holy oil, as if to convey to him their purifying virtues, and transform him into another man. This sprinkling was the sign of completed consecration; he was now a priest. The pieces of the ram for the altar, with the meat offering that accompanied them, were put into his hands to show that he could, henceforth, himself prepare what was needed for the altar services. Having laid them on the altar, other ceremonies followed. The pieces of the sacrifice usually given to the priests were considered as a special sin-offering, and with their [illegible] the altar the initiatory rite office ended. The first [illegible] sacrifices offered on this day were required to be repeated on each of the seven days following, that the solemnity of the act might be felt by all. It had been, this in the early and glorious days of the past. But how many of these ceremonies were observed under the second Temple is not known.

The official dress of a priest, like that of the priests of ancient Egypt, was of white linen. He was [illegible] more than [illegible] in his ministrations, receiving [illegible] he should not enter the presence of Jehovah unrewarded, and for the same reason his feet were left bare, the ground on which he stood, in the [illegible] of the Almighty King [illegible]. The full official dress was worn only in the Temple, and was kept there by a special guard [illegible] when the [illegible] called for the time. In private life a simpler dress was worn, but whether in his service at the Temple or at his house, he was still a priest, even to the eye. The richly ornamented dress of the high priest—the "golden vestment" as it was called by the Rabbis—was, of course, much more costly than that of his brethren, and passed down from one high priest to another. It marks the character of the times, that under the Romans, it was kept in their hands, and only given out to the priest, for use, when needed.

The duties of the priests were many and various. It was their awful and peculiar honor to "come near the Lord." None but they could minister before him, in the Holy Place where he manifested his presence. None others could resume night the vessels of the [illegible] or sacrificer." It was death to any not a priest to usurp these sacred prerogatives. They offered the morning and evening incense; trimmed the lamps of the golden [illegible] stirk and fed them with oil; [illegible] the showbread weekly; kept up the fire on the great altar in front of the Temple, removed the ashes of the sacrifices; took part in the slaying and the setting up of victims, and especially in the sprinkling of the blood, and laid the offerings of all kinds upon the altar. They also announced the new moons, which were sacred days, like the Sabbath, by the blowing of trumpets. But this was a small part of their duties. They had to examine all ceremonial uncleanness, especially in [illegible], clearing those who were pure and pronouncing others unclean; to estimate, for commutation, the value of the [illegible] vowed to the Temple, and to watch the interior of the Temple by night. They were required, moreover, to instruct the people in the niceties of the Law, and to give decisions on many points reserved, among us to magistrates. The priests, in fact, were, within certain limits, the judges and magistrates of the land, though the Sanhedrin, which was the supreme court in later Jewish history, was composed of chief priests and laymen, first [illegible], or Rabbis, in apparently equal numbers.

It was necessary that an officiating priest should be in every point ceremonially "clean" during the period of duty, for pollution was not tolerated. [illegible] could not enter the Temple. A wise law prohibited his partaking wine or strong drink during the term of his service. In [illegible] seasons of grief common to the nation, when unbridled in [illegible] he was commanded to [illegible] his head, whatever befel [illegible]. Contact with the dead was to be carefully shunned as a defilement.

The same ideal purity as of one holy to the Lord, marked the laws of the priest's marriage. He could only marry a virgin, or a widow who had not been divorced, and she must be a pure Israelite, lawfully born. The daughters of priests were held in special honor, and marriage of priests with them was in high favor. A priest, says Josephus, must marry a wife of his own nation, without having any regard to money, or other dignities; but he is to make a scrutiny, and take his wife's genealogy from the ancient records, and procure many witnesses to it, just as his own had been carefully tested before his consecration. So [illegible] guarded by countless special laws [illegible] in the eyes [illegible]

IN THE HOLY CITY.

Lights in and Around Jerusalem. The Mosque of Omar. Ordered Cave Dwellings. The Pools of Bethesda and Siloam.

SMYRNA, April 26.—A visit to Jerusalem is at first disappointing and unsatisfactory. However well read up upon its present condition one may be, it is still to the mind an ideal city. The sight at first absorbs attention, dispelling the ideal and filling its place with the confusion, jargon and moral and social debris of a hundred Oriental cities, and crowding [illegible] Arabian with [illegible] ures of later ages, it is not till one has made himself familiar with the sites and defined the localities, and torn off the accumulations of centuries, and spirited away the living populations and slowly resurrected the past, that the ideal city rises grand and beautiful and sacred before him. But it comes—slowly comes—under fixed, well-directed, sympathetic lookings, like the light of a bright planet, in the daytime, or like the soft strains of sweet, enchanting music across the harsh sounds of a thronged street. Then the sight of Jerusalem is rewarding and grand. You see it, and you do not see it. You see what was, not what is. You see the sites: you reanimate the scene. If you can not do this, do not come to Jerusalem. If you are there and do not do it, hurry away as soon as possible. It is a place of [illegible] and lies to you, and can do you no good.

I am not presumptuous enough to [illegible] any description of Jerusalem, either of the real or the ideal city. Too much has been well written about both, and is familiar or accessible to make this necessary. I shall merely speak of a few points which especially interested me for this visit of the higher associations and emotions which stirred me as I thought of the wondrous scenes of the past which had been enacted in the very places where I trod.

THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

I visited what is popularly but erroneously called the Mosque of Omar. The real shrine of Omar is now supposed to be part of the Mosque El Aksa, in front of the reputed mosque of that name, and near the city wall and the valley of Jehoshaphat. The true name of the latter is "The Dome of the Rock." This rich and grand mosque—second only to that at Mecca—is octagon in form, and is built around and over the great circular rock (60 feet long, 50 feet wide, and rising 17 feet high at the apex), which is now pretty generally regarded, I believe, by the best authorities, as the basis of the altar of Solomon's Temple. The celebrated dome rises exactly over it, and passages cut through the rock and leading to a tunnel dug through the rock below, and leading out to the foot of Mount Moriah in the valley, are so arranged that the whole could be abundantly flushed with water, showing most admirable preparation for cleansing the premises of the altar and keeping them pure. The temple [illegible] stood west of the altar. This left a very large space for the courts of the temple between the court occupied by the altar and the city wall on the east, but a great area was necessary inasmuch as the courts of the temple were sometimes thronged at the great annual feasts by the hundreds of thousands of Jews who went up from all parts of the land to attend the sacred rites.

The vaults under the temple area are surprising wonderful. There are great chambers, and chambers leading into chambers, and passages leading within a yard built up to furnish a level for the court above. Rock also was doubtless taken out for building into the walls, and at subsequent times the chambers and passages were utilized for various purposes. Under the "Dome of the Rock" great living fountains of water were struck, the source of supplies for the temple, thence running through the canal to which I have already referred, and terminating in the pool of Siloam.

SUBTERRANEAN CHAMBERS.

There are other subterranean excavations under the city which astonish one. In the northwestern part of the city there is a small opening under the wall on the outside, through which I entered, which soon opened out into a succession of great chambers, which seem to ramify under half the area of the city. Of course, groping with a poor light over the irregular rocks, with the mystery of the place and the sound of water dripping into echoing vaults below, which I could not see, was calculated to emphasize the sense of distance. But there is no doubt that the city for one purpose and another is honeycombed with subterranean vaults.

ORIENTAL CAVE-DWELLERS.

[illegible] twenty years there was [illegible] more surprised than in the signs that the inhabitants of this land, from the time of fixed habitations have been cave-dwellers. After they gave up tents and a nomadic life, they burrowed in the rocks. There are many natural caves, and where these did not exist or were too small, the soft chalking limestone, which underlies or crowns the whole country, could be easily cut into dwellings, and the scarcity of timber and material for brick made this the easier thing to do. The rock could indeed be easily cut out into regular blocks, and there was no want of surface loose stones, to be erected into houses, and houses were often built in this way. But they were caverns still, caves above ground and made by human hands. They were dark, windowless, one story, low, the roofs flat, and covered with gray limestone earth, which was packed, rolled and dried in the sun, and had but a single opening, which served as door, window and chimney. This looked like another rock on the ground, only a little more regular—a hollow rock, or protuberant cave. The cave was the type, and they hugged the ground, and sometimes crept half-way into it so as to look as much like a cave as possible. We shall not be able to appreciate the old [illegible] of Jehovah till we conceive of him as substantially a burrower in the rocks—a cave-dweller. It is not only had his home in the rocks, but he sought natural crypts or chiseled artificial ones in them for resting-places for his dead, and hadug deep wells through the same material and constructed long tunnels through cliffs and hills for aqueducts.

Jerusalem was not alone in its subterranean activity and life.

THE POOLS OF BETHESDA AND SILOAM.

The Pool of Bethesda is not outside of the city, but inside, not far from the northeast corner of the temple area, which is about 1,600 feet long and 1,000 wide. It is now a large, deep hollow or pit, upward of 80 feet deep, 100 wide and 300 long at the top, and but 20 or 30 across the bottom. It has sometimes surface water, but, as I saw it, there was nothing but mud and filth in it. It seems to be a receptacle for neighborhood city waste, and was anything but an attractive sight.

The pools of Gihon are simply reservoirs in the valley of Hinnom, made [illegible] the [illegible] and running a [illegible] for [illegible] water, like a reservoir in the mining regions of California.

VIEW FROM THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

From the Mount of Olives one gets the most general view of Jerusalem it can be had from any one point. From the minaret of the mosque, which stands on the summit I could see and trace very distinctly the great natural outlines of the city. I am standing 2,724 feet above the sea at its highest point. Right below my feet is the valley of the Kedron, running here nearly due south. Above its steep northern bank rises the massive and high city wall. Just over the wall is Mount Moriah, the temple area, on the left-hand eastern corner of which is the broad and spacious mosque, El Aksa, on the central and western portion the grand imposing mosque "The Dome of the Rock," known as the Mosque of Omar. Beyond the temple area is the depression which was once a deep ravine, running nearly south, called the Tyropœan. Above this to the northwest rises Mount Zion—quite a high and steep eminence—from which to any other part of the city within the walls, the rest is one compact, undulating mass of buildings, having winding or irregular seams between them, here and there, marking the supposed course of streets, and broken, here and there, by domes and minarets and towers, and the imposing roofs of churches. I see it all under my eye, over on the side-hill yonder. It is a stirring spectacle; not altogether beautiful, not wholly sad. It is a spectacle whose deepest interest is hint-ed by two facts—Christ looking upon it and Christ weeping over it. But as I turn round and look in another direction, my emotions are mingled. There is only this wild, bare and majesty and beauty of nature. I look down into the deep valley of the Jordan, 4,000 feet below me, and see the Dead Sea stretching out now as a mirror of glass, and on the other side the dark mountains of Moab and Mount Nebo, and close to me on the south the green fields of Judah covered with flowers. No other sight have I seen of such mingled and contrasting interest in my life as from the top of the Mount of Olives.—San Francisco Evening Bulletin.

HUMILITY.

"It [illegible] stars on the sheet along
[illegible] on the coast in the lovely west;
And [illegible] [illegible] must sweetly sing
Right in the chain, where all things good
In dark and night-tide are seen
What honest hath humility.

"The [illegible] the [illegible]
[illegible] upon as most [illegible]
The weight of glory [illegible] down
[illegible] where high his soul ascended;
[illegible] the throne [illegible] Thou be
The footstool of [illegible]."

Hold fast that no man take thy crown; and a little in the future we shall reap life everlasting. Sorrow will be forgotten, tears wiped away, friend will greet friend, there will be no more pain, nor any more death. Blessed thrice endless day! Eden restored! Jesus reigning on his throne! O, to reap the reward of the blessed, and be among the gathered saints, and hear the soul-thrilling, immortalizing words, "well done," from the blessed Savior.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

The second coming of Christ is the great event of the future. From it the flaming beacon of prophecy on every hilltop of the ages have caught their fire. Toward it all the movements of history point the way. In it all the radiating lines of prophecy meet. It is that glorious hope, that morning-star of the endless day, which shines clear and serene above and beyond all the darkness and storms of time. The hope of the Church is not fulfilled, the salvation of the saints is not complete, the victory of redemption is not finished and cannot be until Jesus comes the second time.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL.—The Blessed Hope Mission, corner of Bishop Court and Madison Streets, one square south of Court. Services every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, the usual hour, under the auspices of the Restitution. All are invited to attend.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 9, 1884.

NOTICE!

It would please us very much if those of our friends who know themselves to be in arrears with their subscriptions would send us some money. The only way for us to meet our obligations is for you to pay us what you owe. We need CASH just now. Please look to your account and if you are behind RENEW TO-DAY.

WE shall forward the money received at this office for Brother Cocorda in Italy in a few days. The sum on hand, as sent by different persons, amounts to thirty-three dollars.

IN removing last Spring we fear that some articles, concerning which our friends have inquired, have been lo[st]. Although we have carefully looked over our papers we do not find them. We regret this as it was our intention to give some of these a place in THE RESTITUTION. Papers from several of our brethren in the West are missing. This will explain their non-appearance, or why they are not returned to the writers when requested.

WE have lately given two or three articles on the Genealogy of Jesus Christ. An additional communication on the tables, as given by the Evangelists, will be found in this number. The writer of this also expresses his abhorrent dissent from the theory that makes Jesus Christ the natural son of Joseph. Like the writer, in this one respect, we have no belief in, nor sympathy for, this pernicious error, as we are compelled to regard it. It is clearly a fundamental truth that Jesus Christ is the SON OF THE LIVING GOD. But while fully and unwaveringly believing in the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ—that he is not the son of Joseph by paternal relation, but really and truly the Son of God—we would counsel mildness in language and forbearance in manner toward those in error.

The Restoration and Exaltation of the Children of Israel.

[illegible]

The Jews, or rather the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, were, and are a very peculiar and wonderful people. They have a more extended and minute history than any other race of people on earth. There is a peculiarity in their history that is not known of any other people. They have a written history, both of the past and of the future, Moses wrote their future history from his time down to our day 1884, and all has been fulfilled precisely as it was written, and no one can gainsay or disprove it. But he does not stop here, he continues the history down to the close of the Gentile time, and onward to their restoration from their long captivity and return to the land of their fathers, to possess it forever.

This is very peculiar, and remarkable history, and we may look forward to the fulfillment of that which remains unfulfilled with the same assurance as that which has been.

There is an other peculiarity in this history that demands our notice. Moses told these that if they would not obey the Lord, they should be scattered among the nations, and become few in number, Deut. iv. 27. And again xxviii. 68. they should go back to Egypt again with ships, and should be offered as bondmen, and bondwomen, and none should buy them. And it is recorded in their history, 1 Kings xii, that ten of those tribes revolted against the kingdom of David, and set up a kingdom of their own in the land of Samaria and became a very wicked and rebellious people consequently the word caused them to be removed out of their land as captives by the King of Assyria, into the land of Helah and Habor by the river Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes, 2 Kings xviii. 11. And five nationalities took possession of their lands, their cities and their country. Some from Babylon, some from Cuthah, some from Ava, some from Hamath, and some from Sepharvaim; 2 Kings xvii. 24. Here all history leaves them. They have become lost to the world, but some seem to think they have mixed and mingled with the people of the nations and have lost their identity, and become extinct. But how can it be; the Lord says he knows where they are, or rather, he says, Mine eyes are upon all their ways. They are not hid from my face. Jer. xvi. 17. But the question: Where are they? Here I will venture to pen a few thoughts guided by the word and circumstances.

As Moses had told them, that if disobedient, they should go back to Egypt again, etc., we may rely upon it, that they did go back there, and that they were offered as bondmen, and bondwomen, etc., but they were so despised and hated by all nations, and especially by the Egyptians, that they would not permit them to remain among them, even as slaves. What could they do? They would not return, and they could not stay in Egypt. Their only alternative seems to have been, to take the river Nile and press their way up, up the river, and as they advanced on their journey, the Lord would shut them in behind, until they reached a place far into that vast wilderness beyond the reach of their enemies. There the Lord has hid them, and his eye has been upon them to protect them until he shall call them forth. The Lord says, My people hath been lost sheep, their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have turned them away on the mountain, they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting place, (the land of their father.) Jer l. 6. From beyond the river of Ethiopia, (the river Nile) my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed shall bring mine offerings. Zeph vii. 10. Why is it that that great country should remain an unexplored wild wilderness for so many hundred years, unless it was designed for a place of refuge for that people until the fulness of the Gentiles become in. Romans xi. 15.

But hark, The Lord is speaking by the Prophets saying: Therefore the days come saith the Lord, that it shall no more be said, the Lord liveth that brought the children of Israel up from the land of Egypt, But the Lord liveth that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the lands whither he had driven them, and will bring them again into their own land that I gave unto their fathers. Behold I will send for many fishers, saith the Lord, and they shall fish them, and after, I will send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them from every mountain and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks. Jer. xvi. 14-16.

Ask then, is not the Lord beginning to send fishers and hunters there? What is H. M. Stanley and others doing there? Let us not be surprised should there be some very important discoveries brought to light soon.

[illegible] shall he shake his hand over the river (Nile) and shall smite it in the seven streams and make men go over dry shod, and there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people which shall be left from Assyria, like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt. Isa. xi. 15-16. This to my mind is very conclusive, that the ten tribes are now in Africa, and that they will return with joy and singing, the same way they went mourning and sorrowing. They will pass over the seven streams of the river Nile, and also the tongue of the Egyptian Sea on dry land, the very place where the waters were divided for them when they came up out of Egypt by Moses. Also Judah and Benjamin, the two tribes will be gathered and restored to their native land, for the Lord says he will set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel (the ten tribes) and gather the dispersed of Judah (the two tribes) from the four corners of the earth. The envy also of Ephraim (the ten tribes) shall depart, and the adversaries of Judah (the two tribes) shall be cut off, Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim. Isa. xi. 12, 13.

This language is very plain, and need not be misunderstood, that the Lord will surely gather and restore the twelve tribes to their native land, the land of their fathers. And they will not only be restored, but they will be exalted to high honors, and loved and respected even as they have been hated, despised and oppressed. Hark, the Lord is speaking in trumpet tones by the prophets to this sinful and rebellious generation, Thus saith the Lord, Behold I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles and set up my standard to the people, and bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders, and kings shall be your nursing fathers and their queens thy nursing mothers. They shall bow down to thee with their faces towards the earth and lick up the dust of thy feet. Isa. xlix. 22, 23. And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations, and strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen, and your vine dressers, and ye shall be named the priests of the Lord men shall call you the ministers of our God, you shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves. Isa. lxi. 4-6. Behold at that time I will undo all that afflicted thee, and I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out; and I will get thee praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame. At this time will I bring you again even in the time that I gather you, for I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth when I bring back your captivity before your eyes saith the Lord. Zeph. iii. 19, 20. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, In those days it shall come to pass that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of all nations, even shall take hold of the skirts of him that is a Jew, saying, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. Zech. viii. 23.

And in that day the blessings of the Lord will follow them in all their ways in great abundance. he will send down showers of blessings upon them. For he says, And I will make them and the place round about my hill a blessing, and I will cause the showers to come down in his season. there shall be showers of blessings, and the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the Lord when I have broken the bands of their yoke and delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them. Ezek. xxxiv. 26, 27. Behold the days come saith the Lord that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed, and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt. Amos ix. 13.

O, how beautiful the language! how comprehensive! how very expressive of God's love and mercy to his faithful ones! But the above are but few of the predictions of the prophets in relation to that people, and all the faithful ones in the Lord that yet remain unfulfilled, but are as sure of becoming a reality as those predictions that related to the destruction of Jerusalem, and that people as a nation. And it is not wise for any one to put the day far in the distance, for the tribulations of those days are near at a close. The fig tree is beginning to put forth her tender leaves, Matt. xxiv. 29-32. But as we know not the day or the hour when these things shall be accomplished, let us all be very watchful, [illegible] shall not overtake [illegible] vessels empty, and our lamps gone out."

HISTORY AND THE BIBLE.

Nothing in our days is more wonderful, not even the colossal growth of natural science than the fresh start of history. Everywhere the structure of historic literature is rising anew on the basis of archæology, and even more than this: for as in the Church of St. Clement at Rome, deeper, more ancient, and hitherto unsuspected chambers have been brought to light, so the sagacious labors of antiquary and scholar have now recovered whole empires, such as the first kingdom of Chaldæa, and the primæval Elam, and a language, civilization, literature and polity fresh risen from the dust of four thousand years. We need not speak of Egypt, whose triumph has been already celebrated. Still Egypt is daily yielding fresh spoils; and in her records the germs even of European history are with keen delight recognized by the veterans of classic lore.

There is scarcely a study of more absorbing interest than is afforded by this new birth of history. It enlists students of many sciences, enrolling them in one guild, whose brethren learn at last duly to honor one another. In the cave geologist meets archæologist over the engraven mammoth-tusk. Hither comes the artist too, smitten with surprise at the genial freedom of some pristine Laudseer's sketch. Here the zoologist recognizes with delight the shaggy fell of fur and hair and the gigantic sweep of tusk, which authenticate at once the subject and the savage artist's fidelity.

Over the prisms and tablets of Babylonia stand men of science and of literature in equal rapture. Queen Victoria's astronomer catechizes the astronomer royal of King Sargina, contemporary probably with Abraham. The scholar of Oxford, forsaking awhile his Bodleian, revels in the archives of Kouyunjik. The veteran ethnologist of London devotes himself to the life-like statuary of earliest Egypt, epicanthic signs and the poet of the nineteenth century honors as he best may the "noble rage" of Pentaur, and pours with wonder over the descent of Ishtar into the "place of no return." The archæologist becomes the judge, and even the kind, soap of the exposed annalist of old time. The "father of plokaxes" avenges the quarrel of the "father of history;" Herodotus, Manetho, Berosus, even Livy, even Josephus, raise their honored brows amidst the dust of exploration with laurels greener than ever.

But this is not our chief point. There is one venerable collection of records, one "Bibliotheca," which professes divinely to make known the "purpose of the ages." It is either historical, or else, as men euphemistically say, "unhistorical;" which means falsidous.

How do these chronicles bear the collation with independent and authentic evidence now borne by contemporary records?

Was the old isolation of Scripture better or worse for its credibility? For better for worse it is now forever past, and must give way to a manifold twining with the web of human memorial. No longer do the royal personages of Holy Writ hold their way as in another world to our imagination. Their names, their cities, friends, enemies, alliances, conquests, captives, are read in hieroglyphic and in cuneiform. It was, after all, this very world in which they lived and died.

This former isolation of which I have spoken, this exclusion of Scripture history from almost all besides which we were learning under the epithet "profane," was a matter of secret cogitation to many minds. For our own part, every new link of true connection between Biblical and other history does not darken or desecrate the Bible, but lights and hallows that other. It is true enough, indeed, that we could not reasonably wish the inspired writers to have filled their scrolls with things more or less remote from the supreme purpose of God; but when in his beign providence these records fall into our hands, they waken up a thousand dormant questions, quicken a reverent curiosity, substantiate or else at once annihilate our dreamy conjectures, and make us feel as we read again the hallowed stories of Abraham, Joseph, David, or Daniel, how true the divine purpose ever was, not that his servants should be taken from the world, but kept from the evil, and safe "out of the earth" to those with whom they had to do.

The test of "internal coincidence" has been applied to the Old Testament with admirable sagacity and effect by the late Professor Blunt and others, [illegible] may well be thankful that this line of proof was enforced by the very essence of external testimony. It is the task of this day to recognize this external testimony, never seen by our fathers, but now given into our hands as fresh as it is ancient; much of it in the shape of actual parallel evidence. but far more in the scarcely less valuable form of "historical illustration," the material out of which the enlightened imagination represents the times and men that were of old; for the historian must be a seer before he can be a judge, and this historic divination (so to speak) is one of the highest achievements of literature.—From the Preface to Tompkins' "Times of Abraham."

TRAVELERS IN PALESTINE.

To attempt to give advice to such travelers may be offensive to some, and seem like presumption to others, while a few of those who intend to visit this country will be thankful for any hints of the kind. Having seen many hundreds of persons actually engaged in the work of "doing" Palestine, I do not wish without consideration experience of what travelers [illegible] need.

From long observation I am ready to give most travelers credit for earnestly desiring to secure all the advantages which ought to be derived from a visit to the Holy Land. There are, unfortunately, too many exceptions to this rule. People come here so utterly ignorant of the country, of its history and present condition, that one is led to wonder if they can have been brought up in a Christian land. Some persons come because it is the fashion to do so. They are residing in Europe perhaps, and cast about for something new or novel to occupy their attention, when it occurs to them to visit Palestine. They expect to find here grand hotels, brilliant saloons or billiard rooms on every co[rner] and theatres or places of amusement where they can pass their evenings in pleasure or dissipation. Imagine their surprise on arriving in Jerusalem. The hotels are small, being built of stone, the rooms are likewise small, often with low ceilings and poorly lighted, and in winter they are chilly, if not actually damp. Instead of there being hot and cold water in every room, there is, at times, scarcely water enough to drink, and all that is used for any purpose has to be brought from a distance in skins on the backs of men or animals and paid for.

[1.] As to places of amusements, why! everything shuts up at sunset and people go to bed. Even coffee shops seldom keep open after dark. As to promenades, streets and sidewalks, alas! there is not a sidewalk in Jerusalem, and the principal streets of the city are but ten to fifteen feet in width. They are not paved with concrete, flagstones, nor even with blocks of stone, but with the worst kind of cobble-stones. The streets are dirty, crooked and dark. They are full of camels, donkeys and people, and among the people sixty Jews, dressed in filthy, greasy clothing, outnumber all the rest.

Some people seem to think before coming here that they can travel about the country on railroads. I have heard persons say that they would not have come at all had they for once thought that there were no railroads here. Others suppose that there are fine carriage roads running all about Palestine. People in America see hear of a carriage road between Jaffa and Jerusalem but, after arriving there and in a wagon such as would be used only for the roughest farm work at home, on this road which is fit only for ox carts and strong carts, being bumped until they are bruised and lame in every muscle, they discover that the words "carriage" and "carriage roads" have a different meaning in Palestine from what they have in America. This road could easily be made as fine as any road in any country, and would be so made were it not under the control of the Turks.

Why cannot persons who propose to come here ask themselves what they are coming for? Why not read at least one good book about the country and, as they do so, use a good map? Why not learn beforehand how the land is bounded, what are its principal rivers, lakes and cities? and especially, why not read some work upon Jerusalem, to learn whether the streets are paved with gold, if the houses are six and eight stories high, if there are elevators in private houses and hotels, if Jerusalem is a flat place or quite hilly, and if Hebrew is still the language of the country? A little pains of this kind would "from many a blunder free them" not only, but would save them from making themselves ridiculous. One's own comfort and convenience would seem to demand that he learn beforehand something of what he has a right to expect in the country which he proposes to visit. A boasting, pleasure-seeking [illegible] ignoramus, who brings an entire party of respectable tourists into disrepute, is not the only person aimed at in these severe remarks. Christian people from America, and among the number must be included some ministers, come to Palestine with as little previous knowledge of the land where Christ lived, and where the Bible had its origin, as they have of any region of equal size in the heart of Siberia or China. These things ought not so to be.

After this advice to obtain some previous knowledge of the country, I will specify a few important requisites under the following heads:

MONEY. You need money of course, but not any more than is necessary for the journey. You do not need jewelry or valuables of any kind. Ladies frequently bring with them and wear altogether too much jewelry. This is simply placing temptation before thieves and increasing the person's chances of being robbed. If you must bring them to this country you should leave them in care of your banker consul here especially while you are traveling about.

CLOTHING. Substantial clothing is needed and one ought to have an extra suit in case of accidents, getting wet and the like. Black clothes are not very suitable in this hot climate, nor should the color be too light. One needs plenty of under-clothing and stockings, and the under-clothing should by all means be woolen, even if one has not been accustomed to wear it at home. You are coming to a hot country to be sure, but even here the main thing in the preservation of health is to keep warm and dry. A clergyman's extra suit might be one in which he can "officiate"—at weddings, if called upon, for pairs of intense lovers sometimes visit the Holy Land.

BOOKS. You need a few good ones. A Bible and a small Bible dictionary if possible. If several friends go in a party one can take certain books and another certain others, and thus quite a number of valuable books will be at your command. As to a guide book, you need one of your own for even two friends cannot as children used to do in the district schools, "look over" one book.

TRUNKS AND CARPET-BAGS. A small, long trunk is the best shape. If you must take one. A rather long portmanteau is convenient. Still any shape will answer. Whatever bag you take will likely be bruised or rubbed [illegible] If you are at all part[icular] about such things you should bring your old one. By all means make some provision for spare room in your carpet-bag for the "things" which you will certainly want to purchase for your friends at home. For one's own convenience the rule is, as little "luggage" as possible.

MEDICINES. You need a few simple remedies. A small bottle of camphor to keep off mosquitoes as well as for other purposes. Another of alcohol or, what is better, of strong arnica for sprains or bruises. An ounce of ammonia for flea bites. Another of quinine or of some preparation of arsenic for fever. Also some really good preparation for diarrhœa.

PASSPORT. It is best to have one. You may never be asked for it, but you should remember that you are not in your own land, and the emergency may arise when you will sadly need it. Turkey is at present so low as to be about insurgences, and you might be taken for a Russian Jew and not allowed to land. You would then have to appeal to your consul and to the government and after much red tape, besides trouble and mortification to yourself, you could be released.

LETTERS OF INTRODUCTION. These are seldom necessary. If one has them he may not have time to present them, and if he does so they may prove a source of embarrassment instead of being of much service. One comes here to see sights and to form acquaintances. If one is to remain some time in one place where he expects to require special assistance, such letters may be very useful.

PISTOLS. Do not burden yourself with one. If you should get into a fight with Arabs it would be worse than useless. At night, if you use it, you are far more likely to do irreparable injury to your friends than to any [illegible] Outside of war it is possible that pistols have done much more harm in the world than good.

One needs a good pair of eyes, a good pair of ears, a great deal of patience and forbearance, an unselfish spirit, and considerable power of holding one's tongue. It need not be said that if one is blessed with robust health it is all the better. Do not bring theories and try to confirm them. A simple faith in the Bible and a disposition to see, hear and learn as much as possible about the land and the people will be the most sensible thing of all.

By all means, do not bring any new kind of religion. There are enough kinds here already, among which are dreamers, prognosticators from the stars, "overcomers," spiritualists, seekers for the lost Tribes, believers in the immediate restoration of the Jews, discoverers of the art of never dying, those who believe that salvation can be secured only by keeping the seventh day, advocates of the immediate and personal coming of Christ, founders of the New Jerusalem, and still others, so that the number and variety of people who are "crazy" on religious subjects who congregate in Jerusalem is surprisingly great. Most of the Christian nations, including America, are represented in these different classes.

Jerusalem is in some respects the most interesting place on the globe, hence it is not to be wondered at that people from all lands desire to visit it. The intelligent traveler will find here many intelligent people, excellent schools, churches, some [illegible] but valuable libraries, and a good number of laborers who are seeking to elevate the masses—Mohammedans, Jews and [illegible] Christians—from their present [illegible] of ignorance superstition and [illegible] Condition. ## Miscellaneous.

A remarkable occurrence has taken place in the Rhondda Valley, scene of the mountain sides and tops being carpeted with the bodies of insects, rather larger than, but resembling, caterpillars. The inhabitants are removing them by burning. Specimens have been sent to University College, London, for examination.

As a number of young children were playing in a field at Crosby one of them met with a singular and shocking accident. The little ones, it would seem, commenced to irritate an ass which was grazing in a field, when the animal turned upon one of them, and, seizing it with its teeth, stripped the flesh from the wrist to the shoulder.

DESTRUCTIVE HAILSTORM.

A telegram from Valence in the Department of Gers, states that the neighboring country has been devastated by a terrible storm of hail. In several places the crops are entirely destroyed. The despatch adds—"A layer of hailstones 25 centimetres deep (nearly 10 inches) covers the ground, the vines and wheat are cut to pieces, the trees are bared of their leaves, and birds fell to the ground killed by the hail. All the houses are inundated, the hail having immediately choked the pipes. In the Ardeche the hail caused immense damage. At St. Georges, Beauchastel, Lavoult, and St. Laurent du Pape the vines have been utterly destroyed."

SHOCKING DEATH FROM THE BITE OF A MAN.

At Brecknock, on Saturday, an inquest was held on the body of a man named Richard Flood, a fisherman. It appeared that on the 31st of January a member of the Mersington fishermen subscribed the price of a half-barrel of porter, which was procured, and a social drink or debauchery ensued. Fighting arose and a man named Nicholas Murphy (at present in custody, got drunk and quarrelled. They had a fight, which was provoked by the deceased in the course of which [illegible] knocked down and bitten in the face by Murphy. The wound was not immediately attended to, but when it was it apparently healed up. However, the fiction and heat of the blood therein in a short time caused [illegible] to loosen, drop away, and leaving the muscles of the throat and chest quite bare. He was attended by Dr. George de La Hyde and E. J. Murtagh, who gave evidence that his death was from blood poisoning. The [illegible] deep sloughs of the deceased were examined, in which he stated that Nicholas Murphy bit him in the face during a row. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that death resulted from blood poisoning, the result of a wound inflicted on deceased by Nicholas Murphy, now in custody for the offence on the night of January 31, at Mornington, county Meath."—Dublin Express.

THE CIRCULATION OF "THE TIMES."

The editor of the Printer's Register furnishes the following statistics concerning the issue of the Times of Saturday last. It consisted of three sheets, or 24 pages, each page comprising six columns; 84 2-3rds of the 144 columns were filled with advertisements, the number of which was no less than 2,550; the remaining 59 1-3rd columns contained articles, reviews, letters, reports, and paragraphs on over 200 distinct topics. The total length of the columns was 264 feet, and if placed end to end and stood upright they would have reached to a height exceeding that of the monument by 62 feet. If the matter comprised in the paper, instead of being broken up into columns, had been set in one continuous line it would have reached 1 mile 930 yards, or the distance from Charing Cross to Chesapside. The number of separates types used in printing this issue is calculated at over two millions, and the quantity of printed matter is reckoned to be equivalent to that contained in two ordinary octavo volumes of 480 pages each. A circumstance worth noting by those who insist that the present law prohibits the transfer of land is the fact that over 37 columns of the paper were occupied by advertisements of landed property for sale by auction, there being in addition eight columns of advertisements of estates and houses to be let or sold by private contract.

ARE YOU READY.

LUCY M. FOX.

The footstep of our Lord is at the door!
Are you ready?
Soon the angels will proclaim Time no more.
Are you ready?
Hear the raging waves of ocean,
Earthquakes, whirlwinds, war's commotion,
Signs in stars and skies and sun,
Signs the race is almost run,—
Are you ready?

The footstep of our Lord is at the door,
Are you ready?
He has called you o'er and o'er,
Are you ready?
[illegible] said when the mountains [illegible]
And [illegible] beasts [illegible] with the [illegible]
And the sea, he is no more—
Are you ready?

Oh, the souls [illegible]
Are you ready?
So [illegible]
Are you ready?
One [illegible]
Now [illegible]
But we will not be [illegible]—
Are you ready?

O my Savior! he is near—
Are you ready?
Hear the marching [illegible]
Are you ready?
All the [illegible]
[illegible]
He is near—almost here,
Are you ready?

The footstep of our Judge is at the door,
He is ready!
Do not wait a moment more
But be ready!
Can you face that pleading eye?
Must He wait—He past you by?
Turn him now—the end is nigh!
Are you ready?

THE BIBLE AND THE MONUMENTS.

If there were heroes before Agamemnon, the world of Greece had lost all record of them. They were quite forgotten, or had been lifted into a pantheon of mythical demigods. If there were books before the Old Testament, they had been buried, lost, forgotten. With the exception of one or two of the latter prophets, the Old Testament antedated all written history known at the beginning of the present century. Its assertions could be confirmed by no contemporary documents. For vast periods, and not for Israel alone, but for kingdoms and mighty empires which fell before Greece developed a written literature, it was the only record that could claim authority. What the Greeks knew of the history of Egypt and Assyria and Babylonia they credulously gathered as they could centuries after.

Standing thus alone, the Old Testament history was unconfirmed. There was nothing with which to confirm it except the muddled accounts of two or three blundering late Greek story-tellers, who were quite as likely to contradict as to tell the truth. The critics had it all their own way. They could deny what they pleased. They could say that this story was inherently improbable, that that was contradicted by Xenophon or Syncellus, and praise the Greek or disparage the Hebrew writers; and no positive and conclusive reply was possible.

But the last half-century has changed all this. Fifty years ago Egypt began to open the contemporaneous monuments of her kings.

Thirty years ago the capitals of the Tigris and Euphrates valleys were discovered, and their language unlocked. Long historical inscriptions — a few from Egypt, but multitudes from Assyria—have been discovered, written in the life-time and by the direct orders of the kings whose deeds they record; contemporary annals, whose historical trustworthiness is beyond question, except as we must make allowance for that boastful temper which would change a defeat into a victory. Fifty years ago critics doubted if such a king as the Sargon, mentioned once in the Bible, ever lived. Now we know the history of the whole dynasty of the Sargonidæ, and have Sargon's own full record of where his armies fought during each successive year of his reign. That record can be trusted. Sargon himself, or his own official historian, tells the story; and the same is true of the Assyrian kings.

My object in this article is to give a few examples, showing how the monuments confirm Bible history. I purposely omit matters of cosmogony, and what comes before the history of nations, which, though abundantly illustrated by the mythic poetry of old Babylon, cannot, in the nature of the case, be historically confirmed. There is space to mention but a few out of scores of confirmations which would each bear much fuller treatment than can be given them here.

It is not many years ago that it was stoutly objected that Moses could not have written a Book of the Law or the Ten Commandments, because writing was not then invented. But not only is it now abundantly proved that Egyptian hieroglyphic and Assyrian syllabic writing were familiarly known long before the time of Moses or even of Abraham, but within the past twenty years the history of Phœnician writing used by the Hebrews has been carefully studied; and it is now the general conclusion of the best scholars that it originated during the time of the conquest of Egypt by the Shepherd Kings four or five centuries before Moses. The last student of the subject, Mr. Isaac Taylor, in a volume published the last half of the present year, 1883, thus sums up the result of long and careful investigation:

"The possible date of the origin of the alphabet is thus brought within definite limits. . . . The possible limits lie between the twenty-third and seventeenth centuries, and there seems to be no reason why we should not provisionally accept the approximate date which has been proposed by De Rouge, and place it in or about the nineteenth century B. C." This objection is swept away.

It had seemed strange that in the tenth chapter of Genesis, it should be represented in one verse that the people of Babylonia were descendants of Ham, through Nimrod; and in another, that they came from Shem, through Asshur. The inscriptions gathered into the British Museum now fully prove that two races occupied that country from a very early time? one pure Shemitic, and the other a darker, non-Shemetic race, older than the former, and having an entirely different language and physiognomy, being of what the Bible calls "the sons of Ham." This difficulty is fully met.

It seemed, a few years ago, an almost incredible story told in Genesis of the campaign of the four kings of Elam and Babylonia, and Chedorlaomer, Arioch, Amraphel, and Tidal, against the five kings of Sodom and the plain. The monuments confirm the story wonderfully. They tell us that at just this time there had been an Elamite (or Median) conquest of Babylonia; they tell us that Laomer was the name of an Elamite god so that Chedorlaomer means worshiper of Laomer; and we find an account of this very Arioch mentioned on the monuments as king of Ellazzar, and we learn that his father's name was Chedormabug, and his grandfather's name Simtisilhak. And we further learn that even earlier than this there had been Babylonian expeditions to the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. Every difficulty is completely removed and confirmation supplied.

Abraham, we are told in the Scriptures, came from Ur of the Chaldees. Such a town had become utterly lost, except in this Biblical mention of it, and a pious tradition had put it in an impossible place. The present generation has re-discovered it and reads its records on the monuments. We find it was the second capital of Babylonia, and was distinguished for the Moon-god. The names could be mentioned of half a dozen of its kings, one of whom was Chedorcmabug, father of the Arioch of the Bible. Two seals, worn by gentlemen of Ur before the time of Abraham, and bearing the names of the two first kings, are in the British Museum. The Bible geography is proved no fiction.

Passing now, with the course of the Hebrew history, from Mesopotamia to Egypt, in the time of the Oppression, we find on the Egyptian monuments no record of Bible miracles: that was not to be expected; kings do not report their disasters. But the whole color of the Genesis story agrees admirably with that of Egypt at this time, and Egyptian scholars speak of it with wonder. We find pictures and accounts of slaves with Hebrew features, and working at brick-making as the Hebrews worked. We know just who was the king of the Oppression, this great Rameses II., whose body was found last year, and is now shown to the traveler in the Bulak Museum. Only lately has any systematic exploration been made in the region where the Hebrews lived. During the present year an expedition was sent from England to search for records of this region; and the first thing done was to discover Pithom, one of the two store cities which the Bible tells us the children of Israel built. The city was previously unknown, but it was found bearing the name of Pithom on an inscription, and the chief buildings were great brick store-houses, without windows or doors, in which grain was to be preserved for use in war or famine. But the Egyptians had no historical talent. They had left us much to illustrate habits and customs, and only clues to their history. Their annals fail us; but their pictures and stories and pious books are full of helps and of illustrations bearing on the Bible accounts of the land and people of the Nile.

The Bible tells us of a strong Israelite kingdom established by David, or extended by him and his son Solomon to the very banks of Euphrates. But is this credible? What was the mighty empire of Assyria doing all this time? The monuments have answered the question. At just this time the Assyrian empire had suffered a great decline. It was scarcely able to hold its own cities, much less to make any foreign wars. Room was then made for the new Israelite kingdom. But soon after Solomon's death a great king arose in Nineveh, Assur-nazirpal, who unified the Assyrian kingdom and conquered his neighbors, though he did not send his armies as far as Palestine. But his son Shamaneser tells us, in his own monuments, how he fought with the very kings mentioned in the Bible. He says that in his sixth year he fought against Ben-hadad, king of Damascus, and that Ahab, king of Israel, sent two thousand chariots and ten thousand infantry to help Ben-hadad. He says that twelve years later he again attacked the king of Damascus, who was now Hazael, and who was helped by Jehu, son of Omri. Here Hazael succeeds Ben-hadad, and Jehu succeeds Ahab, precisely as the Old Testament tells us, although Shalmaneser made an error as to Jehu's parentage. Omri was not his father, but the founder of Ahab's dynasty.

From this time nearly every king of Israel and Judah is mentioned in the annals of the Assyrian kings. One of these is Hezekiah. Sennacherib's own story adds much of interest. The Bible account: The Bible says that Sennacherib was at Lachish while Jerusalem was invested. We have an actual picture preserved, made by order of the Assyrian king, of his victory at Lachish. He does not claim to have captured Jerusalem, but only that he received tribute. The Bible says that Hezekiah gave him thirty talents of gold and three hundred talents of silver. Sennacherib, in his own account, says it was thirty talents of gold and eight hundred of silver. But there were two sorts of silver talents, a large talent and a small talent; and eight hundred of one just equals three hundred of the other, so that the two accounts tally to a shekel.

In two cases in the Bible story of the kings, it has seemed like a plain mistake that Babylon is mentioned instead of Nineveh. How could Hezekiah have sent ambassadors with presents to Merodach-baladan, king at Babylon, while Nineveh was the capital? The monuments solve the riddle. They tell the whole story of the revolt of Merodach-baladan at Babylon against the king [illegible]. The embassy sent to the rebel was a great political blunder, and Isaiah was right in rebuking it. The other case of difficulty is where the Bible tells us that Manasseh was taken captive by the king of Assyria and carried to Babylon. The annals of Esar-haddon are very imperfect, but they mention Manasseh as a tributary king, and we learn from them that he (Esar-haddon) was the only king of Assyria who held his court at Babylon. The Bible is confirmed on both these points.

Before passing from the monuments of Assyria to those of Babylon, we may recall briefly the now well-known Moabite stone, with its remarkable confirmation of the Bible story. The Bible tells us that, after the death of Ahab and the secession of Jehoram, Mesha, king of Moab, rebelled. There was discovered, ten years ago, in Dibon, the capital of Moab, in stone columns, on which this very Mesha, otherwise unknown, had given an account, engraved nearly nine hundred years before Christ, of the success of his rebellion. In a long story, which reads like a chapter of the Bible, he tells of his victories and how he captured the cities of Israel by the help of his god, Chemosh.

The scene of the stories of the book of Daniel is laid in Babylon during the time of the later empire, which had its seat there. No book has been so severely assailed by destructive criticism. Those who reject it agree in assigning its date to a very late period—that of Antiochus Epiphanes, about two centuries before Christ. It was almost impossible, until within a few years, to make any conclusive reply to these critics, especially as the book of Daniel has reached us with what is probably not a very pure text. It is written in two different languages, of which one, the Chaldee, is perhaps a translation of an original lost Hebrew. Very likely we owe to this late translator the Greek names, which cannot be denied, of the musical instruments. But what is of vastly more importance than the verbal alterations or errors of translation or transcription, the monuments prove to us conclusively that the whole color and atmosphere of the historic chapters of Daniel are genuine Babylonian. Such a book could not have been written three or four hundred years later, when the civilization of Babylon had perished. There was no antiquarian learning of the day which could have drawn a true picture of the Babylonian empire at a period so far removed from that of Antiochus, as we are from that of Luther, and separated from it by the overthrow of the Babylonian by the Persian power, or the overthrow of the Persian in its turn by the alien Greek. One only needs to compare Daniel with the apocryphal book of Judith—one true to the life of the Babylonian empire and the other utterly false to it—to discover the contrast between an authentic account and the pious novelette full of historical absurdities and incongruities, whose scene is laid in a previous age.

The chief of all the objections to the book of Daniel is that it says that the last king of Babylon was Belshazzar, and that he was killed at the capture of the city. But all Greek traditions agree that the last king of Babylon was Nabonidus, and that he was not killed. Indeed, he was not in Babylon at all when it was captured, but with the army in Borsippa, and lived for some time after. Greek historians mention no Belshazzar. The contradiction was absolute, and could not be explained. But the inscriptions have now been recovered, and give us abundant proof that both are right. They tell us that there was a King Belshazzar as well as a King Nabonidus. He was a Son of Nabonidus, and was for three years associated with his father on his throne. There is extant a prayer of Nabonidus, in which he beseeches the gods to bless his son Belshazzar. We are told on inscriptions very lately discovered, that in previous years Nabonidus had remained at home, and sent his son Belshazzar to command the army in the field, but that in this last year he took the army himself, and left his son in command at Babylon. And this explains another curious fact. There have been found the records, thousands of them, on little clay tablets, kept for over a century in the office of the recorder of deeds in Babylon. Out of one hundred and sixteen years, there is not one lacking in which from one to thirty deeds have not been found recorded, all dated. We find one, just one, dated in the third year of King Belshazzar. His two first years are credited to his father, with whom he reigned, while in this third year he was in Babylon alone. And the third year of Belshazzar is the highest one mentioned in Daniel. We can now understand why Belshazzar promised to make Daniel the "third ruler in the kingdom." He could not make him the second, as his was only second himself. The difficulty is more than removed.

We are told in Daniel that Babylon was captured on the night of a great feast to the idol gods, at which the wives and concubines joined in wild revelry. But the woman were not in the habit of feasting with men. How is this? An account, by Cyrus himself, of his capture of Babylon, was dug up only three or four years ago. In it he declares that Babylon was captured "without fighting," on the fourteenth day of the month Tammuz. Now the month of Tammuz was named in honor of the god Tammuz, the Babylonian Adonis, who married their Venus or Ishtar; and the fourteenth of Tammuz was the regular time to celebrate their union with lascivious orgies. On this day, of all others, the women took part in the horrible rites: and it was in this feast of kings, princes, wives, and concubines, that Babylon was taken and Belshazzar slain. The Bible is here fully and wonderfully corroborated. How could a writer three hundred and fifty years later know all this?

These are but specimens, selected from many, of the abundant and constant corroboration which the monuments give to the historical accounts of the Bible. I do not mean to say that they have yet solved all difficulties, nor that they have not raised any difficulties of their own. But the difficulties that remain are chiefly chronological or verbal, like the dates in a king's reign; or the apparent substitution of 'Darius,' for Uebyzes, and of "Ahasuerus" (Xerxes) for Artaxerxes in Daniel. Such errors are liable to occur, and need give us no concern. The essential part is proved beyond cavil that the historical parts of the Old Testament are proved by contemporaneous records just dug up and translated in our generation to be substantially true. We find no record of miracles, and we should expect none; for they belong to Hebrew history or private life. Nor do we find confirmation, only illustration, of the Bible account of the Creation and the Deluge. The old Babylonian tales of these beginnings of things, as I have said, antedating history, are of the highest interest to the Bible student, but are quite apart from my present purpose, which is satisfied with the plain annals of kings, without entering the mythology of these old nations whose gross polytheism is the most instructive contrast to the pure monotheism of the Hebrews, which, more emphatically even in its cosmogony than in its history, offers to human worship only one God, Creator and Preserver of all things, one God, holy and merciful—such a God as our nineteenth century culture need not be ashamed to worship as he was worshipped by Moses and Abraham.—Wm. Hayes Ward, D. D., in S. S. Times.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

Our subject is the character and end of the age—this age in which we live. We are, I dare say, familiar with the statements made by those who write the history or chronicle the events of modern times, to the effect that we live in the age of progress. Comparisons are often made between the present time and times that are passed, greatly to the advantage of the former. It is pointed out how, by means of education and the development of commerce and art and science, we are in far better circumstances than our forefathers were. And this is made the ground of expectation for the future.

Many of these statements, having regard as they have to secular things, we in no way wish to deny or call in question. But secular progress is in no wise identical with spiritual progress; and when Christian men speak as if the progress of this age were an upward progress, culminating in a world-wide triumph of Christianity and the establishment of universal peace and brotherhood, we are obliged to demur and to point out how contrary is the teaching of God's Word.

First in 2 Tim. iii. we read words pointing out what shall be in the last days, clearly setting before us what our age is developing into. Its development is not in an an upward direction, or toward universal conversion, but on the contrary toward the practice of daring sins. These dooling sins will be associated with a form of godliness. There will be profession of God, but practical denial. And the consequent character of the last days will be perilous. God, whose eye surveys all the future, sees and tells us what our age is advancing to.

But further we find Peter in his Second Epistle writing that there shall come in the last days scoffers; unto this, then, our age is going on. We are not advancing to days of universal conversion, but to

for the Word of God. The scoffing will be on the part of those who have heard and who know that Word, and who are acquainted with its teaching on the subject of the second coming of Christ. Such scoffing is quite compatible with great advances in science. Indeed, in these days, science is not infrequently marked by disregard, for what God has said. Theories are started and maintained as if they were proved facts—theories which treat with disdain the historic authority of God's Word. Whatever attempts are made to show the reconciliation between revealed religion and science (and let us not undervalue these) yet, none the less really, will the last days be days of scoffing.

Men will walk after their own lusts, saying, where is the promise of his coming? They will walk in wilfulness. They will be a law to themselves, and will put aside the will of God. Liberty will become lawlessness; and scepticism as to the definitely foretold fact of the coming of Christ flaunt itself.

Nor will the scornful scepticism of the coming be without some little show of reasonableness. Century after century passes, and all things continue as they were. There is no appearance or likelihood, they say, of anything supernatural. But they "wilfully forget" (2 Peter iii. 5, R. V.) that by the Word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth. They ignore the creative fiat of the Almighty, and they deny the very possibility of creation.

Our day, with its teaching of evolution of 'Darius,' for Uebyzes, and of "Ahasuerus" (Xerxes) for Artaxerxes in Daniel. Such errors are liable to occur, and need give us no concern. The essential part is proved beyond cavil that the historical parts of the Old Testament are proved by contemporaneous records just dug up and translated in our generation to be substantially true. We find no record of miracles, and we should expect none; for they belong to Hebrew history or private life. Nor do we find confirmation, only illustration, of the Bible account of the Creation and the Deluge. The old Babylonian tales of these beginnings of things, as I have said, antedating history, are of the highest interest to the Bible student, but are quite apart from my present purpose, which is satisfied with the plain annals of kings, without entering the mythology of these old nations whose gross polytheism is the most instructive contrast to the pure monotheism of the Hebrews, which, more emphatically even in its cosmogony than in its history, offers to human worship only one God, Creator and Preserver of all things, one God, holy and merciful—such a God as our nineteenth century culture need not be ashamed to worship as he was worshipped by Moses and Abraham.—*Wm. They ignore the creative fiat of the Almighty, and they deny the very possibility of creation.

Our day, with its teaching of evolution, has connected itself with "the last days."

THE DAYS OF SCOFFING.

That God made everything, "after its kind," his Word affirms, has been denied, and even professing Christian teachers have been carried away in numbers by the evil current. It would almost seem as if in certain cases one would be esteemed to have forfeited his scientific, if not even his intellectual, reputation if he upheld the Scriptural doctrine.

But we take a further step. Paul, when writing to the Thessalonians in his Second Epistle, tells us that before the day of the Lord comes the great apostasy will take place. Our age, then, is going on to apostasy, excelling all apostasy that has been known. There have been departures from Christ in different ages, but here we have the grand departure, a departure culminating in the manifestation of him who is called the man of sin.

Notwithstanding all progress in secular things, in science, and in art, there remains and grows rebellion against God. The days before the flood were days of progress in arts (Gen. iv. 21, 22), and days of renown (Gen. vi. 4), but with this secular progress the imagination of men's hearts was evil continually, and the race became spiritually and morally utterly corrupt. And the present days have a likeness to the days before the flood. With all the glorious increase to the number of Christ's disciples through times of refreshing, yet so far from the world getting converted the world is in many cases converting and corrupting the church. And we are going on to days when multitudes will depart from the profession of Christ to the denial of him. The apostasy will take place.

What a fearful issue this is! What a solemn and awful ending of our age, with all its boasted civilization, and refinement, and culture, and sciences, and liberty! As we have seen, the age is advancing to the denial of godliness (though the form of godliness be held), to the scoffing at or denial of the word, and finally to the denial of God himself and his only begotten Son. Then shall come to pass what Isaiah foretold would come to pass previous to the glory of the Lord rising on Jerusalem, "Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people." Isa. lx. 1, 2. When God and his Son are denied, it is as if the sun of the firmament were blotted out and the true light gone. How very different this from the thoughts of many that commerce, education, and art, united with the preaching of the gospel, will usher in the millennium!

When our age reaches the fearful crisis that is foretold, then the Lord Jesus Christ must interpose in administrative and punitive power. When man became wholly corrupt before the flood the Lord interposed in righteous judgment, and when the world becomes again mature in corruption, again there will be interposition in righteous judgment. The revelation of the Lord Jesus, to which his own people expectantly look, will be to others a coming of judgment, as was the flood, or as the fire and brimstone which came on Sodom.

In the days of Noah men were living in scepticism of the fact of coming judgment. This is what is suggested by "eating and drinking, marrying and [illegible]" Of Sunday, conditional Immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

DIED.

June 14, 1884, at her late residence in Haskins, Wood Co., Ohio, sister Loretta, wife of Brother J. A. Wilson.

Her illness was of short duration. She was immersed into Christ in the month of June, 1882, by the writer, since which time her life has been characterized by good works. One in the village remarked that "The sick in Haskins have lost their best friend." Her mind remained unclouded until within a few moments of her death. She conversed freely with her family, telling them of her unfailing trust in God and his promises, exhorting them to so live that they might meet her in the kingdom "when the Master comes." She left her companion and two children, who, with a large circle of friends, mourn her loss. The writer spoke the words of comfort at her funeral on the 16th, to a large and intelligent audience. The text chosen for the occasion was the consolation from the pen of David, "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

L. C. CHASE.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Bland and Heller's Block, Room 21, 276½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—BY L. O. THOMAS.—

The above named work is now ready for delivery. It contains 350 pages, 12 mo., on good paper, substantially bound in cloth. Price $1.

Title Page.—"The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional Immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

"I HAVE CHRIST! WHAT WANT I MORE?"

"Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift." 2 Cor. ix. 15.

In the heart of London city,
Mid the dwellings of the poor,
There bright golden words were uttered—
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

By a dying woman.

Strains of music from a Parlor Door
Having too one earthly theme—
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

He who heard them ran to fetch her
Something from the world's great store:
It was needless—died she saying,
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

But her words will live forever:
I repeat them over and over
God delights to hear me saying,
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

O ye that, my fellow sinners!
High and low, and rich and poor,
Can you say with deep thanksgiving,
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

Look away from earth's attractions:
All earth's joys will soon be o'er:
Rest not till each heart can whisper,
"I have Christ! what want I more?"

Communications

Genealogy and Paternity of Jesus. Not Begotten by Joseph.

Editor Restitution:

In my communication which appeared in your issue of April 23, I said we find Mary "to be a descendant of Abraham through David and Solomon."

In your issue of May 21, I notice a short letter from Thomas Churchill of Toronto, Ont., a highly respected friend of mine, to the effect that my communication needed "a slight but very important correction," and proceeds as follows: "True Mary was a descendant of Abraham and David but not through Solomon," referring to 1 Chron. xiv. 4. He further says: "If Jesus came through the lines of David and Solomon, it would give some countenance to the idea held by many that Jesus was the Son of Joseph, and thus leave us without a Savior to the present hour." Yes, I agree with him on this point, that if Jesus was begotten by Joseph, we are without a Savior—without the promised Messiah.

But what he can mean by the remark that if Jesus came through David and Solomon, it would give some countenance to the idea that Jo[illegible] the son of Joseph, I cannot conceive. I am greatly surprised at such a remark. I see that he does not understand this matter. I am also much surprised at many things that have been said and written by others of late regarding the pedigree and paternity of Jesus.

But most of all am I surprised and astonished, that any person who professes to believe in God, to believe his word, to believe in Christ, can possibly hold that Joseph was the natural father of Jesus—that Jesus was begotten by Joseph!

As to the lineal descent of Jesus from Abraham and David through Solomon, it is very easy to see, even by the genealogy alone, as given by Matthew and Luke. It is easy to see that the pedigree of both Joseph and Mary, is traced by both Matthew and Luke, directly through Zorobabel son of Salathiel, who was a descendant from Solomon by his father, and from Nathan by his mother. Matt. i. 6, 12. Luke iii. 27–31.

It is true, when we come to examine the entire lines of pedigree, as I have done most carefully and thoroughly; we find many difficulties and apparent discrepancies, to contend with and overcome; as all persons experience in the thorough examination and investigation of any other biblical truth. Under such circumstances some become discouraged and back out at once. Others misapprehend and fail to find the truth. I have no doubt that these apparent discrepancies in the genealogy of Jesus, as well as all others in the Scriptures, are only seeming to be such, because of the lack of thorough investigation, and because of our weak finite minds; but that they are really such; and that they have been wisely permitted by the Author of the Bible, to serve good and wise ends, in connection with his great purposes. If this be the case, then these difficulties, as has been wisely said, were intentional on the part of the Divine Author of the Scriptures. They serve a variety of important ends which could hardly have been accomplished by any other means. In the first place they operate judicially upon those who lack moral appreciation and earnestness. Then they furnish valuable disproof of collusion on the part of the sacred writers, and establish their character as independent witnesses to the things whereof they testify. The inspired narratives exhibit substantial agreement with circumstantial variation.

This is precisely what account of Jesus requires in respect of the testimony of witnesses. Should their evidence agree precisely, in every word and syllable, this fact would be held by the acute proof of conspiracy. Moreover these difficulties tend to brace up the intellect, and keep it astir in divine directions. "Things hard to be understood" are rightly said to present special attractions to inquiring minds. "It is the characteristic of truth to be sometimes apparently inconsistent, while falsehood carefully strives to preserve the appearance of consistency.

In considering the genealogy of Jesus, the following must be borne in mind. 1. Names in the New Testament are spelled differently from the same names in the old. 2. Some names are spelled differently in different places in the Old Testament.

Instance. Salathiel, 1 Chron. iii. 17. Matt. i. 12. is called Shaltiel, in Ezra v. 2, and in other places.

3. It is evident that some names in the genealogical line were intentionally omitted in some places. See Matt. i. 11, margin.

4. A person is frequently called the son of another, when he is the grandson, or even a lower descendant—son in many places meaning simply descendant—[illegible] son sometimes meaning son-in-law and father sometimes meaning father-in-law. Hence Laban is called the son of Nahor, because he was his grandson. Gen. xxix. 4. It is on the principle that Christ is called the son of David.

There are many instances where the children male and female, are called the children of their father's brother. "Moses said if a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother" Matt. xxii. 24. Deut. xxv. 5.

6. Some persons had two names and were sometimes called by one and sometimes by the other. Instance, John Mark, Acts xii. 12 and xiii. 5, 13 and Simon Peter, also called Cephas. Solomon also had two names. 2 Sam. xii. 23–25. The two sons of Zorobabel—Abiud and Rhesa—in Matt and Luke, are not found called by those names in the genealogical line of 1 Chron. See also 2 Sam. xvii. 25.—margin; and many other similar cases.

7. While genealogy was generally reckoned by the male line, yet under certain circumstances, where there were special reasons, it was reckoned [illegible] Thus in the lines of Judah, a house is recognized as "the children of Shesham," although it is expressly said that "Sheshan had no sons." 1 Chron. ii. 31–34. Again in the same tribe, Jair the son of Segub and grandson of Hezron by his own son, is called the son of Manasseh, evidently because Hezron's wife was a grand-daughter of Manasseh. Num. xxxii. 41, xxxix. 40. xxvii. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 5, 21, 22. Also after the Babylonish captivity, it is said that one of the priests "took a wife of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite and was called after their name." Ezra ii. 61. There are other cases of a similar kind, but these I deem sufficient.

In the further investigation of the pedigree and paternity of Jesus, permit me to say, that unless we can show that Jesus is the "seed" or son of David through Solomon—a blood descendant of Solomon according to the covenant, 2 Sam. vii. 12–16, and Acts ii. 30, we fail to show him to be the Royal heir to the throne and kingdom of David. But as before said, it is easily done. We find that Jeconias who descended from Solomon married Susannah the daughter of Neri, who descended from Nathan, David's older son, so that in Salathiel their son, the two lines of descent were united. Thus Salathiel was the grandson of Neri, as in Luke iii. 27, where Jeconias the father of Salathiel as in Matt. i. 12, is left out. Then in Zorobabel (which means, born at Babylon) the son of Salathiel and Governor of Judea at the return from Babylon, both lines of descent from David continued united, so that Zorobabel was a descendant from David equally by both lines—through Solomon as much as through Nathan, and that through his father, grandfather, etc.

Then by Zorobabel's two sons, Abiud and Rhesa, the two lines again merged and again met or were again reunited by the marriage of Joseph and Mary the daughter of Heli; by which marriage, Joseph who was the natural son of Jacob (as in Matt. i. 16,) who was also son-in-law of Heli as in Luke iii. 23. So that Jesus thus became the legal son of Joseph, and grand-son of Heli. By the reuniting of the two branches of the house of Zorobabel (Abiud, Matt. i. 13, and Rhesa, Luke iii. 27), in the person of Mary's first-born—Jesus—he was constituted the heir of the throne of his father David; his mother being the [illegible] seed of David through Zorobabel the son of Salathiel whose father was a descendant from David through Solomon, and his mother and grandfather through Nathan.

Matthew gives the descent of Joseph from Zorobabel, and Luke the descent of Mary, and Jesus from the same, extending it clear back to Adam, and the promise relative to "the seed of the woman." Thus it will be seen that both Mary and Jesus, as well as his grandfather Heli, were the direct descendants or seed of David through Solomon, Salathiel and Zorobabel.

All this side of Salathiel are equal descendants of David through both Solomon and Nathan by the marriage of Jeconias and Susannah the father and mother of Salathiel, which of course includes also the legal father, and "supposed" natural father of Jesus, by his being the husband of Mary.

If Joseph begat Jesus, will "Josephites" tell us why did not Matthew in his genealogy, say in verse 16, "And Jacob begat Joseph, and Joseph begat Jesus, leaving out Mary's name, [illegible] as he had been saying all the way through? Why instead of that, did he say, "And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ?" Thus as soon as the genealogy reaches Joseph, instead of saying and Joseph begat Jesus or that he was the father of Jesus, it merely says "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus." Not a word about Joseph being his father! Why, instead of saying Mary was his mother, did it not say Joseph was his father? Why when he come down in the line to Jesus, change off and tell who was his mother, instead of his father? He had not done that in any other case. He had not said a word about any one's mother, from Abraham down, until he came to Jesus, when he changes off and avoids saying, and Joseph begat Jesus, but tells us of "the woman," his mother! Is not this unaccountable, except upon the hypothesis that Joseph did not beget Jesus? Are not these circumstances alone pretty good evidence that Joseph was not the natural father of Jesus? Then again, why did Luke instead of saying Jesus being the Son of Joseph, say "as was supposed the of Joseph?"

Is it not evident he thus intended to show that it was because of their ignorance of the fact of Jesus having been begotten of Holy Spirit, as the angel had told Mary, and that it was [illegible] who were uninspired, and the unbelieving Jews, "judging after the flesh," (as Christ told them) and because they know that Joseph was Mary's husband, and therefore the legal father or parent of Jesus, that they thus supposed Jesus was the son of Joseph? Undoubtedly when Luke said "Now his parents went to Jerusalem" etc., and when Mary said "thy father and I," they did so because legally such was the fact, and universally known.

Had Joseph been his real father, Jesus would not have been either the heir or seed promised; for that personage was to be not only son of David through Solomon, but also Son of God by supernatural begettal and conception by a virgin. It was necessary that Mary's husband also, should be a descendant of David. If it had not been so, Jesus would have lacked the legal rights and title of Joseph. Had any other than a son of David been the husband of Mary, Jesus would not in all respects have been the son of David. His legal rights under the covenant made with David would not have been met. As the husband of Mary, Joseph was legally one with Mary. The two were made "one flesh" by marriage. By both Joseph and Mary being "of the house and lineage of David," all the natural and legal rights and requirements [illegible] the Jewish law in the case, were met and made complete, without crushing or interfering in any way with Christ's supernatural begettal. Hence we see the necessity of the two genealogies of Joseph as well as of Mary, both being given to show the one object as sought by Matthew, viz. "The generation of Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham."

A few words more in explanation. It will be seen that Salathiel and Zorobabel are descendants from Solomon according to Matthew, and also from Nathan according to Luke; thus proving that both lines of pedigree met in them.

Matthew makes Salathiel the son of Jechonias, and Luke makes him the son of Neri. By 1 Chron. iii. 16, 17, Matthew is corroborated, that Jechonias was his natural father; and therefore, that when Luke in tracing the lineage of Jesus on his mother's [illegible] says "which was the son of Heli," he must have meant that [illegible] being the son-in-law of Heli, was therefore the descendant [illegible] Heli's father of Mary, by legal [illegible]

Thus I have clearly [illegible] that Jesus was a descendant of David both by law, and "according to the flesh"—according to the oath of Jehovah. It is written "that God had sworn with an oath to him (David) that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne." Acts ii. 30. It has been said by "Josephites," that "it cannot be proved that Mary was of the house and lineage of David." But how does such an assertion look in the light of the above? Nothing could be plainer. And indeed it is quite possible that agreeably to the facts in the case Luke i. 27, should be understood and read, as held by some, as follows. "To a virgin (espoused to a man whose name was Joseph) of the house of David: and the virgin's name was Mary."

That [illegible] a virgin of the house of David. Again Josephites say that because Mary was "cousin Elizabeth" who was of the tribe of Levi, she must also have been of the same tribe: and upon such flimsy grounds, they do not hesitate to assert, in the language of one "Vinton" a Josephite, (whose full name is well known) that "Mary was of the tribe of Levi. Therefore the statement in Matthew i. 18, cannot be genuine"! "This statement Luke i. 32, is not truthful if he was begotten of the Holy Spirit!"

And many not having carefully examined the matter, and supposing no one professing faith in God's word, would make such assertions without ample and most positive proof they swallow down the terrible and fatal delusion.

But those who have thoroughly investigated find that such assertions are altogether groundless. They find Anna the mother of Mary, was the wife of Matthan a priest; and as it was lawful for the priest's daughters to marry into any tribe, it is easy to be seen how Mary could be the cousin of Elizabeth, though her father Heli was a descendant of the tribe of Judah. But independent of this, it ought to be sufficient for any person, to know that as the Messiah was to be "the seed of the WOMAN," and of the house of David, and that Mary being the mother of Jesus, must of necessity be that "woman;" and could not possibly, therefore, be of the tribe of Levi, nor otherwise than the blood descendant, and in the royal line, of David; as God's word cannot fail.

The Talmud also, which contains the body of the Hebrew laws, traditions and explanations, says Mary was of the daughter of Heli.

Again Josephites say: "We can prove that Joseph was the father of Jesus, for Luke says so."

Although such an assertion seems too silly to be worthy of notice, yet, I reply, so he was the father of Christ by law—his legal father, by virtue of his being the husband of Mary his real mother, but not his natural father. And this is sufficient reason for his being so called; and also a sufficient reason for his being, as Luke says "supposed" to be his real or natural father.

But why does Luke thus explain? Why does he say of Jesus, "being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph?" Yes, I ask why? Would he have thus written if Jesus had actually been the natural son of Joseph? I answer no. No person who will think a moment can fail to see that Luke wrote this to explain and show that such an idea was only a supposition among the unbelieving Jews, and not a truth.

Again permit me to quote a little more from what seems to me, to be the ignorant and abominable writings of Josephites, viz. "Now if Mary became pregnant by the Holy Spirit, then Jesus of Nazareth is not the seed of David"!! "Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne. Not the fruit of the Holy Spirit"!! They do not seem to be aware that the promised Messiah was to be both the fruit or offspring of David and of God—son of David and son of God—that the covenant with David is exactly so worded. "Which shall be of thy sons." "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son." 1 Chron. xvii. 11, 13, 2 Sam. vii. 12–14. David understood this. "He therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, he seeing, this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that he was not left in Hades, nor did his flesh see corruption." Acts ii. 30, 31. See Diaglott. Josephites seem to think God was not able to produce a being possessing the flesh of David—"the same flesh"—without the aid of a man. Not able to produce a being with the same flesh, but differently organized and therefore of a different mind; and by altogether different means from the natural.

The throne or kingdom belongs to God and David both,—to David under God and by virtue of his promise. It is called Kingdom of God and Kingdom of David. In order therefore for Jesus to be entitled to the throne as the one "whose right it is," Ezek. xxi. 27, it was necessary he should be David's heir and God's heir—David's heir by being David's son, as to the flesh, through the royal line of Solomon, and God's heir, by being God's Son according to the promise and made by Holy Spirit—the Power of the Highest as Gabriel said; or as the Apostle Paul worded it, Rom. i. 3: "the seed of David according to the flesh, and the Son of God according to the Spirit." See also Acts ii. 30.

As God's Son he was begotten by Holy Spirit, mentally developed by the Spirit, ("the child grew and waxed strong in Spirit") quickened and qualified by the Holy Spirit ("without measure") at his baptism, and finally "born from the dead" by Holy Spirit, this becoming a Spirit—a life giving Spirit" by the change of his physical flesh nature, which had been derived from Mary his mother which was not allowed to see corruption in the grave

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As it is to this end, that Christ is to set up the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Duke as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as the associates in the government of the world, the literal meaning of which is the kingdom of God, and the things pertaining thereto, as taught by Christ and the apostles, and which is the only hope of the world for the establishment of righteousness and peace, and a holy life as one of the fruits resulting.

THE PROMISE MADE TO ABRAHAM.

Gen. xii. 2, 3. "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Gen. xxii. 15, 18. "And thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

Gen. xxvi. 3, 4, 5. "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

Gen. xxviii. 13, 14. "And in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Gal. iii. 8. "In thee shall all nations be blessed."

This promise was first made to Abraham, and afterwards it was confirmed to him by an oath, and after that the same promise was confirmed to Isaac, and after that, it was confirmed to Jacob. Paul quotes the same promise, as being the gospel which was preached to Abraham, saying: In thee shall all nations be blessed.

The words of this promise vary a little on these different occasions, but it is only different ways of saying the same thing.

The being in a position to bless, and to curse, is the same as to possess the gate of his enemies. In thee, and in thy seed, all mean the same thing. All the families of the earth, and all the nations of the earth, are the same.

Then, the promise on these different occasions is one promise. It is not all that God said to Abraham, but it comprehends all that he said. All the other promises made to Abraham, were made in order to accomplish the purpose expressed in this one promise. This promise is the summing up of all others. It describes the whole of God's final purpose concerning the world.

The final object of this purpose is to bless all nations. The instrumentality to be used for this purpose is the seed of Abraham. The process by which this work will be done, is, that the seed of Abraham shall take possession of the nations, and subdue them, and bless them. When subjugation has been completed, so that all the things that offend, and them that do iniquity have been gathered out of the kingdom, and all nations shall come and worship before the Lord, and glorify his name; and to that every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father, and so that the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea: and so that the will of God shall be done in earth as is done in heaven, and so that there shall be no more curse, then the extent of this promise, the breadth of it, and the universal sense of it, will be fulfilled, but the perpetuity of the blessings will remain to be accomplished by the unspent force of the promise made to Abraham. There can be nothing better than this. There can be nothing outside of it, nor beyond it. But the promise, implies that all the details that are necessary to its fulfilment will be secured. These details are, and must be in harmony with, and in order to its final consummation. This promise is immutable. It cannot be changed. It cannot be increased nor diminished. It is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. It is the gospel that was preached to Abraham.

Therefore, it is the chart, the compass and the rudder to guide us in all our investigations of the Scriptures. It is the measure of the hope, the inheritance, and the resurrection.

It is sometimes asked, If this promise is so important, why does it not occupy a more prominent place in the New Testament? There is no good reason for asking such a question as this. The view that suggested it, is a superficial view. The first verse in the New Testament acknowledges the relation that Christ sustains to the promise made to Abraham and to David. He is called the son of David, the son of Abraham. Then whoever is the son of David is the son of Abraham. If Christ is the son of David and the son of Abraham, he must be an heir of the promises made to Abraham, and to David, and do the work that the seed of Abraham and of David was to do. This identified him in his position and work, as the seed to whom the promises were made.

Again. The angel said unto Mary concerning he child that was to be born, he shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. This gives him a position, and a life work, according to the promise.

Another testimony. Zacharias said concerning Christ, that the Lord God had raised up a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant. The oath which he sware to our father Abraham,

This passage makes Christ both the seed of David, and the seed of Abraham, to perform the mercy promised Abraham. Here is the life work of Christ marked out. He was not raised up for any other purpose than to fulfill the promise made to Abraham. His whole life is appropriated to this particular work. And he said that he always did those things that pleased his Father. So that whatever he did was to fulfill the promise made to Abraham. If Christ died, he must be raised from the dead, to fulfill the promise. If he went to heaven to receive the kingdom, he must come back again to reign. When asked by Pilate, if he was a king, he said I am. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world.

From this testimony it is evident that every thing in the history of Christ, from his birth to his establishment in his kingdom, which is to have no end, is in order to fulfil the promise made to Abraham. Then instead of the promise made to to Abraham, being given but little prominence in the New Testament, it occupies the entire book. Its every line is for the consummation of that glorious promise. Then, the reason for asking such a question as we have been considering, is a superficial view of the subject in hand. The promise that was made to Abraham, is a simple, plain, and a strong outline statement of what God has promised to do for the world. It does not recognize the events which are to take place between the time when the promise was made, and the time when the seed shall take possession of his enemies.

In the process of time the seed was born, which is Christ. Every thing concerning this person becomes o absorbing interest. His birth, his life, his sayings, his death, his resurrection, his going away to receive the kingdom, his retention in heaven, and his coming again, to take possession of his kingdom, are all subjects of great interest on account of his being the seed to whom the promise was made. The New Testament was not written to be used instead of the promises made to Abraham, nor is it to be used independently of that promise, but in fulfilment of it.

If the gospel is preached, it is the gospel which was preached to Abraham.

If Christ is preached in any part of his history, it is as the seed Abraham.

If conditions of salvation are preached, they are the conditions of the promise made to Abraham.

Those who believe the gospel, become a part of the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise. If the hope of the gospel is preached to us, it is the hope of the promise made to Abraham.

If the inheritance of the saints is presented for our acceptance, it is the inheritance which God gave to Abraham by promise.

If the faith of the gospel is proclaimed to us, it is the faith which was one delivered to Abraham.

If the gospel of the kingdom is preached to us, it is that which was preached to Abraham and to David. If Jesus and the resurrection is preached, it is the resurrection which was preached to Abraham.

If God wants to give unto heirs of the promise the strongest possible consolation, he does it by giving them two immutable things, the promise made to Abraham, and the oath by whic his was confirmed.

Thus it is, that the New Testament cannot be sep rated from the promise made to Abraham.

A FEW QUESTIONS IN CONCLUSION.

1. Is there any other system of faith taught in the Bible, but the one that is taught in the promise made to Abraham?

2. Does not this promise teach that all the nations of the earth will be blessed, after the wicked have been destroyed?

3. Does it not teach that this work of blessing will be performed by the seed of Abraham?

4. Was not Christ the seed to whom the promise was made?

5. Then, why may not all the saints, in every place speak the same thing, and be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment?

6. Is it not the duty of all the saints, to stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel which is the promise which was made to Abraham?

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

DOVER, Del.

Editor Restitution:

I notice there is a misunderstanding of some of the most important points in the genealogy of Jesus, which I think need correcting as soon as possible. Points which I should have made more plain in my other articles. It is supposed by some, I see, that Solomon by his disobedience and great sins, forfeited the promise that the kingdom should be established forever in his line. The idea has been expressed in the following words, namely:

"It is a principle, the correctness of which few will question, that whatever is clearly promised on condition of obedience, is forfeited if that obedience is not rendered. On this ground alone we must conclude that David's throne and kingdom cannot be established forever in Solomon's line."

Now a very important feature of the covenant made with David and Solomon is here involved. But it is a great mistake, which is assumed in the above quotation, that the throne and kingdom of David was not to be established forever in the line of Solomon if he was disobedient—or in other words, it is a great mistake that the establishment of the kingdom forever in the line of Solomon, was promised on condition of his obedience.

It was this way; if Solomon and his sons should be obedient and not turn away from the Lord and forsake him, then there should be no break, no suspension for the time being, no overturning and being no more until he come whose right it is. Had they been obedient, they would, one after another have been king on the throne of David, clear down to Christ. This is what was promised them on condition of obedience, and this privilege is what was forfeited. But the covenant that the throne of David should be established for ever in the line of Solomon—that a son or descendant of David through his covenanted son Solomon should ultimately reign on his throne forever, still stands as sure as the throne of God. The fiat of the Almighty has gone forth to that effect,—the unconditional fiat—and the disobedience of puny man, cannot make it void or affect it. "And king Solomon shall be blessed, and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord forever. . . . . And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon." 1 Kings ii. 44, 46.

The covenant with David was as follows: "Behold a Son shall be born to thee who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about, for his name shall be Solomon." (1 Chron. xxii. 6–10. "He shall build me an house, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his father and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men. But my mercy SHALL NOT depart away from him as I took it from Saul whom I put away." How did God take it away from Saul? As follows: "Samuel said to Saul, thou hast done foolishly; thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, which he commanded thee; for now would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel forever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue; the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart"—David. 1 Sam. xiii. 13. "Solomon, my Son, know thou the God of thy father and serve him with a perfect heart. . . . If thou seek him he will be found of thee, and if thou forsake him he will cast thee off forever." But not the promised, covenanted Son and Heir through him.

God said to David, "If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in the truth with all their heart, and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel." 1 Kings ii. 4. But Solomon David's son, turned away from the Lord and Solomon's sons also, and the result followed just as God said, that is, there has been a failure of a man on the throne of Israel but not an utter failure. It is only for the time being. For God said, "Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Psa. lxxxix. 33. What was it? Why it was, "Thou shalt have a son—Solomon." It was, "of all my sons he hath chosen Solomon," and his descendants, to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel." 1 Chron. xxviii. 5. "I will not alter it." But still, "If his children forsake my law, then I will visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes." Psa. lxxxix. 30. David's children did forsake his law and turned away from him, and he has been as good as his word, and has rent away the whole kingdom from both lines—from all of David's children (for they as a whole forsook God's law) and overturned it, and destroyed it until it is "no more." But it is not an utter destruction of it. No, No. That Son of David through Solomon—just according to the covenant—no alteration of the thing,"—"Once have I sworn, by my holiness that I will not lie unto David;" that Son I say, has been begotten by Holy Spirit, the Power of the Highest, and born of the Virgin Mary, a descendent of David through Solomon just according to the covenant; has been crucified, dead, and buried, been raised incorruptible, and is gone to his Father, and is soon to return as he whose right it is to reign on the throne of David. All other descendents of David, except this royal Son, have had their right to the throne—all the right they had—forfeited and cut off by Solomon's disobedience, and the disobedience of Jehoiakim (who cut out the leaves of the roll and burnt them Jer. iii. 8,) and Coniah and Zedekiah. But all the right these descendents of David, children of Solomon, had to the throne, and all the right that was thus forfeited by Solomon and the others was simply the right of occupying David's throne in the mean time, until the promised—the covenanted—Royal Heir should come.

The "writing Coniah childless," (Jer. xxii. 20,) was not that he should have no children, for he had; but it was that no son of his should occupy, or have the right to occupy the throne in the mean time, or during the interregnum, between that time and the coming of the rightful neverdying heir. Accordingly he was taken at once, when he had reigned only three months, and carried to Babylon, where he remained a captive 36 years, and Mattaniah his uncle was made king in his stead, whose name was changed to Zedekiah, 2 Kings xxiv. 17–20; Jer. lii. 34.

The Solomon line was the only line of heirs or kings which had the right to occupy the throne by virtue of the covenant, during the interregnum, as the line in which, by virtue of the same covenant, the royal neverdying Heir—Jesus—was to come. The first or temporary right, was forfeited, but that did not invalidate or affect in the least, the latter—the chief feature and object of the covenant.

"Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same; (No more kings like this. The diadem, crown, and kingdom, when restored, shall not be the same in character, as this); exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high." Exalt Jesus, the one "despised and rejected of men," who said of himself, "I am meek and lowly:" (Isa. liii. 3; Ezek. xvii. 24; Matt. xi. 29, and abase Zedekiah, then occupying the "high" position of king on the throne of David. Exalt Jesus. Not Jesus of "immaculate conception:" (too much Catholic assumption, and ignorant superstition about this) but Jesus of "miraculous conception"—a very different thing. "Jehovah our righteousness,"—the "righteous Branch." (Jer. xxiii. 56; Isa. xi 1.) "Jesus Christ of the seed of David," "the root and the offspring (or Branch) of David." Rev. xxii. 16.

It has also been lately repeated as follows:

"If you turn to Luke iii. 23, and onward, you will find that, while Joseph came of the royal line, as Matthew testifies, Mary came of that obscure one beginning with Nathan." Now this is a mistake, another misunderstanding. First, let me say that the two genealogical records, are simply, as Matthew i. 1, says "the generation of Jesus Christ the son of David the son of Abraham." Luke does not mention this, just as he omits other things which Matthew tells, and as Matthew omits things that Luke tells. It is not the generation of Joseph, or Mary, but of Jesus.

There was only one Royal line—the line of Solomon. Both Mary and Joseph, according to both Matthew and Luke, descended from David through the Solomon line, by Zorobabel, Salathiel and Jeconias; and through the Nathan line also, but only by the wife of Jeconias—Susannah the daughter of Neri, a descendent, of Nathan.

I supposed I had made this matter plain in my other articles on this subject. But as I find I failed to make it understood by some persons, I will try to ventilate it a little more.

I said in my first article, "We find that Jeconias who descended from Solomon married Susannah the daughter of Neri who descended from Nathan. So that in Salathiel their son the two lines of descent were united." It should be seen by this, that Salathiel was a descendent from David through Solomon, by his father, Jeconias, and through Nathan by his mother, Susannah, the daughter of Neri who was of the Nathan line; and that Salathiel's son, Zorobabel, and all below or after him, would therefore be descendents of David through Solomon by Jeconias, and through Nathan by Susannah, just as Salathiel was.

Then by the two sons of Zorobabel, Abiud, (Matt. i. 13), and Rhesa, (Luke iii. 27), there were two other lines of descent started, Joseph being of the Abiud line, and Heli and his daughter, Mary, the mother of Jesus, being of the Rhesa line; but all in both these lines, came through Zorobabel and Salathiel, according to both Matthew and Luke; as can be easily seen in two minutes by any one. Matt. i. 12, 13; Luke iii. 27.

It is true, Luke says, "Salathiel was the son of Neri;" but Matthew says "Jeconias begot Salathiel," which agrees with 1 Chron. 3. 17. As both Matthew and Luke's records are true therefore Luke must mean that Salathiel was the grandson, otherwise the Son-in-law of Neri, by his mother, the daughter of Neri and wife of Jeconias. If Jeconias "begat" Salathiel as in Matt. and 1 Chron. then he was the natural son of Jeconias, and could only have been the grand-son of Neri. So also in Luke it is said that "Joseph was the son of Heli." But Matthew says "Jacob begat Joseph," and as both statements are true, it follows that Luke meant Joseph was the legal son, or son-in-law, of Heli, by his marriage with Mary, Heli's daughter; which is in perfect harmony with the fact stated by Matthew, that "Jacob begat Joseph;" Joseph thus being of necessity the natural son of Jacob, and the son-in-law of Heli.

But in considering and determining this question, as to whether or not Mary and Jesus were the descendents of David through Solomon, it matters not in the least as to the history of Susannah, or whether the two lines were united in Salathiel and Zorobabel, by her marriage with Jeconias; or as to Zorobabel's two sons Abiud and Rhesa, from whom descended the two lines which were united by the marriage of Joseph and Mary or as to Matthan, or whether the daughters of priests could lawfully marry into any other tribe.

I say, it matters not; we need not trouble ourselves in the least about any of those things: for the fact that Jesus was a descendent from David through Solomon, is clearly and positively settled by the agreement of both Matthew and Luke in the following, viz: that all in the two lines including Joseph, Mary and Jesus, descended through Zorobabel, Salathiel and Jeconias; and that Jechonias was a descendent of David through Solomon; (corroborated by 1 Chron. iii. 10–17,) and according to Luke iii. 23–27, Heli the father-in-law of Joseph, and father of Mary the mother of Jesus, and all in that line, also descended from Zorobabel, through his other son Rhesa, and that Zorobabel, was the son of Salathiel the son of Jeconias, and grandson of Neri, on his mother's side; Neri being a descendent in the other line through Nathan.

Thus we have a perfect agreement between Matthew and Luke, so far as is necessary to prove and settle the genealogy of Jesus—that he was of the royal line; of the tribe of Judah; of the house of David; through Solomon. All this, entirely independent of any and all seeming or supposed discrepancies, and of all other questions.

In order to make this matter more plain, and easy to be understood; I submit the following table founded on both Matthew and Luke, and exactly as they put it.

DAVID

JESUS

I think this should be sufficient to settle forever this question of the genealogy of Jesus—that he was "the seed of David according to the flesh."

As to his paternity, I think I have shown to the satisfaction of all honest, intelligent persons who have thoroughly and thoughtfully looked into the matter, or who may yet do so, that by the concurrent testimony of both the Old and New Testament Scriptures, Jesus was not begotten by Joseph, but was "the ONLY begotten Son of God;" and that because of his having been thus begotten, his Father's name, "God," was applied to him from the very day of his begettal, and birth, all through the days of his flesh; that he was then the Son of God in mind, in spirit, in character and person, because of such begettal; and that when he was "declared the Son of God with power, according to Holy Spirit, by the resurrection from the dead," (Rom. i. 4) he thus became the Son of God physically; that is, by the change of [illegible] flesh to spirit substance—the only [illegible] begotten Son of God in the flesh substance of David, changed to the only begotten Son of God in the spirit substance of God.

Before his resurrection he was the only Being with a flesh nature thus begotten of God by Holy Spirit Power. After his resurrection he was the same being or person—the same only begotten Son of God—changed to spirit substance—"the divine nature." Thus it was that the "first begotten was again brought into the world," and the time arrived when the angels [illegible] to worship him as the [illegible] head of the Elohim [illegible] had been [illegible] by foretold.

But, as before said, I here repeat, that one passage alone, (John i. 14–18) correctly rendered, and harmonizing as it does with all the other Scriptures, should be sufficient to settle the question of the begettal and paternity of Jesus, viz., "He came unto his own domain, and his own people received him not; but as many as received him, to them gave he the right or privilege to become the sons of God; to them that believe into his name who was begotten not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God! And the Word, or Logos, was (then) made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth." If verse 13 applies to those who believe on Jesus, (mentioned in verse 12) instead of to Jesus himself, then it would have read, "nor of the will of man," instead of "nor of the will of a man," as the Greek stands. I am aware that those who render this passage as above, are in the minority. But so it is with many other passages, the correct rendering being often with the minority. So it is with the truth generally; it is with the minority. The truth is not decided by majorities of popular men. But the truth is that which is in harmony with the entire Scriptures.

FROM JERUSALEM.

Jerusalem is very quiet now; there are very few visitors, and owing to the quarantine stations our mails are very irregular. The feeling here is that there is to be a great war in the Soudan this this fall, and England seems to be making great preparations to that end.

Crops are abundant and food is cheap. The weather is delightfully cool and the climate is rapidly changing; the night dews are heavy, almost like rain showers. We have a grand display of the wonderful sunsets seen in all parts of the world; as we have a cloudless sky the sight is very fine. Who is able to explain these things? I am painting a woman of Bethlehem; the dress is pretty, and is said to be the same as that worn by Ruth when she gleaned in the field of Boaz. We see the same custom now—woman gleaning after the reapers. I think the customs of the people are quite the same as in the time of David. However, there is a decided improvement in the manner of building since I came here. Many houses are being built in European style, and there are about thirty shops, nearly all finished and occupied, near the Joppa gate. These are all owned by Europeans and kept on the same principle. The manners and customs are fast changing. In these days of rapid progress things change even in Jerusalem. It must be so; this great and God-given law of progress must reach to all parts of the globe. All things that are done are done by law and order. There is nothing miraculous about it when we understand the law by which it is done. Many there are who still cling to the doctrine of eternal punishment, but you will find that these people never expect it for themselves or their friends; it is only for their enemies. Well, my brother, we cannot be grateful enough to God for having taken the scales from our eyes.—Rev. A. E. Davis in Dawn of the Morning.

THE long article "Our Around the Bible World," which was sent by Bro. Woodrall, presents the revelations of Holy Writ in a very forcible manner. It seems strange that so many ignore the plain statements of prophecy that await their glorious fulfilment in the future history of Judah and Israel. Nevertheless God's word will be fulfilled to the very letter.

FROM the October number of the Glasgow Messenger we learn that a Conditional Immortality Conference was held in the Vaudois Valleys in Italy, at which Signor Oscar Cocorda, a native Vaudois Valleys in Italy, was in attendance and addressed the people several times. Seven Adventist colporteurs were present and discussed matters of great interest. We have not yet heard from Bro. Cocorda as to what has come to hand. May God bless him in presenting the truth in Italy.

THE Baltimore and Ohio Text Book for Indiana has come to hand. The design of this little work is to give a condensed synopsis of the past political history of the state. The statistics are carefully tabulated, and the facts and figures contained in this neatly executed pamphlet exhibit multum in parvo, a mass of condensed information, about our noble western state. A letter addressed to C. K. Lord, Baltimore, Md. inclosing stamp, will secure a copy, as the Red Book issues are all for mail circulation. We tender the sender our thanks.

A FEW THOUGHTS.

"Iron sharpened iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend"—And yet it is quite a matter of consideration as to how it is sharpened. It may be sharpened so angularly as to take on the form of an angered countenance; or it may be sharpened so as to give expression of great joy. To watch the ever varying countenance of those with whom we are daily brought into contact, and they in turn to watch us, is a study I never tire of. But why all this? simply by way of introduction, as I desire to record some experiences that have come to me within the past month.

We gain experience the most valuable, as we break loose from our moorings, and launch out amongst our fellows. The sea captain would never practically know how to guide his vessel amid the rough seas, boisterous winds, and hidden rocks were he never subjected to the trial. He might be well schooled, understand all the rules essential for good seamanship, but if he never sails in other than smooth waters, he will not be fitted to fill the office he has assumed. "This brings me to my thought, and in giving expression thereto, I hope it may have the desired effect of stirring up pure minds to the consideration of the relationship they hold, as the members of a body, known as the body of Christ. Our Lord, when he called his immediate followers, told them to leave their nets, follow him, and he would make them fishers of men! And if any of us are called to serve the Lord Christ as fishers of men, then how very important it is we should go forth under directions, and mark well the rules laid down—the neglecting of which has also been a prolific source of much weariness, toiling all night, and catching no fish! The thought I desire to press home is, have we used the proper bait as we have gone forth? "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." How can we follow him? He as he did! Well, did he go forth hurling anathemas at men, calling them fools, quenching what little flame there was, telling them unless they subscribed to set forms of teaching, and before they could be his disciple they must fully comprehend questions he never [illegible]? Did he do this? I tell you nay! but he did say, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." These words of Christ were wrenched from him because of the question, "Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." The eighteenth chapter of Matthew is worth much study, and when digested it will set better on us than much will from desk or pulpit. All brethren would do well to give more study to what our Lord and Master has said, than to dwell excessively on questions of time, or over-anxiety, [illegible] the snare in their way, and which will take hold. But [illegible] the Church as also to sinners, [illegible] of his [illegible] profitable, for [illegible] in [illegible] proof, for correction, [illegible] in righteousness; that [illegible] love of God may be perfected, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

What more can we ask, what more [illegible]? One other thing, it is [illegible], and it is an essential quality of mind we must possess, and that is the mind or spirit of Christ; as we are told—"Now if any man" (and [illegible] apply to the church at Rome, but belongs here) "have not the spirit of Christ"—such is also the spirit of God—"he is none of his." The 6th, 7th, and 8th chapters of Romans will bear rereading again and again, and I believe, were the sublime thought of Chesapeake as expressed in these chapters dwelt upon, and made capital of, we could draw such inspiration therefrom as would lead us to say, "Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus."

I was about to say, because the saints, as we are pleased to style them, have made too much of Christ; is it possible to make too much of Christ?"—therefore we must give him second rank and exalt the prophecies in his place, talk and preach much about the return of the Jews; the power expected by which we are to reign over the nations; the rebuilding of Jerusalem etc. No, a thousand times no! I say, let him who is the Alpha as well as the Omega, have his place, which is in the foremost, he being the Captain.

I wish to put on record—that all my associations, with many who to-day were hitherto unknown, as also those who are well known, for the past months' experience, has shown me two things,—Great need of patience, as also perseverance. "The field is the world," soon the angels will be sent to gather the wheat into the garner. Let us wait their time! In my experience at the conference at Winchester, Va., I was greatly blessed, not from undue excitement; not because my ears were tickled with eloquent addresses; but from what was, and I have no doubts on the question—the Divine presence was manifested by approval, in the word spoken having the effect of leading two souls to confess the Lord Jesus and believe on him as the sent of God, and to show their faith and hope, they did not hesitate to obey his command, so they were immersed in water into his name, thus we hope putting him on, and we trust, through grace, walking in him. Words of encouragement coming from tried soldiers, were very comforting, and we hope the new business year, on which the Association has entered will prove that the Lord is in the movement, as I believe he is always, where he and not party is permitted to rule. Like an oasis in the desert, so was my happy experience at Winchester, and greatly did we wish others were there to drink and find pleasure therein. My visit in Cleveland was very limited. I had the great pleasure of meeting with the Church of God there, and with it remembering the love of God as displayed in the gift of his Son. I am happy in knowing, that in questions such as have in times past rent the body, are given the go by, and a greater liberality of spirit obtains. And why and how is this? Simply by experience which has taught us, that so long as we are drawn by the bonds of love, and love of truth, there is little fear of our going astray, giving heed to heresies, among which none is greater than the denial of the Son of God, who is only by some believed to be Son of man, that's all! As for me, I say, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, rather than believe this! "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest—Joseph never was! never will be the Highest! I will further add in this connection, my thanks to those who have so ably exposed this latest error through the columns of THE RESTITUTION.

Having visited with my wife with her folks at Canton, Ohio, we visited the Church at Salem, Ohio, there the light of truth is kept burning, and though low in number, yet full of hope that the day of redemption is not far distant. May God inspire all of us to greater zeal, a zeal which shall be according to knowledge, and that knowledge which is from above; and is therefore able to qualify all who go forth bearing the precious seed to plant it in such hearts as are good and [illegible].

I am now at home, and I feel a deep sense of gratitude to God, my Heavenly Father, for his protection, guiding and safe keeping. Our little band here, rich in faith, [illegible] in the riches of him, [illegible] God. [illegible] is pleased to call [illegible] sense of his nearness to us as we draw near to him, give us a [illegible] and [illegible] that we may [illegible] in us can only be perfected in the way of Christ. To whom be honor now and through the ages to come.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

Addresses Delivered at the Christian Conversation in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, New York, on September 12th.

George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, delivered a lengthy speech in opening the proceedings. In the course of it he said: "The doctrine of the Lord's second coming as the hope of the Church needs to be taken out of the sentimental and put into the practical department. If the church measured its importance, by the frequency with which it is mentioned in Scripture, it would be in the forefront of all. A doctrine that stimulates to watchfulness and faithfulness must be practical.

"It is the stimulating effect of this doctrine which produces enthusiasm bested to the point that the world calls fanaticism that Satan dreads, and which he seeks to defeat. He has succeeded in getting the church almost to abandon the doctrine, first by caricaturing it and then by diverting attention from it by errors as to time and circumstance. He has led men to believe that the descent of the spirit at Pentecost was the second coming, though nearly all the promises of the New Testament save those of Christ himself were written after Pentecost, then he has represented the event as at an immense distance, and therefore out of the range of present expectation, and he has led people to regard death as the second coming, although it would seem impossible to associate the idea of death with an event that in all its aspects is one of life-giving power. The Lord's coming is like an overdue train, that may be expected at any moment; not that the Lord is slack in keeping his promise, but that a train already due is probably near at hand." Mr. William E. Blackstone, of Chicago, read Titus ii. 11—14: "Teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." He said: "This is only one text out of very many in the Scriptures in which reference to the Lord's coming is made as a motive for right living. Do you not see how practical this makes the doctrine? If you take a new Bible and with a pencil mark all such passages, you would be surprised to see what a remarked Bible you would have. But in spite of these frequent references the expectation of the Lord's coming does not exercise the influence in the church, which properly belongs to it.

"To some Christians the Lord's coming means simply their own death, others, who think that he will come in person, believe that his coming will not be for a long time, until the whole world is converted and a thousand years of the millennium have passed away. Thus the event fails to exercise the influence over them it would exercise if they realized that it may take place at any moment. One of the causes of this prevalent indifference is that they fail to see how vast a difference there is between the Lord's coming for his waiting people and his coming in glory to a sin-burdened world. There is a vast difference in the two, not only in purpose, but in time. This is evident from the frequent injunctions to watchfulness. Can you be watching for an event which is separated from you by an interval of more than a thousand years? The Lord would never have enjoined watchfulness in such circumstances. Nor must we expect that the world will be converted before he comes. We are simply told that the gospel must be preached as a witness, in all nations before the end come, not that the gospel will be accepted. The process is everywhere described as a taking out of a people from among the nations. Oh, that the church had been faithful to that command! the work would soon have been done. The Church has been expecting the whole world would be converted and the Millennium brought about by the preaching of the gospel. But it is an error. I wonder that Satan has been able to blind so many eyes with such an idea. We have to realize that at any moment the Lord may come. The proper attitude for us to hold is that we may turn away from what we may be doing, whatever it may be and say, "Yes, this is the hour whom I have been waiting and watching for, and look up gladly to receive him.

"This doctrine of the Lord's speedy coming sheds such a light on all prophecy. From a child I have loved the prophecies of God's Word, but they were enveloped in a mist to me, I could not get order out of them. I have often sat down pondering over them and mourning at the slow progress the gospel is making in the world, and grieving that we must wait so long for the end of strife and sin and intemperance and all the world's woes, which I supposed must come before the Lord could return to the earth. For days and days I sought the blessing of the Spirit to show me the meaning of these things. It was in showing me the nearness of the Lord's coming that he came to me. He simply took of the things of God and showed them unto me. I saw that the gospel was to be preached as a witness for the taking out of the people; and I think that after the church has been taken out of the world the gospel will still be a witness, for we read that John saw an angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth. Rev. xiv. 6. With the acceptance of this truth and expectation of the coming of the Lord as the next event, for which I must look, the prophecies became clear to me as when a light shines in a dark place. Now as I rise in the night, as I often do, and look from my window at the stars that gem the sky, I think of my Lord's coming there. And as I see the morning star shining as the herald of the approaching day, I think of his word, "I am the bright and Morning Star," and know that when he comes the Sun of Millennial glory will be at hand.

"It is of the utmost importance that you keep distinctly separate in your mind these two stages of the Lord's coming. His coming in judgment and in the glory of heaven may be far away, but his coming for his people to take them to himself may be very near. It is this difference that makes the thought so weighty and so comforting to us. He will come for his own and will take them away and the world will wonder where we are gone. That may be soon; oh, that he may find us ready, all our affairs with the world fixed, and we ready to go as those who have received the word of warning and are prepared and waiting for his summons. If we have that expectation we shall not recoil with horror from the thought of Christ's coming as some Christians do. As we sometimes see them start back when we speak of that day we can but think that they are not ready for the summons.

"Then what an influence this should exercise on our lives. At the commencement of my Christian life I found that it was as easy for me to get riches as for other men if I would give my mind to it. And I gave my mind to it until it pleased the Lord, by his spirit to take hold of me, and show me that 'every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself' (1 John iii. 3). This precious hope has enabled me to become a sealed vessel in his service. I signed a deed before him as when we convey a landed estate to another we describe the property, and say that in consideration of so much money paid we give the property away forever, so in consideration of the love wherewith he loved me and that he died for me I give myself, my wife, my family and all that I have to him signed and sealed. I never could have done it by myself, but I just trusted him that he has taken possession of the property, and that he is doing business there. I pray God there may never be on my part any retraction of that conveyance. A little boy was placed by his father in rather a hard place where he was kept continually on foot, from morning to night. He had to go here and go there, carrying heavy bundles, and work with all his might. It was very dull for him and he often thought of his home and his father. He wrote home that the work was too heavy for him and that he was weary, but his father thought it was best that he should remain and work on. But at last his father wrote him that he would come himself soon and fetch him home. In the meantime he must be patient and work well. The boy took new heart then, and though his work was no less hard he did it with a will, thinking it would soon be over. And every day he was looking out for his father and saying to himself, 'Perhaps father will come to-day.' As he swept out the store in the morning he would take a peep down the road to see if his father was coming. So he watched day after day and day after day, until one morning looking out as usual, sure that some day his father would come, he saw his father's buggy coming, and he dropped his broom and ran out to meet him, saying, 'I am so glad you have come.' So the Christian, looking up to his Father's abode, cries, 'Even so Lord Jesus, come quickly.'"—Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

PASSING EVENTS.

THE EUROPEAN SITUATION

is a subject of considerable interest and anxiety just now among politicians of all grades, and in considering the possible issues of the contemplated meeting of the three Emperors, it is gravely asked, will the Emperors agree upon a new war, such as in 1877 let loose the Russians upon Turkey, by there to be any further division of European Turkey, already much diminished, by which the Kaiser would advance towards or to Salonica, while Bulgaria would absorb Roumelia? Or does the Czar require carte blanche in Asia Minor in exchange for concessions to Vienna in the Trans-Balkan provinces? Then there is a common foe—the anarchists of Europe—who assail at once all established rulers, and compel sovereigns, otherwise inclined to separate, to unite against the deadliest foe that authority has ever had to encounter in historic times. The perilous character of the hidden but almost ubiquitous enemy is indicated by the vast and varied preparations made before the Czar can traverse even his own dominions. The repeated attacks on the venerable Emperor, and the plots recently discovered in Vienna, indicate that not only in Russia, where stern tyranny explains, though it cannot excuse horrible retaliation, but in countries where there are representative institutions and a free press, the enemies of society prepare their murderous conspiracies, and aim not at establishing popular or representative Government, but at overthrowing all order, all law, and all police. A wild and naked Socialism has crept like a disease amongst the extreme politicians of the world.

UNREST AND SECRET CONSPIRACY

are prolific everywhere. Those who smiled at Lord Beaconsfield's declaration that "Europe was honeycombed by secret societies" would not deride it now. Call them by what name you will—Nihilists, Socialists, or Anarchists, St. Petersburg, Berlin, and Vienna have each their own troubles. Political hatred differs only in intensity, as it can fix upon a personal antagonist, or has to distribute its forces against a system. Desperate men, who have nothing to lose, and "no fear of God before their eyes," who stick at nothing, and who spare no one, are at all times perplexing opponents. But the Emperors are not alone in this dilemma. The votaries of the "Black Hand" in Andalusia, the Camorristi of Naples and Sicily, the Mariannes and kindred associations in France, the Invincibles and "dynamiters" of Dublin and the United States, are all brethren in creed if not in name. The evil is one with which in the present day every constituted authority must grapple.

FROM PONTIUS TO PILATE

is the German equivalent of what we call, in English, "being sent from post to pillar." It is the position in which, according to the Jüdische Wochenschrift, some fifty Jewish families from Roumania have lately been placed. These poor people have left Roumania, and in order to be allowed to emigrate, had to sign an undertaking that they would never return to that country. They betook themselves on board the German steamer Westphalia to New York, but being utterly destitute and perfectly aimless, they were not allowed to land. So the Westphalia had to take them back to Hamburg, where they had first embarked. The authorities of the Hanseatic city refused on principle to allow them to land, but they could not very well help themselves, as they had to give way on that point, and also undertook to support them until they could decide about the way of dealing with them.

The foreign office of the German Empire, being appealed to in this emergency, declared that the fifty families had no claim whatever on the city of Hamburg, and if they could not support themselves, had to be sent back to the place they came from, viz., to Roumania. But having, prior to their leaving Roumania, resigned their citizenship, and promised never to return to that country, the Roumanian Government emphatically decline to permit of their crossing the frontier. When last heard of they were still staying in Hamburg, and the Jewish congregation of that place had undertaken "to do something for them." As to the question of international law, the Roumanian Government is decidedly in the wrong. The theory "once a subject always a subject" holds good in all countries of Europe, so long as the emigrant has not actually settled in a foreign country, and acquired a new status recognized by the laws of his native country. In all questions of contested citizenship, such as have arisen at various times between the United States and certain European countries, the practice is generally the reverse, that is to say, the native country has claimed its child as a subject, and the country of adoption has claimed the immigrant as a citizen. It is quite clear that in a case like that of the fifty homeless Jewish families, the country in which they were born must be considered as the country to which they belong.—Prophetic Times and Israel's Watchman.

THE EUROPEAN OUTLOOK.

"In the more casual observer there is nothing of special significance in the present aspect of European affairs. France, that most restless of all eastern nations, has her hands full with her dazzling colonial policy, which is attracting her attention just now to Northern Africa, the Congo river, Madagascar, Tonquin and China. Besides which her relations with England are somewhat strained at this time by the Egyptian question, rendering it almost certain that she will be bound to keep peace with Germany till these questions are settled. England has Egypt and the Suez canal policy on her hands, and the present aspect of things—notwithstanding her protestations to the contrary—look as though she was there to stay. Then the question of Candia and the Mahdi may assume more serious proportions than appear on the surface at present. There, together with the state of Ireland, gave a strong assurance that Germany and Austria have nothing to fear from that quarter. Germany, too, seems to have been suddenly seized with the spirit of colonial aggrandizement. Hence her effort to appropriate a portion of Central Africa. But between English tenacity, French aggressiveness, and the efforts of explorers and missionaries in favor of native rulers, her success in that direction seems to be very uncertain. But her attempts at territorial acquisition must succeed somehow. England's colonies are all round the world. France, attracted by the glitter of these dependencies of the British crown, is attempting the same thing. Austria and Russia have always been centralizing powers. They have not attempted colonization to any extent, but have enlarged their territory by expansion. Hence Russia was ready to sell Alaska and immediately to grasp the Merv in Central Asia. From the days of Peter the Great her immediate neighbors have felt her iron grasp at every convenient opportunity. Poland, Finland, Bessarabia, Caucasia and almost all Central Asia have been absorbed, and still she is not satisfied. As in the days of Catherine, on her great go-aboard near Moscow, ever pointing southward is inscribed,

"THE WAY TO CONSTANTINOPLE."

Austria has not been so uniformly successful, but her good fortune in annexing Montenegro and Herzegovia, during the late useless stress with Turkey, has only whetted her appetite for more. Under these circumstances the late visit of the three emperors to Warsaw assumes special significance. Is there not another Poland to be divided? And is not Turkey the golden apple, ripe and ready to fall? These questions lead point to the remark of Kossuth, the Hungarian orator, a short time since, that "Bismark had played his cards well, in sending England to Egypt, and France to China, that he might have them out of his own way." Certainly a sufficient pretext for the movement indicated above may be found in the following item clipped from a late paper, and the moral sense of all Christendom will shout the avengers on:

"Three Christians have been flayed alive by Turks in the village of Negilova, in the district of Kupralu, Macedonia."

These thoughts have occupied my mind for some weeks as I have read and thought on the significance of the movements in the East. If the near future does not demonstrate the correctness of my conclusions, I shall only have to admit that I have not read the political horoscope of Europe aright.—D. Bosworth, in Messiah's Herald.

News Items.

ROME, Oct. 9.—Harrowing details of the hurricane which prevailed at Catania, on the island of Sicily, yesterday have been received here. Twenty-seven persons were killed and 100 were injured. There is great distress among the poor.

VIENNA, Oct. 10.—The Austrian government has threatened to adopt measures of retaliation against the Porte, unless the latter fulfils the terms of the treaty relating to the junction of Turkish and Austro Servian railroads.

ROME, Oct. 10.—The Catania district, in Sicily, which suffered from the hurricane on Wednesday, presented almost the same appearance that Casamicciola did after the earthquake in 1883. It is believed that many corpses will yet be found.

The development of the oil fields in Russia is likely, in time, and it not very distant period either, to revolutionize the petroleum trade in this country. Russia will probably supply many parts of Europe with petroleum cheaper than can the oil producers in the United States.

There are rumors that, while France and England are engaged in acquiring territory in Tonquin and Egypt, Russia is quietly pushing conquests in Asia. A Russian protectorate of Persia is in the wind, and the expectation is that Russia will not stop before she reaches the borders of India. Her movements have caused England much uneasiness.

In the cholera-infected district of Italy there were 239 fresh cases and 137 deaths on Sunday. Among the victims at Naples was M. Gerrati, President of the Chamber of Commerce.

ROME, Oct. 13.—The total number of fresh cases of cholera reported in Italy during the past twenty-four hours was 195: deaths, 99.

Captains Roberts and Russell, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Captains Seyer and Russell, of St. Paul, Minn., have been engaged to take charge of the steamers in the rapids of the Nile during the progress of the Egyptian expedition. They will go to the Nile with all possible haste.

It is noted as a curious fact that the birds deserted Marseilles and Toulon when the cholera was at its height in those towns, and appeared in great numbers at Hyeres. This town is the most southern point of the French Riviera, and it is the regular rendezvous for migratory birds in the spring and autumn, but never before have they resorted there in summer until the present year. The circumstance may be interesting from a medical point of view, indicating that birds leave towns where the water is infected with cholera germs.

FOREVERMORE.

E. V. REED.

O, for a home beyond the pain
Beyond the doubt and gloom,
Where Christ the Lord shall ever reign
In love, beyond the tomb.

The years go by like waters swift
Ob'owing to the sea,
But here and there the clouds are rifts
With light and hope for thee.

The crown shines brightly in the hand
Of him, our coming King;
Hold to the cross' pilgrim band,
And of his glories sing.

The night will cease, the morn shall come,
And pain shall be no more!
Behold our Lord upon his throne,
As King forever more!

whatever. It is as perfect not to it, just eating out the truth like a gangrene. Then in the Psalms which were originally divided by the Jews into five parts corresponding to the five books of Moses we have a perfect pentateuch of song; and however of the Mosaic and Psalmic [illegible]

So they are preeminently the songs of Zion, and the glorious things which God has spoken of this Davidic city, as things yet to be realized in the day when its name, as Ezekiel says, shall henceforth be "Yahwah shammah, or the Lord is there." Then next in the book of Proverbs we have another pentateuch of precepts, for the book naturally divides into five parts. They are the proverbs of the kingdom of God, past and to come, and therefore as Divine as they are Israelitish. Ecclesiastes preaches to us the unpalatable truth that life is but mortal and ends once over in the grave; and that the world's catalogue of pleasures is a simple round of folly and supreme vanity and final vexation of spirit. The leading prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel all speak the same thing with more or less frequency; that Israel led captive for their sins, shall at last be restored in more than ancient glory; and with world-wide and abiding results of peace and good will in all the earth. There is no less than 11 chapters in Isaiah alone treating of these glorious things. Then the twelve minor prophets as they are called are largely the reproduction of the same eternal prospect of Israel and the earth; when love shall everywhere be joined with life, peace with power, wisdom with wealth, truth with trade, politics with purity, right with might, and God with every good thing in the earth. Then in these latter prophets are included the prophets of the restoration from Babylon; consisting of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; alongside of which must be placed Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther in all of which we have the best illustration of how God setteth up one thing and pulleth down another according as his purpose requires: and how he turneth the King's heart, like rivers of water whithersoever he will; and we have also a typical Cyrus and a typical restoration altogether, yet to be repeated on a far grander scale when God shall choose Jerusalem again, and inherit Judea his portion in the holy land. Then in that song of Solomon which we omitted in its proper place we have the only lengthy illustration of the Kingly-bridegroom aspect of Christ in relation of his queenly bride, the destined joint occupants of the very throne of power over Israel which Solomon then occupied. Then on behalf of the four Evangelists, they give us the same sum total in the concluding superscription with which they each in longer or briefer form head the cross of the crucified Christ, saying "This is Jesus the King of the Jews;" which so well accords with Nathaniel's confession "Thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." Now this man, on Christ's own authority, was a guileless Israelite, and therefore there was nothing but the truth in his confession of Christ; a confession which few are prepared to make in our day, either amongst Jews or Gentiles. Then the Acts of the Apostles displays the same pronounced results respecting Christ; he there appears to view as "another king than Cæsar," by whom God will judge the world in righteousness. And so with every epistle which time fails us to pursue in detail; they one and all direct the attention to some feature in the character and service of him whom they speak of as presently coming again to reign over both Jew and Gentile, and to subdue all things upon earth to himself, in pursuance of the apocalyptic climax which shall not fall of being reached at last when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." Then it is that the song that first issues forth from the mouths of the first resurrected, shall eventually reverberate through the whole redeemed creation, saying as with the voice of many waters "Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, Amen, Hallelujah." These are in brief the leading features of the Bible world, so different to so many particulars, that we may truly say that it is not the same world at all. The one is a world of light, the other a world of darkness, the one is pure Abrahamic Israelism, the other is as pure Gentilism in Christian dress; old Roman, Chaldean and Egyptian antiquities incorporated with the professed service of Christ so that the thing having a little devil in it may the better succeed with worldly men of every complexion: whose theatrical tastes must be repeated or they must fail of retaining their patronage. In fact the Christian world is not Christ's world at all; but a world where Satan's Trinity, "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life" reigns with supreme unbounded away in both church and state. It only requires a man to know his Bible to know that it is a far Diviner matter than the paganized theology of christendom allows a man to believe that men who are full of Shakespeare, Milton, Tennyson, Longfellow, and the writings of a thousand other human celebrities can never be very full of Moses and the prophets, men need no candles when the sun shines; excepting where they build for themselves theological work shops with stained glass windows that exclude or alter the complexion of the light. As it was in the days of Christ so it is now, men universally love darkness, rather than light, because their deeds are evil: only he who doeth truth cometh to the full blaze of day which illuminates the Bible world; all else return to the "dim religious light" of human creation, or to rest their eyes and hopes on the ascending sparks of their own fire.—*P. ## LITTLE THINGS.

Little things are often neatest;
Little things are often sweetest;
Little lakes the stillest lie;
Little charities farthest fly;
Little seeds produce our trees;
Little drops of rain our seas;
Little words of kindness often
Will a desert of anger soften.
Little sympathies will gild
More than aught will give relief
When, in stillness felt unbroken
Save by sighs, and one word spoken;
One little word, one little kiss
And hearts united are in bliss.
These loving hearts, so closely beating,
Their vows of constancy repeating,
May soon by actions of their own,
For which to sorrow cast stone.
By little words upset the vow
They register in heaven now.
Little songs we love the best;
Little cares disturb our rest;
Little birds the sweetest sing;
And, when nature makes a thing
Especially rare, she'll always choose
Little things—as little dews,
Little diamonds, little gems,
Little pleats with little stems;
Little things we love the strongest,
Hope for most, remember longest.

Copying My Lord's Likeness.

Leaving my desk and books early one forenoon in Florence I wandered out into the Piazza, which was glowing in the fervent rays of the bright Italian sun, and making my way across the Arno, landed at length in the gallery of the Pitti Palace, so justly celebrated for the wondrous gems of art that adorn its walls. Having been a familiar visitor to the place, and feeling somewhat in a passive, listless mood, my eye caught sight of an artist in an inner room, whose quiet, earnest occupation immediately fixed my attention. She had planted herself before a picture which, by some strange oversight, I had scarcely noticed previously. It was rather small in size and quiet in coloring, and represented ideally the countenance of our blessed Lord. A look of deep, unspeakable sadness sat on the features, but the eye glistened with intensest yearning and compassion. After gazing for awhile at this most moving picture, I began to watch the artist who was copying it. I could not but admire the care and patience she displayed in adding touch to touch with such a watchful, earnest, loving purpose, ever turning her eyes to the beautiful original, and absorbed in the task of endeavoring to reproduce, as faithfully as in her lay, a likeness of its loveliness.

A train of thought was awakened in me as I watched her. Not in this manner, but in another and a nobler way, am I, too, called on to labor to produce a likeness of my blessed Lord. Not in lines and colors on a canvass, but in the lineaments and features of my character is my own soul to be conformed to the reality of my Savior's living self. Shall I ever succeed unless animated by a spirit of deepest love and admiration? Can I become like Him unless I be much with him, gazing on his glory and beauty, who is the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely? Should I not ever compare myself with his bright example, and strive earnestly to be in all things as he was? The copy this artist will produce will, after all, be valueless compared with the priceless original; but to those who cannot see that original, it will convey some faint idea of what its beauty is. So to the world that sees not Christ, know him not, and cares not for him—to that world am I called upon to be a revelation of him, so that in me they may see a witness, faint and far off though it be, to the glory of the only begotten Son of the Father, full of grace and truth. Fill me with thy love, O Christ! May I ever dwell in heart with Thee till, when thou shalt appear, I shall be altogether like thee when I shall see thee as thou art.—Evangelical Christendom.

His Pet.

A pigeon, which for six years was a pet of the late Thurlow Weed, for a long time showed, in a touching way, his appreciation of the loss of his master. Not long since, a gentleman called at the house, and the pigeon alighted on his shoulder, cooed, peered into the stranger's face, and then flew into an adjoining room.

"He has done that to every gentleman that has come into the house since father died," said Miss Weed, with a sigh.

"He takes most kindly to Gen. Bowen, who visits me occasionally, and who has been in feeble health some time and walks slowly.

"The bird will coo and fly to the general's shoulder, but when he sees that it is not my father, he will stop his cooing and find some other perch.

"Since the day that father's remains were carried away, the affectionate creature has been seeking for his master. He flies through every room in the house, and fairly haunts the library, where father spent most of his time with his pet.

"He will tread over every inch of space on the lounge, and then go on to the rug, over which he will walk repeatedly, as if in expectation of his dead master's coming."

"He invariably does this at meal-times, when our table is set in the back parlor, of which we now make a dining-room. He can see our table from the rug."

"Then you do not put him in a cage?"

"Oh, never!" was the response. "The ruin of the house has been his since he came into it. Other pigeons come into our yard frequently, and our pet sometimes joins them. He seldom stays long with them, but comes through one of the windows, and begins his search again through the house for my father."—Our Dumb Animals.

Heart-Beats.

Dr. B. W. Richardson, of London, the noted physician, says he was recently able to convey a considerable amount of conviction to an intelligent scholar by a simple experiment. The scholar was singing the praises of the "ruddy bumper," and saying he could not get through the day without it, when Dr. Richardson said to him:—

"Will you be good enough to feel my pulse as I stand here?'

"He did so. I said, 'Count it carefully; what does it say?'

"Your pulse says seventy-four."

"I then sat down in a chair and asked him to count it again. He did so, and said, 'Your pulse has gone down to seventy.'

"I then lay down on the lounge, and said: 'Will you take it again?'

"He replied, 'Why, it is only sixty-four; what an extraordinary thing!'

"I then said, 'When you lie down at night, that is the way nature gives your heart rest. You know nothing about it, but that beating organ is resting to that extent; and if you reckon it up it is a great deal of rest, because in lying down the heart is doing ten strokes less a minute. Multiply that by 60, and it is 600; multiply it by 8 hours, and within a fraction it is 5,000 strokes different; and as the heart is throwing 6 ounces of blood at every stroke, it makes a difference of 30,000 ounces of lifting during the night.'

"When I lie down at night without my alcohol, that is the rest my heart gets. But when you take your wine or grog, you do not allow that rest; for the influence of alcohol is to increase the number of strokes, and instead of getting this rest you put on something like 10,000 extra strokes, and the result is you rise up very seedy and quit for the next day's work till you have taken a little more of the "ruddy bumper," which you say is the soul of man below."—Scientific American.

Iowa Conference Report.

The Christian Association of Iowa, met with the Church at Irving, according to previous notice; the time being occupied by devotional exercises, until 9 o'clock on the 25th inst., at which time the Association was called to order by Bro. G. R. Chown; and a committee of three viz: Brethren Chown, Marsh and Johnson, to arrange for devotional services, after which business was adjourned until 9:30 o'clock, tomorrow, and Bro. C. C. Ramsey addressed the meeting. Bro. A. J. Eychaner preached in the afternoon, and Bro. Ramsey again in the evening. Met at 9:30 o'clock as per adjournment; and proceeded to election of officers for the ensuing year, which resulted as follows: Bro. G. R. Chown, Pres.; Bro. A. Hipsher, Vice Pres.; John Fitz, Sec., and Bro. Levi Marsh, Treasurer. The additional members of the Board were chosen as follows. Bro. Silas Peck, of New Hartford, Bro. J. Kisling of Marysville and Bro. A. J. Vanhorn, of Marshalltown. The committee appointed at our last meeting to examine the tent report in substance as follows: That they examined the tent on the 24th of last May, and found it badly damaged both in ropes and canvass, and that the cost of repairs would not be less than seventy-five dollars, and they doubted its being really worth that sum, when so repaired. Signed John E. Spear, John Steffer, Levi Marsh.

Report was accepted, and Committee discharged. And on motion the tent was placed in charge of the Board, to sell for what it would bring.

After which the subject of adopting some system of finance to support our meeting was brought up, and after some remarks was laid over till our next session, and Bro. Eychaner addressed the meeting from Roman viii. In the afternoon Bro. Goodenough preached from Mark ix. 1, after which the business was again resumed, and discussion of the finance continued without arriving at any definite system for future action.

A contribution was taken which amounted to about forty-seven dollars. Bro. Ramsey preached again in the evening. At half past nine Sunday morning, met for social exercises. At half-past ten, Bro. Ramsey again preached, at half-past two met for Bible lesson, subject, The Resurrection as set forth in 1 Cor. xv, after which a business session was called; minutes of this meeting read and approved and ordered sent to THE RESTITUTION for publication, and the meeting adjourned.

A letter was received from Brother Wright, of Minneapolis, Minn., and read at one of our meetings, expressing regret that he could not be with us, also telling of the brighter prospects of the cause of truth in his place, and expressing a hope that the Spirit of the Master would pervade our meeting. Which hope was fully realized throughout the meeting, and those who did the preaching all spoke the same things, and shunned not to declare the whole gospel in all its fullness as it was "before preached to Abraham."

Our brethren in Iowa are not afraid of this ancient gospel, that to hear it may induce some to wait for that due time out of which Paul was born, but they believe it is the "goodness of God that leads men to repentance," and further that there is no better way of showing forth that goodness than presenting this ancient gospel in all its length and breadth and height and depth. We hope that those who were at this meeting will be so encouraged; that they will not only make it a point to be at the next one but will try to bring others. They that would be godly must try to learn his character, his purpose and his attributes.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find $2.00 for my subscription to THE RESTITUTION due last June. I regard THE RESTITUTION as the best exponent of gospel truth published in these last days of Gentile fables and infidelity. There are a great many papers published claiming to give the truths of the gospel (and no doubt some of these papers do give more or less Bible truth), but of all the papers that I have seen or read, none to my mind give the whole truth in relation to the gospel of the kingdom of God, except THE RESTITUTION. Most, if not all, of the papers purporting to herald the gospel of the coming kingdom, ignore the Scriptural teaching of immersion as a prerequisite to the remission of sins. The restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel, the reign of Jesus the Christ over all nations, and the extermination of evil during that reign, are truths that pertain to the kingdom of God, and which I am sorry to say are ignored by a great many who profess to believe in the literal fulfilment of prophecy. All Scripture (not a part) is profitable for doctrine. Why not believe every declaration of God as well as some. I am glad we have such a paper as THE RESTITUTION that is not afraid to speak as the oracles of God, not shunning to declare his whole counsel, but rightly dividing the word of truth, giving to both Jew and Gentile whatever God in his word has promised them. The kingdom, of which the gospel has been the glad tidings for over 1800 years, will soon be set up; then many shall come from the east and from the west, and set down in the kingdom of God: this will be the great gathering together of the elect from the four corners of the earth to Jerusalem the city of the Great King, then we expect to meet all the brethren and sisters whose names and thoughts we so often see written in THE RESTITUTION. Wishing THE RESTITUTION abundant success and prosperity in heralding the glad tidings of coming deliverance from [illegible] and all evil, I am yours in [illegible] of the gospel. Please tell us in THE RESTITUTION what has become of Brother J. M. Stephenson.

Editor Restitution:

Dear Brother, I hardly know what to say that will express my regret at our not being able to pay for our paper before, for it has given me much trouble and humiliation. But I do indeed thank you for your kindness in sending so long past the time; indeed I do not know how we could do without it, living as we do so far from any body of believers, and never hearing preaching without going very far from home. It comes to us as a living preacher to keep us zealous in the Master's cause. Oh, how we love the letters and articles from so many, some of whom we have seen, and some whose acquaintance we have formed through its columns, and with what feelings of love do we greet each familiar name!

Today we have read the report of the "Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge," and from the depth of our hearts we say, God speed the work, and are resolved that soon our names must be added to its membership, and we are earnestly striving to scatter its publications as well as THE RESTITUTION among the people here, for I think that many of the members of the M. E. Church here will now read as we have so far succeeded in breaking down prejudice that they really depend upon my husband in their Bible class, and suffer me to teach a class of young people, notwithstanding we have never ceased to speak and teach the truth "in love." We send in this three dollars. Yours in Christian love,

MRS. H. D. PALMER.

KRAMER.—Mary R. Kramer, daughter of George R. and Jennie V. Kramer, died Oct. 2, 1884, aged 18 years.

She had been taught to fear and obey the Lord, had been baptized into "the Name above every name," and delighted to join in singing praise to God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Hence she was composed when brought near to death, and with a martyr-faith comforted her parents and friends by a beautiful, good confession: "I have committed myself to his care! My times are in his hands! It is not terrible to die young!" Such words express her triumphant faith, and in their value they outweigh the world! Amen! My address, noting the precise particularities of all terms that assure our matter-of-fact personality, in birth and life, death and destiny, was followed by one more personal from Brother Gomer. He seemed to give voice to the emotions of the younger membership of "the Church of the Blessed Hope." "To know Mary Kramer was to love her." This may convey the sum of his youthful and excellent address. The bereaved parents are sustained, uplifted, and brought nearer still to the "Resurrection and the Life;" and all of us got a glimpse and grasp of the victory now impending. Amen.

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—BY L. C. THOMAS.—

The above named work is now ready for delivery. It contains 350 pages, 12 mo., on good paper, substantially bound in cloth. Price $1.

Title Page.—"The Law, the Covenants; and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation; and an Appendix including various other subjects, in brief.

The perfect unchangable moral law is considered and shown to be the basis and spirit of the old Sinaitic law, now dead in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and lengthily examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, conditional immortality, the gospel, return of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, the one faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

Orders may be sent to The Restitution office for this work.

THE HEAVENLY FRIEND.

ANNA SHIPTON.

I have a Friend! a precious Friend, unchanging, wise, and true,
The chief among ten thousand! oh, I wish you knew him too!
Encompassed by a host of foes, weary in heart and limb,
I know who waits to soothe my woes: have you a Friend like him?
He comforts me, he strengthens me; how can I then repine!
He loveth me! This faithful Friend in life and death is mine.

I have a father, true and fond! He cares for all my needs;
His patience bore my faithless ways, my vain and foolish deeds!
To me he sends sweet messages; he watcheth but to bless:
Have you a father like to mine, with such deep tenderness!
For me a kingdom doth he keep, for me a crown is won;
I was a rebel once. He calls the rebel child his son.

I have a friend, unerring Guide! whose love I often grieve,
He brings me golden promises my heart can scarce receive;
He leadeth me, and hope and cheer doth for my path provide,
For dreary nights and days of drought; have you so sure a guide?
Quench not the feblest whisper that the heavenly Dove may bring,
He seeks with holy love to lure the wanderer 'neath his wing.

I have a home! a home so bright, its beauties none can know;
Its sapphire pavements, and such palms—none ever saw below;
Its golden streets resound with joy, its pearly gates with praise;
A temple standeth in the midst no hands could raise;
And there unfailing fountains flow, and pleasures never end.
Who makes that home so glorious? It is my loving Friend.

My Friend, my Father and my Guide, and this our radiant home,
Are offered you. Turn not away to-day, I pray you, "come."
My Father yearns to welcome you, his heart, his house, to share;
My Friend is yours, my home is yours; my Guide will lead you there;
Behold one altogether fair, the Faithful and the True!
He pleadeth with you for your love, he gave his life for you.

Oh, leave the worthless things you seek; they perish in a day.
Serve now the true and living God; from idols turn away;
Watch for the Lord, who comes to reign; enter the open door;
Give him thy heart, thy broken heart: thou'lt ask it back no more.
Trust him for grace, and strength, and love, and all thy troubles end;
Oh, come to Jesus! and behold in him my loving Friend.

A TOUR ROUND THE BIBLE WORLD.

The Bible world and the "Christian World" are two very different things. The one is as intensely Jewish as the other is intensely Gentile; and this is only another way of saying that the one is as truly light as the other is truly dark; for all the Divine light that has come to the world has come through Jewish channels, for of course Moses and the prophets were all Jews; and of course not less so Jesus and the apostles. Not only so, the writing is as strictly Jewish in character as the writers; and this is just as true of the New Testament as of the Old. The mere fact of the admission of the Gentiles to gospel privileges in New Testament times does not alter the character of the New Testament institution, nor change the complexion of the Apostolic message, which was as perfectly Israelitish as the writings of Moses. This will be apparent from several considerations; first, because the "one hope" (Eph. iv. 4) of the gospel is called also the "hope of Israel" Acts xviii. 20, and the "hope of the promise made to the (Israelitish) fathers" (Acts xxvi. 6); which it is evident Paul still entertained and preached after his conversion, and during the whole period of his mission to both Jew and Gentile. Second, for the reason that believing Gentiles are represented as being before time "aliens from the Commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 12), but now brought nigh by the blood of Christ by which the Abrahamic covenant was satisfied as it is said "this is the New Testament in my blood;" and again, as it is written "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision (or Jews) to confirm the promise made unto the (Jewish) fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). And then as corroborative of this it is expressly on record that if men be Christ's by faith and baptism then are they Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 27-29. Third, the very gospel itself is thoroughly Jewish in every aspect of it; there is nothing Gentile about it. Notice the continually recurring phrases "the Gospel of the Kingdom" (Matt. iv. 23), and "the glad tidings concerning the Kingdom of God" (Luke viii. 1). These are altogether Jewish terms; for undoubtedly the Kingdom of Israel for the period of its existence was the Kingdom of God upon earth. It is called in the Old Testament "the Kingdom of the Lord" and its throne "the throne of the Lord;" and Jesus himself addressing those in his day who still sat in Moses's seat said to them "the Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a people bringing forth the fruits thereof." This last quotation leaves no room for doubt, that the Kingdom of God up to Christ's Day was the Kingdom of Israel. And it is passing strange that anyone with the records before them should ever come to any other conclusion. Fourth, that the New Testament message was identical with the Abrahamic and Davidic hope of Israel is further evident in the promise that Christ made to the twelve that in the time of regeneration they should "sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" Matt. xix. 28; which is again confirmed by his testimony of Peter upon the day of Pentecost that God had raised Christ from the dead on purpose to sit on David's throne Acts ii. 30; and as Peter further puts it the very prediction of David in the 16th Psalm, that he should rise from the dead, was based on the promise to David that he should have a seed who should succeed him in his throne, which Peter interprets of Christ: and which so exactly agrees with the message delivered to Zedekiah the last King who sat upon the throne of Judah; the words are these "Thou profane wicked prince of Israel whose day is come when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God remove the diadem take off the crown; this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low (Christ), and abase him that is high (Zedekiah). I will overturn, and it shall be no more until he comes whose right it is (Christ); and I will give it him. Ezek. xxi. 25-26. Now here plainly, Christ is Zedekiah's successor; and if there were room for the shadow of a doubt about it it is set at rest by the joint testimony of Isaiah ix. 6-7 and Luke who both say that "the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever" Luke i. 32-33. Besides this was the very confession of Nathaniel whom Christ describes as an Israelite without guile; addressing Christ said unto him, "Rabbi thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel" John i. 49. And then there has to be added to this then that the crucified one was not only Jesus, but according to the superscription "Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews." People who only see the blood and nails of Calvary don't look high enough or they would see both his claim, and the ground of his crucifixion. And this is all in keeping with the enquiry of the wise men from the east "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" And then again alongside all this, it has to be remembered that in the apostolic preaching of the gospel of the kingdom their constant appeal was to the old Testament in support of all they advanced; take one illustration from Paul of whom it is recorded that he "expounded and testified of the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus both out of the law of Moses and the prophets from morning till evening." Acts xxviii. 23. And to the like effect is Peter's testimony that the heavens would retain Christ until the times of restitution spoken of by all the prophets Acts iii. 21. Now that this restitution or restoration is a matter testified to in all the prophets is the most perfect evidence possible that it is the restoration of the kingdom to Israel that Peter is talking about, for about no other sort of restoration do the prophets speak. But of these restitution features of the now overturned kingdom of Israel the prophetic writings are literally full from one end to the other. Just take a few random quotations as specimens of the bulk. "I will restore thy judges as at the first." "He that scattereth Israel will gather him." "He shall choose Jerusalem again." "The ransomed of the Lord shall return to Zion." "The Lord shall set his hand a second time to recover the remnant of his people." "In that day I will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen." It is this latter quotation from Amos ix. ii., that James incorporates in his address in Acts xv. 16. Indeed the whole New Testament is so largely made up of quotation and reference to the Old that its dimensions would be considerably reduced were these to be abstracted. All of which constitutes the most unimpeachable evidence that the gospel hope and the gospel prospect is altogether Israelitish, even as Jesus said "Salvation is of the Jews," and not only of them in the sense of having come from them, but on the contrary, as it is Jewish in its origin, so also it is Jewish in its character, Jewish in its channel, and Jewish in its end and completion, for the gospel is an invitation to joint heirship with Christ of this very kingdom, and the land upon which it has already existed once for a thousand years. In a word the sum of the New Testament institution is this; that the new covenant kingdom is the kingdom of Israel, the new covenant promises are those made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob respecting the land of Canaan, and with David respecting the kingdom and throne, and the new covenant blood by which the Abrahamic and Davidic promises are confirmed is the blood of Christ, and the new covenant people are believers of the gospel of the kingdom, both Jews and Gentiles, possessing Abraham's faith and disposition, as the condition of final rulership and inheritance in the restored kingdom of God upon earth, and the ... covenant life is a life of the resurrected and immortalised body, such as Christ now has, and such as Abraham and all the prophets will have when they enter upon their promised reward at the resurrection, even as it is said "thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just," and again "the meek shall inherit the earth," and again, the "kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ," and again "the earth shall be full of the glory of the Lord." It was on this principle that Paul styles Abraham "the heir of the world," and upon the same principle that Christ promises those who overcome power over the nations." Rev. ii. 28. These facts will prepare us for the more detailed survey which we are now to make. Beginning with Genesis we shall take a brief notice of the things which are more or less related to the thousand generation covenant Psa. cv. 8, as we thread our way from book to book. These things altogether may be roughly resolved into two general departments, which may be defined as the picture and the back ground. The picture is the purpose of God upon earth, the background consists of the dark human conditions of sin, mortality, death, and the grave, upon which the picture for the present as a matter of purpose is drawn, but which are destined at last to disappear from the canvass, and leave only the golden and eternal realities represented by the spirit's pencil. Beginning then with Genesis we have here the foundations upon which everything else is built in the writings of the prophets, the preaching Christ, and the teaching of the Apostles, as it is written of Christ beginning at Moses and all the prophets he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself," and again, as Paul puts it "now to Abraham and his seed were the promises make," and again addressing the Ephesian believers he says "Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone," and again Paul testifies of himself as "saying none other things than those which Moses and the prophets did say should come to pass" Acts xxvi. 22, and to the same effect again are the reproving words of Jesus to the Jews "had ye believed Moses ye would have believed me," from which it appears that the belief of Christ stands or falls with the belief of Moses, and therefore an unbeliever of Moses is an unbeliever of Christ. And this is strengthened again by another testimony from the same speaker who also says "if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead," Luke xvi. 31. So in view of these things we may rest assured that we are not misplacing our confidence when we yield ourselves up to the guidance of the Old Testament in all matters of faith and hope, as will more and more appear to us to be the right thing as we proceed, for it must be remembered that it was of these old Scriptures that Paul spake when he said they were "able to make us wise unto salvation," and when again the noble-minded Boreans were commended, it was because they searched those same Scriptures to see if the apostolic testimony was according thereto. And then Paul again so very plainly tells us that the gospel was preached to Abraham in the words which foretold a condition of blessedness for all nations of the earth, Gal. iii. 8, and to the same purpose when he says that the gospel was preached to the Israelites in the wilderness Heb. iv. 2. In fact this universal preference for the New Testament to the neglect and disparagement of the Old, is one of the surest signs that it is not the Bible gospel they are believing at all who do this, but another gospel and another Christ altogether than what is propounded for our faith not less equally in Moses and the prophets than in the New Testament. To more superficial observers there is an appearance of conflict in this view with the fact that the Old Testament institution is both abolished and superseded in Christ. But their mistake arises from the common error of supposing that the whole testament which is done away is identical with, and comprehensive of the earlier writings of Moses, and the later writings of the prophets, but this is not so at all. The testament which is now abrogated, is purely and simply the code of constitution under which Israel occupied the land of Canaan in the time of their establishment under Moses, the judges and kings. This code is defined in the statutes and judgments enunciated in the four books known as Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy. These enactments in relation to the conditional tenure of the land under Moses' system constitute the Old Testament or covenant in the proper restricted sense that belongs to its abolition. The law was simply an added thing as Paul says "added because of transgression till the seed should come" to whom the original promise of the land was made, Gal. iii. 19, so that the law which was four hundred and thirty years after this Abrahamic covenant does not (as Paul says) disannul or make of none effect the original promise Gal. iii. 17. For Paul makes a vital distinction between the inheritance of the land under the law and in fulfillment of the promise. His reasoning is conclusive; listen, "if the inheritance be of the law it is no more of promise, but God gave it to Abraham by promise" Gal. iii. 18, so that it is manifest that the occupancy under the law was intentionally temporary and intended in due time to give place to the inheritance of the land under the new covenant promise which was made to Abraham. This covenant conveys both land and life to the inheritor, in other words it is a covenant which first provides for the rulers and their resurrection and subsequently immortalization; and makes secondary provision for the reoccupancy of the land by the Israel after the flesh under the administration of the blessedness which is peculiar to the new covenant, which Jeremiah says is yet to be made with the people whom God brought out of the land of Egypt. Jer. xxxi. 31-40. A covenant which any one can see the nation of Israel has never yet been placed under; for up to this time they have as a nation been under but the one old covenant which they have broken;—but they are not yet to be placed under one which they won't break; as it is written in Ezekiah "I will bring you into the bond of the covenant, and plead with you as I did with your fathers in the wilderness." The whole matter is so environed with testimony on its four sides, that there is no escape from the conclusion, that the leaders of the "Christian World" as it is called are just as dark as bats on the true meaning of the Bible and its final bearing upon society at large. They have so occupied themselves with the dreams of disembodied glory, that as a rule they are in no frame of mind for addressing themselves to these sober realities of the Divine purpose. A purpose that has absolutely nothing in common with the ghostly gospel of the pulpits. For the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory is a thing that has wholly to do with the earth and man upon it. Where sin entered grace has already abounded; but this is not all; for where grace has abounded life and incorruptible existence shall at last prevail over all; in the absence of sin, death and every form of curse that now clings to human affairs upon earth." The creator's decree is irrevocable, "he will not turn from it" as David says "of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne," and "As truly as I live saith Yahwah (mispronounced Jehovah) the whole earth shall be filled with my glory." The books in the Bible so to speak are just so many pillars in the same temple, so many stars in the same firmament, so many steps in the same ladder, or so many chapters in the same book, that is, whilst there is almost infinite diversity of details, there is a unity of purpose pervades the whole, but as it was with the Jewish Rabbins in the times of Christ, so it is now with the Gentile "Rev.'s" they have taken away the "key of knowledge," and so men least perceive the truth where it most abounds, and least discern the governing purpose of God, where it asserts itself the loudest and the most frequently.

This alone Jesus further described as "blind guides," offering a work on behalf of both the people and themselves which he pictures as a joint "fall into the ditch." Such is not less the position of things in our day. The people having itching ears have as Paul predicted they would, heaped to themselves legions of ear-tickling teachers, who instead of instructing them in the true state of human affairs from the Divine point of view, and the true purpose of God upon earth as revealed in the Scriptures, have occupied their attention with ceaseless rounds of text-taking apologies for the fabulous, in exact fulfilment of the apostle's words "They shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned into fables" 2 Tim. iv. 4. And this is the inevitable effect of all mere text-taking handling of the Scriptures.

A method which if admissable at all could only be so in the one department of the book of Proverbs; but which as usually applied indiscriminately to all other sections of the Scriptures is simply destructive of their real object which is not merely to put men in possession of detached enunciations of wisdom (as in the case of the proverbs) but to give them also, and for the most part, a connected and historical outline of the nature and working out of the Divine purpose upon earth from first to last. Of this the people everywhere are universally ignorant, they have no connected view of the matter, no general scheme before the mind which provides an essential place for all the books, and establishes a vital and consistent connection between all these historical departments of a gradually unfolding and enlarging purpose. But on the other hand their first principles begin and end with the soul of man which they erroneously conceive to be one of the most important actualities in the universe, and matter of the most unbounded solicitude and design on the part of God, and properly a thing of the supremest concern and the most ceaseless and unlimited effort on the part of man. Their theories about the soul's divine nature, its great capacities, its vast importance, and the immense disproportion of all other things to the soul's eternal greatness which they describe as "eternal as its sire," with an immortal destiny before it, in which it will survive the wreck and crash of worlds. Hence when a minister or writer begins to describe such a soul he naturally feels that he has a boundless and unclouded prospect before him, and this lends wings to his fertile imagination and he soars aloft beyond the bounds of time and space with increasing fervor at every step, carrying all before him in his eloquent and impassioned flattery of its divine powers and its divine future in the saved state, and on the other hand the unutterable awfulness of, its final and interminable realization, should it fail of being saved by the clerical gospel.

Now all this is but a "refuge of lies," which is blown away like, before the wholesome breezes of the spirit—take just a few illustrations from its robust utterances, "Cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of" Isa. ii. 22, "What is man that thou are mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him" Psa. viii. 4; "Man giveth up the ghost and where is he?" Job xiv. 10; "What is your life? it is even a vapor, which appeareth for a little time, and then vanishes away" Jas. iv. 14; "Take no thought for your life what you shall eat or what you shall drink' Matt. vi. 25; and this last quotation from the very lips of Christ has more force in it than is ever conceived of by any other dox congregation in the three kingdoms; for it is in a single breath the completest confutation of all the soul sermons that ever bewitched the reasons of the pious multitudes since Christ was here.

The simple facts of the case are these: that the very thing which Jesus here forbids men to take any thought about is the soul, for the word psuche which he here employs, and which our translators have rendered life, is the very Greek word which in every case in the New Testament is rendered soul; from which it must be evident to every Scripturally-intelligent person that in Christ's estimation soul and animal life are identical things; and hence the common exhortation to poor sinners to think about their immortal souls, and concentrate their efforts upon its salvation, must be seen to be as fictitious in its assumptions as it is utterly sorcerizing in its pernicious effects, and damning in its final consequences. And this too in the very first lie that ever was breathed since man was upon earth, and which first originated in the serpent's subtile negation of the Divine sentence which decreed man's return to the earth on account of transgression. "Ye shall not" said this shrewd but shallow reasoner, "Ye shall not surely die, for then as God knows, your eyes shall be opened; and ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil" Gen. iii. 5.

Now all the immortal soul sermonizing in the world is but the ceaseless amplication of a doctrine which was first preached by the Edenic serpent Paul predicted they would, heaped to themselves legions of ear-tickling teachers, who instead of instructing them in the true state of human affairs from the Divine point of view, and the true purpose of God upon earth as revealed in the Scriptures, have occupied their attention with ceaseless rounds of text-taking apologies for the fabulous, in exact fulfilment of the apostle's words "They shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned into fables" 2 Tim. iv. 4. # The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JANUARY 7, 1885 NO. 1.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the literal restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the obedient; and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the first—repentance, sanctification, preparation to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Why the Speedy Coming of the Lord Is Not Expected.

In proclaiming the truth that the Lord will soon return to this earth, and now near we are, the preacher is often met with objections. Many earnest Christian people fail to recognize it as truth. The objections are many and various, a few of them are here summarized in the words as near as possible of the objectors:

"But the Church has long expected the Advent, which has not yet come. So much the more reason to expect it may be near. The triumphal chariot has never rested on its onward course. If it seem to tarry, we are still to wait for it; it will surely come: it will not tarry." The longer a swift messenger has been on his way, the nearer he must now be. The length of the period of expectancy is a sign of the shortness of the period which yet intervenes.

THE TRUE OF THIS AGE.

We are living in an age when many are disposed to idolize law rather than worship the Law-Maker. And some bring discredit on true science by asserting that law is supreme absolutely, that from the ages past, and during the ages future, the forces of nature are invariable, uncontrolled, supreme; that all things move in an unchanging circle without an intelligent Ruler; and that to the universe of material forces alone the ascription is applicable, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be." In their [illegible] Second Advent, with new [illegible] earth is impossible. [illegible] sign of the [illegible] is be- [illegible] end of his [illegible] the fathers fell [illegible] things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation?" "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing; that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness" (2 Pet. iii. 4, 8, 9).

It may be said that the nearness of the Advent is unlikely without some premonitory signs. When the rising sun is near the horizon, though itself hidden, the clouds reflect its radiance and tell its near approach: and if Christ is at hand to drive away the darkness of sin and sorrow might we not expect to see his glory afar off? Instead, men pursue their usual occupations as if the Advent were a dream. They build palaces, and construct railways, and pierce mountains, and open new channels for commerce, as if certified of centuries to come; and pleasure was never more eager in arraying itself with varied vesture, and furnishing increased supplies for an ever-increasing demand; and sin is checked by no fears of judgment trumpet about to sound; and armies are trained, and giant navies equipped, and political schemes nurtured, requiring long years for their use and development. Does not all this indicate the remoteness of the end? Nay! this confirms our hope. (Matt. xxiv. 36-42).

The Second Advent may, therefore, be regarded as not necessarily so distant as it must be if preceded first by the period required to evangelize the world, and then by the thousand years of righteousness and peace. Rather may it be looked for before such universal triumph of Gospel truth. As a cause of such Millennium, not a consequence, the Lord may come. We are therefore, not to postpone our hopes till sin and sorrow have ceased to overshadow the earth; but this darkness and this prevailing wrong against which we prevail so little, may lead us to hope and pray that our Lord will come and scatter the darkness, and set right the wrong.

"Why should not the presence of Christ by His Spirit be regarded as his Advent?" Because more than this is expressed in His word, and was expected by the apostles and early Church. The "same Jesus" who ascended to heaven is to be seen in like manner "coming from heaven. Every eye shall see Him."

"Is not such a universal vision of Christ physically impossible?" It is not necessary that every eye should behold him at the same moment. The natural sun is beheld within twenty-four hours from all quarters of the globe. We are not to anticipate miraculous event by present phenomena. "With God all things are possible."

It is derogatory to suppose that the Lord will again humble himself to human conditions by dwelling with men." This is not supposed.

As after the resurrection he appeared to his disciples in human form, but not subjected to material laws so during his personal reign it may be universally known by his various appearances, that Christ is really among men.

Faith without vision is superior to sight, he said. Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed." But Saul of Tarsus was converted through the instrumentality of external vision, and his subsequent career did not suggest inferiority in the method of his spiritual birth. And all believers expect to see him in glory, and regard this not as a retrogression, but as the consummation of their spiritual perfection and bliss.

"God will never return from the building to the scaffolding, from the winged insect to the creeping caterpillar." But the use of outward signs is not necessarily a going backward. Any sign from heaven heralded the giving of the law and so the Resurrection prefaced the publication of the Gospel to the world, so "The sign of the Son of Man in heaven" to introduce the Millennial reign, would not be a new method, but a development of the old.

"A visible Advent implies that the [illegible] and the Word are inferior [illegible] ment, yet ignored [illegible] at the First Advent, the Spirit and the Word are attended with the access of power. So, hereafter, the signs of the Second Advent will not supersede, but give emphasis to these same influences.

"These views discourage effort in the use of the present agencies," on the contrary. The little progress compared with the population, the prevalence of heathenism and cruelty, wickedness and woe, after eighteen centuries of the gospel preaching are merely to discourage, or rouse, that the certainty of Christ soon appearing to bring the work to a more actual issue. Your real disciple would be influenced by the argument that as Christ Himself is coming to secure the conversion of the world, we may cease from our work? Every true Christian loves his Lord, who said, "If ye love Me, keep My commandments" and His command is "Preach the Gospel to every creature." He says to each of us, this, work to-day in My vineyard." What he will do is one thing, what he bids me do is another. How can my love for his appearing and my hope that it may be near, induce me to be unfaithful to my allegiance and negligent of his commands? By desisting from our own work because we expect he will soon come to perform his, we render ourselves unprepared for the appearing which we profess to expect and desire. He said "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing."

Doing, not dreaming; fulfilling his own allotted task now, not speculating on what the Master will do hereafter.

The disciples fell into this error of inquiring about the time of their Lord's coming rather than about their work meanwhile: "Lord wilt Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" He did not satisfy their curiosity, but he admonishes them of their duty, and promised them needful help. "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons; but ye shall receive power, and ye shall be My witnesses" (Acts i. 6-8). Just so, we are not to be so anxious to know when or how he will appear, as what is our duty, and how we may best be prepared whenever he may come. The nearer the Advent, the stronger the motive to be prepared for it. If Christ may at any moment come to the earth, at every moment I ought to be so at work for him that, coming suddenly, he may find me at my post wakeful and working, and say, "Well done, good and faithful servant!" How then can the expectation of his speedy Advent diminish missionary zeal?

On the contrary, it should urge to more diligent service. "Wherefore, gird up the loins of your mind; be sober and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. i. 13).—Newness Hall, in the Watchword and Signs of Our Time.

Difficulties in the First Two Chapters in St. Matthew.

The Christadelphian for June, 1882, contained an interesting article entitled "The authenticity of the first two chapters of Matthew and Luke," which consisted mainly of a condensation of the evidence in support of the authenticity of those chapters from a book published in 1822: and the majority of those who carefully read that article would doubtless admit that the evidence was simply overwhelming, seeing that these chapters are contained in some 300 manuscripts, and absent from only one MS. known at the time the book was written. It may be noticed in passing that the book referred to was published over sixty years ago, since which time other MSS. have been discovered, but even were the chapters in question omitted from all the MSS. discovered since 1822, that fact would weigh almost nothing as against the abundant evidence on the other side. The external evidence, then, must be conclusive to those who have no preconceived theory to support, such as that Jesus was the son of Joseph, to establish which the abandonment of these chapters is an absolute necessity.

But some have experienced a difficulty in regard to the first two chapters of Matthew, in the fact that they contain certain things which they cannot explain satisfactorily, viz., several quotations of Old Testament prophecies which are applied by Matthew to events occurring in the days of Christ, and that the Word express both are in the Greek. The writer of the New Testament [illegible] used the word in the [illegible]

In a note on Matt. [illegible] "This expression is [illegible] xi. 1 [illegible] God calling his people out of Egypt under Moses. See Exod. iv. 22, 23. It might be said [illegible] calling Jesus from Egypt, because the words in Hosea speak expressed this also. The same [illegible] which led him to deliver his people Israel from the land of Egypt, now led him also to deliver his Son from that place. The words used by Hosea would express both events. Perhaps also, the place in Hosea became a type, to express any great deliverance from danger; and thus it could be said to be fulfilled in Christ, as other prophecies are in cases to which they are applicable. It cannot be supposed that the passage in Hosea was a prophecy of the Messiah, but was only used by Matthew appropriately to express the event."

Respecting the quotation from Jeremiah in Matt. ii. 17, 18, Mr. Barnes remarks:—"This quotation is from Jeremiah xxxi. 15. The word fulfilled, here, is taken evidently in the sense that the words in Jeremiah aptly express the event which Matthew was recording. The original design of this prophecy was to describe the sorrowful departure of the people into captivity, [illegible] the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The captives were assembled at Ramah. Jeremiah himself being in chains, and there the fate of those who had escaped in the destruction of the city was decided at the will of the conqueror (Jer. xl. 1). The mother had been slain, and the cry of their king put out after the murder of his sons before his sight, and the people were then gathered at Rama in chains, whence they were to start on their mournful journey, slaves to a cruel monarch, heaven, behind them all that was dear in life. The sadness of such a scene is well expressed in the language of the prophet, and no less [illegible] aptly applies to the melancholy event which the evangelist records, and there could be no impropriety in his using it as a quotation."

Lastly, concerning the words in Matt. ii. 23, "He shall be called a Nazarene," Mr. Barnes gives the following very reasonable explanation:—"The words here are not found in any of the books of the Old Testament; and there has been much difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of this passage. Some have supposed that Matthew means to refer to Judges xiii. 5, to Samson as a type of Christ; others that he refers to Isaiah xi. 1, where the descendant of Jesse is called a Branch;' in the Hebrew Netzer. Some have supposed that Matthew refers to some prophecy which was not recorded, but handed down by tradition. But these suppositions are not satisfactory. It is a great deal more probable that Matthew refers not to any particular place, but to the leading characteristics of the prophecies respecting him. The following remarks may make this clear: He does not say, 'by the prophet,' as in chap. i. 22; ii. 5, 15; but 'by the prophets,' meaning no one particularly, but the general character of the prophecies. 2nd. The leading and most prominent prophecies respecting him were, that he was to be a humble life, to be despised and rejected (see Isa liii. 2, 3, 7-9, 12; Psa. xxii). 3rd. The phrase, 'he shall be called,' means the same as he shall be. 4th. The character of the people of Nazareth was such that they were proverbially despised and condemned (John i. 46; vii. 52). To come from Nazareth, therefore, or to be Nazarene, was the same as to be despised, and esteemed of low birth, to be a root out of dry ground, having no form or comeliness. And this was the same as had been predicted by the prophets. When Matthew says, therefore, that the prophecies were fulfilled, it means that [illegible] the prophecies in the prophets that he should be [illegible] humble life, and rejected, [illegible] Nazareth, and [illegible] what Nazareth and [illegible]

[illegible] first intended to apply to this particular thing, but that they [illegible] especially express the [illegible] of events may be appropriately [illegible] so of this word [illegible] and that the word expresses both [illegible] are united. The writers of the New Testament frequently [illegible] used the word in this [illegible]

In a note on Matt. [illegible] "This expression is [illegible] xi. 1 [illegible] God calling his people out of Egypt under Moses. See Exod. iv. 22, 23. It might be said [illegible] calling Jesus from Egypt, because the words in Hosea spoken expressed this also. ### THE NEGRO RACE.

Colored Methodist Bishop on the Future of His People.

LOUISVILLE, Aug. 20.—Bishop H. M. Turner, D. D., LL. D., of the M. E. Church arrived in the city a few days ago. He is the first colored man on whom the [illegible] D., LL. D., has conferred, and it is a well-deserved honor, one which he has graced. He is a man of fine education, by overcoming the most stupendous difficulties, and a great, [illegible] gentleman, a thorough [illegible] and a splendid theologian. He was asked yesterday: "What do you think is to be the future destiny of the Negro in this country?"

"I am sorry to say you and I will not live to see it, for I take quite a different view of it from the bearing that it may have. Many of them [illegible] we will finally mix up with the whites and bleach out and lose our race and color, and thus be swallowed up in the great American population. I have no words that can express my contempt for such leaders. Such nonsense not only degrades the race, but charges God with folly. No, sir, black is here and here to stay by the unalterable arrangement of Heaven. Black men will stride the earth till the world ends, regardless of these theories. In the near future the ground will tremble beneath the tread of their greatness. There is a mighty future for the Negro race, bear in mind. He is only a boy yet; it will require centuries to advance him to maturity, and millenniums to bring him to dotage. His name will yet shine upon the scroll of fame like the face of Jupiter on the midnight Heavens.

"But here is what my people do not like to hear. That distinction will not be reached in this country. No, never, never! Such is not the programme of the Almighty. It is only to be attained on the continent of Africa, and from there go out to the ends of the earth. Therefore the colored race must return to Africa, carry the education and the Christianity and the other virtues, civilities and graces he has imbibed from whites, and there demonstrate his greatness. It may take years and generations to bring it about, but it will come as sure as darkness will come this evening or light in the morning. Slavery was not an Divine institution, but was a providential institution. It possibly took just such an ordeal as that to Christianize and enlighten the Negro race, and place them in a condition to progress in all the phases of an enlightened civilization. God saw that they could be ministered for more successfully by bringing them here at the time than by awaiting the tardy motion of the corrupt Church of that day and ecclesiastical dispensation.

"Do you thing the colored people will favor a return to Africa in any considerable numbers?"

"Well, yes. It will be some time yet, however, for they almost hate the name of Africa at present. Still there is a great change over that which existed some years ago. The wonderful discoveries of African wealth which are being brought to notice, and people live longer there than anywhere on the globe, and that great nations and kingdoms are being found with an excellent civilization, and that she offers everything desirable to the Negro, will soon begin to attract the attention of our progressive young men, and there will be quite a movement in that direction. Also our churches have begun to wake up to a sense of their responsibility. I am now the collecting agent of a fund to educate and train teachers and preachers for Africa, and occasionally I get a little money for the object. True, the whites give me more than the colored do for that object. I have gathered up enough to place a few students in college for that purpose, and I hope to increase the number soon. God is raising up friends for Africa in all parts of the globe to a man [illegible] extent, and it means something. I think it means the speedy redemption of that continent and the restoration of her scattered children to her bosom."

Teach self-denial and make its practice pleasurable, and you create for it a world a destiny more sublime [illegible] lesse constant, incessant but [illegible] dreamer [illegible] ll properly improved, far- [illegible] moral discipline.

General Gordon on Eternal Torment.

"I quite wonder at the long time it has taken us to see that the general doctrine of the Church is so erroneous. Think over what I say. Is not the preaching of every place of worship you have ever entered this? 'If you do well, you will be saved; if you do ill, you will be damned.' Where is the Gospel or 'good news' in this? I know it, for the law says it; it is implanted in every human being, but the 'good news' is, 'Whatever you do, God, for His Son's sake, pardons you' and thus the love of God constraineth us from evil. For one feels that, enticing as it is it is not compared to the peace one casts a from being in accord with him. When one thinks of the millions on whom weighs that yoke of bondage one wonders. I do not know a single person who says the real truth straight out. When one thinks of the real agony one has gone through in consequence of false teaching, it makes human nature angry with the teachers who have added to the bitterness of life. Nothing can be more abject and miserable than the usual conception of God. Imagine to yourself what pleasure would it be to him to burn us to torture us? Can we believe a human being capable of creating for such a purpose? Would it show his power? Why, he is omnipotent! Would it show his justice? His righteous—no one will deny it. To credit God with attributes which are utterly hateful to the meanest of Looking at our darkness of vision can he be what we credit him

THE LABOR OF LO

A century ago, in the north stood an old cathedral, upon arches of which was a noble of wondrous beauty. It was filled, until one day the light ing through a slanted window its matchless features. And year by year, upon the day brief hour it was thus illumin came and waited, nearly to a glimpse of that history. When the cathedral being built, an old man, bro the weight of years and cares, besought the architect to let him upon it. Out of pity for his fearful lest his failing sight and ling touch might mar some fair the master set him to work in the ows of the vaulted roof. One day found the old man asleep in death, tools of his craft laid in order be him, the cunning of his right hand gone, his face upturned to this other than by awaiting the tardy motion of the corrupt Church of that day and ecclesiastical dispensation. vellous face which he had wrought there— the face of one whom he had loved and lost in his early manhood. And when the artists and sculptors and workmen from all parts of the cathedral came and look upon that face they said: "This is the grandest work of all; love wrought this."

In the great cathedral of ages— the temple being builded for an habitation of God—we shall learn some time that love's work is the grandest of all.

Duties of Daily Life.

Life is not entirely made up of great evils or heavy trials; but the perpetual recurrence of petty evils and small trials is the ordinary and appointed exercise of the Christian graces. To bear with the feelings of those about us—with their infirmities, their bad judgment, their ill breeding, their perverse tempers—to endure neglect when we feel we deserve attention, and ingratitude where we expect thanks; to bear with the company of disagreeable people whom Providence has placed in our way and whom he has provided on purpose for the trial of our virtue, these are the best exercises of patience and self-denial, and the better because not chosen by ourselves. To bear with vexation in business with disappointment in our expectations, with interruptions of our retirement, with folly, intrusions, disturbance—in short, with whatever opposes our will or contradicts our humor—this habitual acquiescence appears to be more of the essence of self-denial than any little [illegible] afflictions of our own imposing.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New Year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, as long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others.

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

that this is written for you, if you [are] in arrears, or have not renewed for [1885]. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend [to it] in a few days," but act right [now]. We need the money at this [present] time.

REMEMBER

in sending your remittance that [sums] of money are lost every [month] in the careless manner in which [many] their subscriptions to some [extent]. If you can, please get a Post Office [Money] Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter [registered]. Drafts and Bank Checks, [costing] from twenty-five to forty [cents] to collect each one. If you are [compelled] to send postage stamps buy [some] of the one or two cent denomination. We do not want large ones.

A. B. UNDERWOOD, Agent.

Be patient about communications. We do the best we can. If long ones were made shorter, we could find them place sooner.

REMEMBER THE RESTITUTION. We will do all we can to make its columns instructive, edifying, and interesting, whether by labor or sacrifice.

For some doctrines affoat concerning the inherent nature of our Lord Jesus Christ we have no sympathy. While believing that he is the seed of David according to the flesh, we believe that he is also the SON OF GOD in the proper, highest and most definite acceptation of that relationship; and hence Immanuel—God with us.

THIS YEAR ALSO.

Another year of the dispensation of the grace of God has departed and left only its records on the tablets of memory and on the scrolls of history. Its sunshine and its shadows have alike vanished. By human lips its cups of blessing and its bowls of bitterness have been emptied. Its marriage bells and its funeral knells have pealed out in gladness or sorrow, and eternally hushed their echos in the voiceless silences. Its political upheavals have subsided into a treacherous calm. The tornado has swept the surface of the earth with the besom of destruction, and the earthquake has rocked the foundations of the everlasting hills. The pestilence has walked in darkness, and destruction has wasted at noonday. The gospel has won some trophies, and the wicked have done wickedly.

As it was in Noah's time, such have been the deeds of violence, and as it was in Sodom, such have been the moral pollutions, that have crimsoned and fouled the pages of the recording journals of 1884. The left-over part of the church have sold the most [precious] to some precious ones of the [household] of faith, and the departed [saints] have [gone] from this present evil world[ly] Jesus. The olden [harvest] [voices] of the age to [come]. Behold (says he) I come quickly! Even so come Lord Jesus, to salvation, resurrection and restitution of all things spoken. Amen.

The heralds of approaching doom have appealed to an ungodly world in earnest, affectionate, and solemn warning; the scoffer has mocked the messenger; and the infidel has blasphemously mouthed the heavens, and said—There is no God. With the unparalleled tribulation impending we leave 1884 in the soundless abysms of the past, to enter upon the scenes to be enacted in the drama of—This year also—1885.

The veil that hides from our sight the events of coming years is a veil woven by the hand of mercy. We know not what a day may bring forth; much less what the unfoldings of destiny may disclose before "this year also" shall have been numbered with the vanished ages.

The dark angel of death may have only folded his wings in order to spread them for a wider, wilder flight to scatter pestilence and plague. The summer sun may quicken the hybernating vermin for a course of devastating rain. The upheaving and chasm-forming earthquake may give thousands a funeral and a tomb in an hour. The war-trumpet may summon the armies of the angry nations to the Armageddon conflict. As the year now past has been a year of bane and blessing, so "this year also," may bring grief and gladness. Among possible events may be the overleaping from among dead ones of the glorified church. The Patriarchal sleepers may vacate the closely guarded cave of Machpelah. The ashes of the myriads burned in the fires of Rome Pagan and Papal may be reorganized into indestructible forms. The entombed dust of countless saints may be refashioned into the likeness of Christ's most glorious body. And, O living, left-over part of the church of the Living God; before "this year also" shall close, thy translation change may come, and the Redeemer's own hands wreathe thy temples with the fadeless crowns.

In the "year of the redeemed" will be the hallowed greetings of the sanctified and saved; and "this year also" may usher in the year that glorifies the mystic body.

"Farewell, old year; we walk no more together,
But here in quiet happiness we peer;
And from thy wrath of faded fear and weather
I take some prays, as we are closing now."

1885.

"This year also" comes as a boon of mercy. But to some of our readers it will be the last. Among the folded hands over a pulseless heart may be the one that pencils these lines. Whether we live may we live unto the Lord, or whether we die may we die unto the Lord.

Literary Notices and Commendations.

We are happy in our first number for the year 1885 to insert the following commendations of Brother Weethee's new book, "The Coming Age." The first, it will be seen, is from Brother J. B. Cook; the second from the Hon. Judge H. S. Bundy, a member of the M. E. Church and formerly a member of Congress, and a citizen of wealth and refinement in the place from which he writes; and the third is from the Waynesburgh Messenger, published at Waynesburgh, Pa. We have a copy of the work and most heartily concur with the sentiments of praise expressed in these testimonials. The work may be obtained of the author, Millfield, Ohio, handsomely bound in cloth, for $3.00.

"The Coming Age," by J. P. Weethee, exceeds expectation. Its basis is, "The Word of the Lord," that outlines the events of our gospel age. Its materials are the realities that fit and fill them out, as our right hand uses the left. Its reverence for revelation and fidelity to history should command regard and acceptance.

Those who have lived outside of this idea of "Present Truth" may be surprised at its simplicity and power, touching the "proximity" of the second coming—now next in order.

The living word has unfolded through its grandest stages into the "quickly!" Now the second coming is the immediate event. Amen!

The pregnant portions of prophecy through the "four" Gentile kingdoms, have become the fundamental facts of history, as to number, idolatrous character, Latin race of the fourth (as distinctive from its preceding three), its geography, the seven hills of Rome, its special subdivisions or ten kingdoms, its Imperial Bishop overriding the whole as with "a rod of iron!" And now at the time of the end," travel and the spread of knowledge fill the prophetic portraiture on to [this] present evil world[ly] [voices] of the age to come." Behold (says he) I come quickly! Even so come Lord Jesus, to salvation, resurrection and restitution of all things spoken. Amen.

It is a splendid book, worth ten times its cost. It is altogether edifying.

J. B. COOK.

WELLSTON, O.

J. P. Weethee:

DEAR SIR:—The "Coming Age" came in due time. Your intimation that pressing business might prevent such thorough examination of the work as it otherwise would command, is true in my case. From such hasty and superficial perusal as time permitted, I am strongly impressed with the great labor, learning and research that produced the book. It will certainly command the attention and interest of the student of prophecy and the great events elucidating it.

To those who take no interest in such matters it may seem too profound and thorough to command its study and conclusions, while to the earnest student of history, sacred and profane, the "Coming Age" will be regarded as a valuable addition to the public or private library. I hope it will have such wide circulation as its merits demand. Yours Sincerely.

H. S. BUNDY.

We take pleasure in calling attention to a new book entitled "The Coming Age, Its Nature and Proximity," by J. P. Weethee, formerly President of Waynesburg College, which is just issued and now on sale at Day's book store in this place. The work is an elegantly printed, neatly bound volume of over five hundred octavo pages, which treats its sacred subject in a most exhaustive and comprehensive manner, giving evidence of the highest Biblical scholarship, and the most extensive research, rendering it a book of surpassing excellence, which every student of religious history, past, present and future, should have. The work treats with unquestioned ability a topic, which has latterly commanded the most profound thoughts of the leading Christian thinkers of the present day, many of whom declare that the signs of the times point unmistakably to the fact that "we now live in the near approach to the culminating period of the world's history." But be this as it may, the book in question is learned and scholarly and worthy the perusal of all readers.

Brother J. H. Cook also speaks of the following work as one of merit. We have not seen the books but noticed in Messiah's Herald a week or two since some very flattering commendations both from the editor and from Dr. Litch. We think it would be well for all our readers, who can by any means afford to expend the price, to buy books treating on the Coming Age, and the Theocratic Kingdom, and thus learn what God's purposes are with regard to the future of our earth. "Coming events are casting their shadows before," and we should make prophecy and its fulfilment our most earnest study. These books are $3.00 per vol., and may be obtained of the author.

"The Theocratic Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, as Covenanted in the Old Testament and Presented in the New Testament," by Geo. N. H. Peters, A. M., Evang. Luth. Minister, Springfield, Ohio.

This work is in three volumes. Its value seems beyond all price, and its Christian spirit and composition beyond all praise. Its character appears by its towering easily above all the manifold human theories, and demonstrating their departures from the divine standard as to this kingdom to come.

This work is every way worthy of the crowning theme of all gospel. It never could have been brought out till now—that its preparatory stages of fulfilment have made it meet in due season."

Expositors and teachers generally seem satisfied with such "views" of the subject as will answer the demands of their readers and hearers. Nay more, such is "the veil, the power of darkness over all," that few, very few, see that every "interpretation" (so called), is not "the word of God," but the "view" of such teacher.

The Christian manliness and maturity of faith in this work, center in a hopeful adherance to the covenant and oath-confirmed promise! Gen. xv. to xxii.; Rom. iv. Hence theocratic opinions and expositions are themselves exposed, as falling short of God's loving will, and so out of harmony with the one all comprehending "purpose of grace in Christ Jesus." Eph. iii. 11. The very best commendation is due to both these brethren. I feel nourished up by their timely testimony. God bless them abundantly. Amen.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

The 25th of December has been celebrated for 1400 years as the day on which "good tidings of great joy" gladdened the hearts of the shepherds as they watched their flocks by night on the plains around Bethlehem, the city of David. The "good tidings" were originally and directly to the people of Israel, but had a bearing on the whole world, not only to individuals but to all the nations of the earth. According to the prayer of the aged Simeon, the Messiah was to be "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."

The old dispensation had been great in anniversaries, notably the passover, celebrating the deliverance of the nation from Egypt. These anniversaries were instituted by express Divine authority. While events of equal or surpassing importance took place in New Testament times, there is not a word or even a hint that any of these events should be celebrated by an anniversary. The regularly recurring first day of the week found the disciples meeting together, and this of itself served to commemorate their Lord's resurrection, which took place in the early morning of the first day of the week. Their eating bread and drinking wine during their assembly, was, by the Lord's own appointment, the only mode by which his sacrificial death was to be shown forth. The two great events, therefore, constituting the foundation facts of redemption, the death and resurrection of Christ, were to be commemorated by his disciples meeting on a certain day of weekly occurrence, and unitedly engaging in a certain simple act; while the fact of his birth was left altogether out of view as an event of any great significance, while the day and date on which it took place were not recorded.

The proneness of the Jews to observe anniversaries called forth the remonstrance of the apostle in his letter to the Galatians, "Ye observe days and months and times and years; I am afraid of you lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."

How, then, it may be asked, are we to account for the existence of so many so-called Christian anniversary festivals? If not of divine origin, the only other source of their institution may be human. And if they had been the pure and simple invention of professing Christians, the wonder would be where of some of its more forbidding features. But even this extenuation cannot be admitted.

The season of the year is itself conclusive against the least probability of its being true. It is the depth of winter, and the best evidence could be adduced that the feeding of flocks by shepherds in the open air by night was an absolute impossibility. Again, it is in the last degree improbable that women and children should be required by the Roman government to travel hundreds of miles in such a season for the mere purpose of being registered in the place of their tribes or families.

This merely negative evidence is supported by the most positive facts of history. In his "Two Babylons," the Rev. Alex. Hislop gives a quotation from Tertullian which not only proves that Christmas is of heathen origin, but shows how it came about. Tertullian says: "By us (professing Christians) who are strangers to Sabbaths and new moons, and festivals once acceptable to God; the Saturnalia, the feasts of January, the Brumalia and Matronalia, are now frequented; gifts are carried to and fro; New Year's day presents are made with din, and sports and banquets are celebrated with uproar. Oh how much more faithful are the heathen to their religion, who take special care to adopt no solemnity from the Christians."

The Saturnalia of Rome was the festival adopted by the church in the third century and called Christmas. Saturn was the father of the gods. This festival lasted seven days, and was observed at the winter solstice to celebrate the sun's return journey from the far south, which, in Mythology, was represented by the reviving of a person who had been dead. The Saturnalia had its revels presided over by one named Zoganes, corresponding to the modern "Lord of Misrule" of the Christmas revels.

The seven days of this festival included at their close what is known in Scotland and in the north of England as Hogmanay. The most probable derivation of this term is from the Chaldee. Here we get hag at least, and mene the numbers supposed with much probability to be a designation of the moon, because months were frequent enough the months were numbered. The same word slightly changed is Greek for moon. And in English, Gothic, Saxon, Danish, German and Dutch, the same word substantially is used for moon. The Jews were addicted to the Chaldee worship of "the Queen of heaven." See Jer. vii. 7; xliv. 5.

Another prophet refers to the same practice of moon worship under the name Meni from the Chaldee. "Ye are they that forsake the Lord, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink offering unto that number." Isaiah lxv. 11. The translators have given in the margin for the word "number" the term Meni as a proper name. The Queen of heaven was known by various names among other nations who had adopted the worship of Chaldea. In Syria she was called Dea or Maja, in Rome Juno and Venus, in Egypt Isis, in Phœnicia Astarte, in Greece Diana.

At the Reformation the Reformers in Switzerland republicated all church feasts except the first day of the week as being unauthorized in the New Testament. Hogmanay was probably kept up as a relic of the social aspect of the festival of Christmas. The giving and receiving of rich cheese, etc., (with the unhappy addition of alcoholic drinks) has been its principal feature. And there can be no doubt that it is this social aspect of the Christmas holidays, as they are frequently termed, which obtain for Christmas that popular consideration on the part of thousands, who have little respect for its authority as a Christian institution.

"A Stumbling Stone." Vital Truths Over which Unbelief Still Stumbles.

In noticing this subject of a stumbling stone, it is plain that there seems an opportunity for the unbelieving to stumble willfully to their own ruin. Hence the warning is given in mercy not to cherish unbelief, which is primary "disobedience to the word—the logos." Faith is teachable and bows to "the word." Doubt parleys, makes out a plausible apology for unbelief and so stumbles.

"The Son of man," seems as a phrase, so employed. Boldly and with a show of daring it is claimed that "Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God the Father, in truth and love," is only by birth a son of man!

Please brother give me your attention to "the word." "In the love of the spirit." Pray you to note the primary and prevailing terms employed to give us the precise particularities of truth touching the subject of the sonship of Christ.

Note. It leaves out, nay, it excludes a human paternity from the promised "seed" and confines it to the "woman"—feminine humanity. Please see.

1. The primal promise was to Eve, not to Adam, distinctively. Here we have "the root of the matter," it is the truth in the very constitution whitel all revelation conforms. Amen. To stumble at this seems fatal, because its ruin is to doom.

2. "Jesus—the Son of man—is the seed, Christ," because "born of woman." This fact alone fulfills the primal and distinctive terms of the promise. Amen. Who will venture to overturn this foundation, or uproot the unmistakable import of the first promise? Eve? It is quite as distinct as that to Mary, the virgin.

3. The creation of man was inclusive of "male and female." Gen. i. 27. In Hebrew it was Ish and Ishe, the feminine of Ish; the Greek, Latin and English, all languages on revelation conform.

This is not accidental, but fundamental. The Old Adam taint is avoided by the divine paternity; and in the seed of the woman, Mary, the profoundest and preciosst import of the first promise to Eve was realised. God's landmarks stand! Amen.

Do think, brother! The terms of the promise and its fulfilment were with God himself. Do you reply against God? If not then the plea was indeed the seed of the woman" precisely as he was "the Son of God—the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth!" For God sent forth his Son made of woman. Gal. iv. 4.

Is it right to be stumble at this word—to such a destiny? 1 Pet. ii. 6–8. What is your argument against God's truth?

4. This confusion of terms is traced out through all the New Testament. "Adam was first formed and then Eve; and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression; yet she shall be saved if in faith." 1 Tim. ii. 11–15. Again, "As the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtility, so your minds may be corrupted." 2 Cor. xi. 3. Let us beware.

5. "The jots and tittles" are regarded in the accomplishment of his all holy and heavenly will. Matt. v. 17–19, Rom. iii. 31; Gal. iii. 23–21. "The Lord hath created a new thing in the earth; a woman shall compass a man." Jer. xxxi. 22. "A virgin shall conceive and bear a son; and shall call his name Immanuel." Is. vii. 14.

THE ROSE OF SHARON.

"Is there no balm in Gilead's fields?
No healing balsam there?
Has Sharon's rose forgot to bloom,
And spread its fragrance rare?

"Have living waters ceased to flow?
Has cold death dried up every spring?
And has the oak and fertile vale
Forgot to fruit to yield?

"Is there no loving One to heal
The torn and bleeding heart?
Is there no soothing hand to close
The poison-wounded dart?

"Is there no refuge from the storm
Of sorrow from the heart?
No calm to pass the weary hours,
No rest for restless feet?

"Is there no light to guide the soul
Along this dreary road?
And will this silent, chilly world
Receive us to its cold?

"Oh yes, there's balm in Gilead still,
And gladness on the air,
And 'mid the fruit and budding rose
Shall bloom the fragrance rare.

"There from the sacred fount of love
With living waters flow,
And I, a weary pilgrim all the land
Through which I wander know.

"There [illegible] day,
The [illegible]
He's [illegible]
And dwell [illegible]

"And brightly shines the morning star

From Arkansas to Massachusetts.

Sometimes, as often as the lightning strike—comes death and calls us far away to attend and comfort sorrowing friends. First a telegram, and then a hurried preparation, a short farewell and quick departure. Thus, on Dec. 3, did we leave our home in Prescott, and the mild and gentle air and sky of South West Arkansas, and putting ourselves in tow of the tireless racer of the iron rail, dart Northward, almost rocket-like, by the gaudily convenient Iron Mountain R. R., reaching St. Louis [illegible] hours. Never was [illegible] of steam, that [illegible] glory is in no [illegible]

[illegible] further to [illegible] on the wind's [illegible] and the Southern sand-beach of lake Michigan, and through the peninsular state, straight to Detroit. On and on, through Canada to Suspension Bridge, and over sullen and world-famed Niagara river, and then with new impetus through my own great state of N. Y. to Albany. How the engineer did give his night-traveling beloved, a loose rein in the faintly snow-lit darkness! We shot, we darted, flew, with hardly a jostle at all, and only a mild and subdued sound of going, while the shadowy world fled backward—and a traveler familiar with races and distances, declared we were gliding towards sun-rise at more than sixty miles an hour. Such is the perfection of almost noiseless motion now, that as seen through the car window, a train pushing out for a run of, it may be, twenty miles without a stop, seems to be something spectral. Is that solid wood and iron? Is that the solid artistic work of human hands? Aye, it is all that. But such mightily compressed paper wheels, and a track of studied and exceeding smoothness, there is something next to supernaturalism, in the way these yoked palaces begin their flight. I always feel with thanks, that God is in this power that conquers space—nay, God himself is the power. The sun gave his energy to wood and coal, and those again rear out of water, million—armed steam—and that is the mother of motion, the motion of a hundred wheels, spinning night and day, to serve hurrying restless human beings. But I cannot dwell. At last we are in the old Bay State, with its lovely range and rank of wooded hills and nest-like vales. I struggle desperately with the giant sorrowness for three or four almost sleepless nights, will have something to say, or show for the strain upon nature. The journey's end draws near. It is time for wakefulness now. What will the news be? At Russell a lady boards the train with a bunch of Arbutus in her hand, green from the Hampden hills. A greeting—a question—and a reply! It is true. This very day, there is, there must be, a funeral. A face, almost white as snow, lies over there in the casket. It is a grand face, the face of a teacher of twenty-five years, a man dying in his prime, beloved by the whole community. There are greetings and embraces, and then there is the room filled with mourning relatives, a house and yard thronged with people. There is a lovely and desolate wife, and a blue-eyed fatherless boy. There is a throng of school children passing by the sleeper in a procession half an hour long. There is a journey to the tomb, there are uncovered heads, hundreds of flowers, a few spadefuls of earth, and all is over. Such is earth and life. I have never written anything rhythmic or rhymic for THE RESURRECTION, but I think next week I will send an adieu, the wife's adieu to her husband, in a handful of verses, which I hope will not take up space amiss.

And now a few words to say something a bit practical, in a brief sort of way. I have noticed lately, in writings here and there, and what have I seen or heard of the like? Away yonder was a funeral. A minister of the gospel died, and was carried to the pulpit front in a modern Methodist chapel, and a verse of Scripture were read, and a text was taken, and words were spoken. A good text—a good text, if I mistake not this. "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" And how was the text handled? Is it well for him who takes the "sword" to hold it well in his hands. But from beginning to end there was not one word about the resurrection, but only a substitution of a hypothesis, a fiction, the flight of an incorporeality to bliss, and this was the resurrection. O heart, do not over-ache! Thou hast had some things to bear, and thou canst bear even a theology that is just as unnatural and bad, a maneuvering just as pretty and preposterous, a spectacle just as singular and sorry, as pyramid building with the top up, and apex down. Just so sad and afflictive, is teaching immateriality, then the immortality of the immateriality, then the rapture of the immortality, when Scripture says nay, not so. And it: this theory and tradition is put in the place of the power and promise of Christ. Not alone the poor widow wept that day. There is a protest of crying consciences against a wronged gospel. One has to bear it, when one almost cannot bear it. Nature with "analogy" was taken to illustrate a fiction. But, O, nature didst thou know and allow thy seizure and manipulation for this use? See the dead in his tranquil sleep—a sleep good enough for Job or David, or Peter, a sleep of peace and truth in Jesus, see the dead seized and whirled in a chariot of airy nothing, taken before [illegible] unlawful and impossible by irrepressibility, or caught on angel hands and pinions. Every thing is unscriptural from beginning to end, as in a funeral occasion, is doubly afflicted in that it signifies a good man dead, and it may be, some good man living, tortured by wrong teaching, super-Scriptural, or non-Scriptural, or anti-Scriptural.

Now, another thing. Sometimes we find excellent truth delivered,—timely and nutritive, but yet too much uncoupled with the variously nourishing ailment that we need for perfect good heart and robustness. There is some teaching full of the material for making bones, and elaboration of cartilage. But we must have muscle-making material, and nervous and fatty structure cannot wholly be left out. So when the skeleton particles and articles are ministered for the beginning of the frame of the man in Christ, there should not be left out the substances essential to completeness. There must be knowledge alone, but associated moral choice,—and the entering element of a Divine affection. There must be not alone a view and acceptance of the Divine purpose, but a love of goodness, and a sympathy with the compassion of Christ. There should be not alone an ideal on the kingdom, but a yes, responsive to the call to training for its glory and duty, by the work of God wrought in us now, and a free choice of all that loveliness in character which had its perfect illustration in the life of Christ. There must be a faith which shall unite affection with understanding, and affinity of the love of goodness, with the affinity of the perception of the plan of coming administration. Hence, in preaching the gospel, give us a glimpse of Merciful Kindness in saving men, as well as of the order of God's work in coming ages. Give us water, water of life—and bread—the bread of life, and oil for unction, and things new and old, all—all—in due succession and due relation, all for the making of a perfect man in Christ.

I have not long since heard "amens," and "hallelujahs," in abundance, so great abundance and frequency, that I feared the impairment of the sacredness of such words by their great repetition. Is that an objectionable circumstance, which shrinks from too great familiarity in manner, or speech with sacred things? Not tears and emotion, not joy and congratulations, not enthusiasm and overflow of feeling and action not these alone are timely and telling. But with emotions and copious ejaculations of "bless God, and thank the Lord"—give us some calm and clear statements of Divine doctrine and intention, something that will feed the deeper interior of the intellect, as well as excite the sensibilities. I remember to have heard Bishop Andrews, of the M. E. Church preach in Washington and the impression of strength in that discourse, was abiding. I am not most edified with exceeding muchness of talk, and exceeding muchness of muscular movement in preaching—though I could not lightly abstain for every one is to consider his own infirmities. But the final consolation and grand proclamation of all ex. simply the wisdom that ministers good truth so as to build up true and full man in Christ. Is not that so? If it is not, will not some one correct me and instruct me?

"Hills Across the Snow."

[illegible] England, [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

Beyond the hills rise higher hills,
And higher hills away
Beyond them still, where thousand rills
Gleam in the morning grey,

What myriad life! What endless change!
What fields of depth and height!
Who can explore! What widening range
Of vision and of light!

So circling on the past we see,
From distant epochs brought,
A thousand fruitful years silently
From Bible of life and thought

Since the first times when early star
Climb up the lifeless beach,
Through all ancient civilities
Life's vast, all page can reach.

Then, turning to the farther heights,
We enter hills of time,
Each beholding form of truth unites
A race—one vast, sublime,

The height of that far future seems—
A sea of crimson gold!
Depth—flat in Eden—deep now grown,
Some life reveals the old!

New faith shows, new hope, new Love
Change that like ever stays;
But all combine in whole from which no one
Shines clear in Bethlehem's Star.

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST? WHOSE SON IS HE?" MATT. xxii. 42.

Jesus asked the Pharisees these important questions, and the answer they gave was correct as to the fleshly descent. They knew that God's covenant made with David, the king of Israel, was concerning the Messiah, who was to be of his posterity, "of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." Psa. cxxxii. 11. "This everlasting covenant" was ordered in all things and sure, and David himself said it was all of his salvation and desire. 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. The prophets of Israel spoke this Son and branch which should be raised unto David, to order establish the throne and kingdom of David for ever. See Isa. ix. 7; xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; xxxiii. 15. The Jews knew that their Messiah was to be of the house of David. On that there was no dispute. Both Christ and Paul could speak to the Jews as they did at Jerusalem and Antioch concerning the Messiah being the seed of David, without any fear of contradiction. The point of dispute between the apostles and the Jews was whether Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ. He did not seem to be any thing whatever as to the pedigree of David. The genealogical records established the fact that he was a descendant of David, but that fact alone was not sufficient to prove that he was the Christ, or heir to the throne of David. There had been many descendants during the intervening generations, but the Messiah had yet appeared. It was necessary that there should be something peculiar and striking either in the birth or life, or mission or circumstances, or death, etc., or in all combined, to prove that Jesus, or any other son of David was the promised Messiah.

Jesus of Nazareth was looked upon as an extraordinary person, to say the least that could be said of him. Of course there were various opinions afloat in the public mind, as to who he was. When Jesus asked his disciples the question "Whom do men say that I the son of man am?" their answer expressed those opinions.—"Some say that thou art John the Baptist; some Elias; and others, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets." Matt. xvi. 13, 14. Some persons ventured to ask—"When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than those which this man hath done." John vii. 31. Some thought that they recognized in Jesus "that prophet" spoken of by Moses in Deut. xviii. 15, 18. While others affirmed, "This is the Christ," John vii. 40, 41. The people were astonished at his works, and frequently glorified God when they saw the miracles he performed. Nicodemus spoke the sentiments held by the rulers of the Jews, when he said "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him," John iii. 2. Still they were unwilling to receive him as the Messiah. No doubt they had what seemed to them good reasons for rejecting him. It was generally known that Jesus was a Galilean; he being brought up at Nazareth of Galilee. Hence the name he bore "Jesus of Nazareth." Now the rulers knew that the prophets foretold that the Messiah should be born of the house of David, in the town of Bethlehem, and they looked to that quarter for him. Therefore when Nicodemus ventured to say a word [illegible] to [illegible] sus, after the [illegible] arresting him, [illegible] thou also of [illegible] has [illegible] for out of [illegible] Christ. But some say human beings. The "son of the man" must mean something definite. The query arises, son of what man? Surely it cannot mean Joseph, the husband of Mary, that is referred to so often. Jesus never called himself the son of Joseph, or the son of David, in a direct manner, and very seldom the son of God. Twice the Jews ask if Jesus is not the son of Joseph? and once if he is not the carpenter's son, Luke iv. 22; John vi. 42; Matt. xiii. 55. In John i. 45; Philip calls him, "Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." Luke iii. 23, gives the key to the proper understanding of the language. He begins his genealogy thus: Jesus "being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph;" or as the Vatican MS. has it "being (as was allowed) a son of Joseph." "The son of man" was a term which was understood as a synonym for the Christ. See John xii. 32, 34; Matt. xxvi. 63, 65 xvi. 27, 28 xxiv. 30, 31; xxv. 31; Mark xiv. 61, 62. So also the son of David. Matt. xxi. 7, 15. Jesus was emphatically the son of the man David, the man who did God's will, (Acts xiii 22), the man with whom he made an everlasting covenant concerning his house, his throne, and his kingdom. Jehovah covenanted with David, to place one of his posterity upon his throne and kingdom for ever, and moreover he said, "I will be his father, and he shall be my son" 2 Sam. vii. 10, 16. Then to say that the son of man is the son of David is correct, and to say that the son of man or the son of David is the Messiah is also true; but it is also necessary to believe and confess that Jesus of Nazareth is that person, and that he is also the Son of the living God.

When Jesus asked his disciples what they thought of him, as to who he was, Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God." Matt. xvi. 16. For this answer Jesus pronounced a blessing upon Peter. "Blessed art thou Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." ver. 17. Christ said his church was to be built upon this truth as a foundation, consequently each and every stone built upon this rock must understand, believe, and confess it. The apostles all believed this doctrine. They said, "We believe and are sure that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," John vi. 69. The apostle John wrote his gospel, and recorded some of the signs and miracles of Jesus, for the purpose, as he says, that "ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name," John xx. 30, 31; all persons received into the primitive church believed and confessed the same important doctrine.

We may believe that Jesus is the Christ—"the seed of David according to the flesh," on account of the many Scripture testimonies which unite to prove him to be so; but do we also believe that he is the Son of the living God. When Peter confessed this truth Jesus said that no human being had revealed it to him, but that it was a revelation from his Father in heaven and when Paul wrote, "no man can say that Jesus is Lord, but by the Holy Spirit," (1 Cor. xii. 3,) it amounted to the same thing. How did the Father reveal these saving truths to Peter, and the rest of the apostles? Was it by some still small voice that they were taught that Jesus was God's Son? Was it some secret, mysterious, and unaccountable influence which enlightened their minds as to the paternity of Jesus? Or, did not they believe these vital and saving truths on the evidence presented to their understandings. In the same manner that we are called upon to do? They believe what Moses in the law, and the prophets did write concerning the Messiah, and from the knowledge which they had obtained by their social intercourse with Jesus, by hearing his public teachings, by seeing the miracles he did, by the testimony of John the Baptist, who pointed out Jesus to them as the Lamb of God, by the Father's voice from heaven at his baptism in the Jordan, saying "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased,"—by these and may be other concurrent testimonies they were all convinced, and confessed him as Christ, the Son of God. When Peter made this confession he had not as much evidence in proof of the Sonship of Jesus, as he had afterwards, and as we have now. The acknowledgement of the Father on the Mount of Transfiguration, (Matt. xvii. 5); and especially the overwhelming proof given by his resurrection from the dead, are important additional evidences that Jesus is the Son of God. His resurrection declared him to be the Son of God with power, (Rev. i. 4); but was he not "the Christ, the Son of the living God," when Peter confessed him to be such? He was undoubtedly. His crucifixion and death did not destroy his identity, nor his [illegible] throne and kingdom of David; for God raised him from the dead, thereby justifying him from the aspersions of his enemies, and in that very act, saying, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee;" and by commanding the angels to worship him when he brought again from the dead his first begotten into the world. Heb. i. 5, 6.

Jesus of Nazareth became the Christ of God when he was anointed by the Holy Spirit, Christ or Messiah means anointed. He could not be the anointed one before he was anointed, any more than David was the Lord's anointed before Samuel poured the consecrated oil upon him. See Isa. lxi. 1; Luke iv. 11, 22; Acts x. 38. When the Holy Spirit came upon him at his baptism he was anointed to the triple office of prophet, priest, and king. Prophet he has been—priest he now is—and king he will be when he comes again. But he was neither prophet, priest, nor king before his anointing, and the same can be said of Christ before his anointing it could only be prospectively, or prospectively.

But was he not God's Son before his baptism and anointing? and when did he become his son? Was it at birth or before? He is called the "only begotten Son of God." John i. 18; iii 16, 18; 1 John iv. 9. Begotten comes before birth. Will those who claim that Jesus was the Son of God before his birth of Mary, please state when, where, and how he was begotten, and when and of whom he was born? The record which God has given of his Son, is plain and decisive, and if we will only believe it, many objections and difficulties will be removed. Why not receive the account given by Luke of things which he says "are most surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word?" Luke i. 1, 2. He tells us of the angel Gabriel being sent to a virgin of the name of Mary, and of his message to her. That she should conceive and bring forth a Son, that his name should be Jesus, that he should be called the Son of the Highest, and that the Lord God would give unto him the throne of his father David. He tells us that Mary questioned the angel, saying, "How can this be seeing I know not a man?" Mark the angel's answer—"The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, therefore that holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." Luke i. 26, 35. After a while the child was born of Mary, at Bethlehem and when circumcised, eight days after, he was named Jesus. Luke ii. 11, 21. Can any one invalidate Lukes testimony? Is it all a myth or a fable? Did he or some one else concoct the story from heathen writings? The fabulous accounts we have in those writings of virgins conceiving and bringing forth some of their gods, are founded rather upon what we find in the Scriptural narratives, than the Scriptures being indebted to them. The Scripture accounts are the genuine—the others are the counterfeits. If it be true that Jesus is the only begotten Son of God, will those who deny the truth of this narrative given by Luke, please say when he was begotten by God, and in what manner. To assert that he was the son of Joseph, by natural generation, does not prove it to be so. There is no Scripture says so. Neither Jesus nor any of the apostles, ever refer to Joseph as his natural father, except in one instance, (John i. 45,) and Luke iii. 23; explains this. The Jews supposed that he was, not knowing anything to the contrary, and therefore sometimes call him the carpenter's son, and the [illegible]oseph But Jesus always ch[illegible] his Father, and frequently [illegible] his heavenly Father. He said he was the Son of God, and the Christ. John ix. 35-37; iv. 25, 26; xix. 7; Matt. xxvi. 63. If we would escape condemnation, and obtain eternal life, we must believe that Jesus is the Christ, and believe on the name of the only begotten Son of God. "Those believing thus are begotten by the word of truth, and have the right, or privilege to become Sons of God also. Such receive "the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15. But Jesus is not the Son of God by adoption. He was begotten and born the Son of God. Adam was a Son of God by creation, Jesus was the Son of God, "made (or born) of a woman," Gal. iv. 4. He was such from his birth. Gabriel said to Mary—"that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God," Luke i. 35. After he was put to death for claiming God as his Father, "God raised him from the dead," and thus he was begotten and born from the dead as the Son of God with power, and become "the first-born among many brethren."

Though Jesus had God for his Father, yet he was human. He was "the man Christ Jesus," 1 Tim. ii. 5. He was made in the likeness of men," Phil. ii. 7. and "forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same;" wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people, Heb. ii. 14, 17. "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are yet without sin," Heb. iv. iv. 14, 15. "Though he were a son yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered." Heb. v. 8. Being "Son of man" he is properly human; and being "Son of God," he is also properly Divine. Let it not be considered by saying that he is Divine, that he is the self-existent and the infinite Being, whom no man hath seen nor can see, but rather a God-manifested in the flesh was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." John i. 14. Jesus possessed nothing inherently—all he had was derived from the Father. But the Father has "highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name"—he has placed him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come," Eph. i. 20, 21; Phil. ii. 9, 10. God has thus honored his Son, and given all things into his hand, and he desires that "all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father." John v. 23. And yet Jesus said, "My Father is greater than I"—"I do nothing of myself;" showing that the life power, authority, wisdom, honor, glory, etc., which he possesses, are derived from a higher source, and therefore proving the trinitarian doctrine untrue, that the Son is equal with the Father, by being self-existent and co-eternal with him. Jesus was properly human, and yet he was Divine. The Father dwelt in him by his Spirit,—he possessed that Spirit in its fulness, without measure—"for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell," even "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." John i. 16; iii. 34; Col. i. 19; ii. 9. By God begotten and of woman born: in the form of God, yet taking the form of a servant, he was made in the likeness of men, and was found in fashion as a man. And for his obedience unto death, even the death of the cross, God has crowned him with glory and honor, and given him a name which is above every name; either in the heaven or on earth—made him the Mediator between God and men, and the only means by or through which men can be saved. See Phil. ii. 7, 10; Heb. ii. 9, 10; 1 Tim ii. 5. Acts iv. 10, 12. Now exalted at the right hand of God, a Prince and a Savior, he will come again with a strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him. "The rod of God's right hand, the Son of man whom he has made strong for himself," will then take to himself his great power and reign—"judging the world in righteousness," "ruling in the midst of his enemies," "striking through kings in the day of his wrath," "wounding the heads over many countries," "judging the poor of the people, and breaking in pieces the oppressor," See Acts v. 31; Isa. xi, 10; Psa. lxxx. 17; Rev. xi. 17; Acts xvii. 30, 31; Psa. cx. 2, 5, 6; lxxii. 4. The angels said to the disciples—"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven," Acts i. 11. This same Jesus was Jesus of Nazareth, the anointed one,—the Son of God, and the Christ. John ix. 35-37; iv. 25, 26; xix. 7; Matt. xxvi. 63. If we would escape condemnation, and obtain eternal life, we must believe that Jesus is the Christ, and believe on the name of the only begotten Son of God. "Those believing thus are begotten by the word of truth, and have the right, or privilege to become Sons of God also. Such receive "the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15. But Jesus is not the Son of God by adoption. He was begotten and born the Son of God. Adam was a Son of God by creation, Jesus was the Son of God, "made (or born) of a woman," Gal. iv. 4. He was such from his birth. Gabriel said to Mary—"that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God," Luke i. 35. After he was put to death for claiming God as his Father, "God raised him from the dead," and thus he was begotten and born from the dead as the Son of God with power, and become "the first-born among many brethren."

The angels said to the disciples—"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven," Acts i. 11. This same Jesus was Jesus of Nazareth, the anointed one,—the Son of God, and the Christ. John ix. 35-37; iv. 25, 26; xix. 7; Matt. xxvi. 63. If we would escape condemnation, and obtain eternal life, we must believe that Jesus is the Christ, and believe on the name of the only begotten Son of God. Adam was a Son of God by creation, Jesus was the Son of God, "made (or born) of a woman," Gal. iv. 4. He was such from his birth. Gabriel said to Mary—"that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God," Luke i. 35. After he was put to death for claiming God as his Father, "God raised him from the dead," and thus he was begotten and born from the dead as the Son of God with power, and become "the first-born among many brethren."

In conclusion, we believe that Jesus the Christ is not "the son of David" only, but also David's lord—"the Son of the living God." That he was proved to be God's Son by his resurrection from the dead; but that he was his before his death is evident from the testimony of the Father on the Holy Mount, and at his baptism, and anointing, when an audible voice from heaven said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Jesus always claimed God as his Father, said he was the Son of God, as well as the Son of man, and required of his disciples a belief and confession of the same. His forerunner, John the Baptist, also testified that he was the Son of God, and of Divine origin, John i. 34; iii. 28, 31. The angel Gabriel testified to Mary that her child should be called the Son of God: because he was to be the product of the power of the Highest, instead of that of man. The angel recognized Mary as of the house of David, and consequently of the royal line; for he said that the Lord God would give unto him the throne of his father David. The genealogy proves this. Jesus was the only legitimate Son of the Father, the anointed Son of God, begotten by the word of truth, as we are. There is only one begotten Son of God, many adopted sons, through a belief in the name. "Prove all things: and hold fast to that which is good." "Try the spirits whether they be of God."

The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath.

—By L. C. THOMAS.—

The above named work is now ready for delivery. It contains 250 pages, 12 mo., on good paper, substantially bound in cloth. Price $1.

Table of Contents.—The Law, the Covenants, and the Sabbath. Also an Epitome of the Great Salvation: and an appendix containing six brother subjects, in brief.

The perfect and immutable moral law is considered and shown to be the "basis" of the spirit of the old Mosaic law, and also in its entirety. The law of Moses and law of Christ are compared and contrasted, and the relation of both to the old and new covenants is treated at some length. The Sabbath question is carefully and learnedly examined, and presented and discussed in a somewhat new light.

The work also includes the consideration of Sunday, unconditional immortality, the gospel, the hope of the Jews, the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, punishment of the wicked, the state of the dead, the new birth, one who faith, the one hope, the image of God, nature of Christ, the name, religion, morality, Christianity, etc.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JANUARY 14, 1885. NO. 2.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS.—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR Payable in advance. Three and six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind'ana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for an inheritance in salvation.

Communications.

The Fourth Conjunctive Period in Man's Experience on the Earth and in God's Conforming Process or Development of the Seed; the Significance of this Conjunction in the Numerical Types.

We have been showing in our previous articles on this subject how God's plan and purpose "in Christ" is recorded even in the names of the patriarchs and prophets when sought for and understood; and we had found the third harmonic conjunction to be in David, the prophet, priest and king, a man after God's own heart, and honored by summing up in his life and experience the three divinely appointed offices of the first three dispensations.

Now among the many significant names of kings, wise men and prophets who after David's time were leaders of God's people, I have selected the following, inclusive of Jesus the Nazarene, as the ten appropriate representatives of the fourth conjunctive period or dispensation, and reaching in time from David to the Christ.

1. Solomon; 2. Elias; 3. Elisha (Elisha); 4. Hezekias (Isaiah); 5. Nehemias (Nehemiah); 6. Zacharias; 7. Jeremias; 8. Jezekiel (Ezekiel); 9. Daniel; 10. Jesous (Jesus).

And first Solomon, derivation salam, from salam to shake or upheave like the sea, and mone alone or solitary. "The one alone who shaketh." Interpretation. Solomon as the divinely appointed representative of the King of kings and Lord of lords, has the power, the sole power, that upheaves or "stills" the waves of the "sea" of nations. See such collateral passages and teaching as Hebrews xii. 26. "Yet again, once for all I shake not only the earth, but the heavens also." 27. And that "yet again once for all" denoteth the translation (changing over) of the things that are being shaken, that the things that are not being shaken may abide."

Remember that as Solomon, a son of David, is so named, and is a type of another who is to come, the reality of which he is a type in his official work, is also a son of David and the vicegerent of God to upheave and still the waves of the sea of nations in a changing process or translation that will be once for all."

And next Elias, derivation El, mercy, and ia, root of rapha to heal. Interpretation, healing mercy. This coming one will represent and bring God's healing mercy.

Third, Elisaie, derivation el, root of mercy, an equality or on an equality, and is, imperative of yatsa to go. Interpretation, "Go thou mercy in an equal or equitable way."

See collateral teaching in the passage, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." The meaning of Isaac, as I have already given, being, "in an equality," "partakers of the divine nature," in another passage, "heirs and joint-heirs with Christ of a heavenly inheritance," etc.

Fourth, Hezekias, derivation Hez from chamad to delight in or take joy in, and ia, root of rapha to heal. Interpretation, "I have delighted to heal." Then recall to mind the fact that Hezekias is recognized and generally known as the Evangel of the Old Covenant Scriptures, his writings being full of and resonant with the clarion echo of the gospel. See also for instance the collateral thought in the New, that God takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but would have all men come unto him and be saved. "Why will ye die?"

Fifth, Nemias, derivation nee, poetic imperative of nah, to make new or renew, and miamar yimi, genitive of adjective miyar formed from this verb. Interpretation, "renew that which hath been polluted" (as with blood). Then recall to mind the fact that Nehemias was the prophet who led God's people back to renew and rebuild Jerusalem and the temple which had been polluted and destroyed.

Sixth, Zecparias, derivation Za, root of Zaw to live; zap, root of zapas, grace or favor; ia, root of rapha, to heal. Interpretation, "healing grace unto life." Keeping this interpretation of the name in mind, read again carefully the book of Zacharias, and see what wonderful revelations of Christ and his healing office-work are hidden in its profound and mystic parable language and symbolism.

Seventh, Ieperaes, derivation ie, imperative of yah to go; yaer, root of yaarar, to lay waste or make desolate, and ia root of rapha to heal. Interpretation, "Go thou to lay waste and heal." Read the first chapter of the book of Jeremias and see if that is not declared therein to be his official work. Then go over to the second chapter of Luke and read old Symeon's prophecy that "he (the Christ) was set for a smiting and raising up of many in Israel," and see in what special office-work Jeremias is a type of "The True." The Lamentations (or Dirges more properly) will then have a new significance to you, I think.

Eighth, Ieesed, derivation ie, imperative of yah to go; ee, root of yaa, to seethe or boil or act eagerly or fervently (the last two poetic and derivative meanings—and ed, root of mercy, a euphonic insertion. Interpretation, "go seethe (or press fervently forward) thou mercy." See collateral passage, "Be fervent (same word 'seethe') in spirit, serving the Lord."

Ninth, Jasiel, derivation jasa a loan at interest, and el, root of mercy. Interpretation, "A loan of mercy." How significant and what a loan it has been, not only to God's people in Babylon of old, but to all God's people in the Babylon of the world and the ages!

See the general teaching of the Scriptures, Old and New, on this subject of lending or entrusting and requiring payment again. See the parable of the talents for instance.

Tenth, Jesous, derivation already given in previous article, "Swift healer."

The reader must have observed how very often the root of the verb "heal" has appeared in these forty names I have been interpreting, and how appropriate it is that the one in whom all the types and shadows of the old center and find their reality, should be and should constantly show himself to be "The Great Physician," the healer of all man's woes. All his miracles (works of ability, lit.) in some way teach it and impress this great truth. Then even the very name indicates the way in which he does it. It is a "lifting up" process, an "exaltation."

How appropriate, too, that he who has become by the will of God "The Life Giver," "The New Adam," "The Generic Father," of spiritual life to the race should be named the Swift or Mighty Healer. The healer or alleviator of all the ills that flesh is heir to, even death, and how appropriate the statement in the New Covenant Scriptures that all God's promises in the Christ are yea and amen.

Now as to the numerical significance of this fourth conjunction in Christ. A fourth in the numerical types, as any one who will take the pains to investigate the general subject as revealed in the Scriptures, may discover, is significant of laying foundations, of squaring things to the line and the plummet, of determining corners and angles in a building process, which process is God's great work and purpose in the "prototype" and "archetype" of the human race, namely, the first and last Adam.

Both are formed and molded under the hand of the Master Architect and Builder, one to be the perfect natural man, the other the perfect spiritual man, and both to manifest the glory of the Maker. See Genesis ii. 7, authority for the first statement, and Isaiah (Hezekias) xlix. 8 for the second statement which reads as follows:

"In this wise saith the Lord, In an acceptable time I heard thee and in a day of salvation I came to thy cry for help; and I molded thee and gave thee for a covenant for nations, to restore the earth and inherit waste inheritances."

Again, "Lo, I lay in Sion a chief corner-stone, etc." Again, "The stone that the builders rejected hath become the chief corner-stone, etc." Again, "Built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus being the chief corner stone, etc."

All this language is fundamental and appropriate to the numerical typical conjunctive fourth in the parable teaching of the Old and New. Much more in this line of exegesis might be said, but I forbear and will close with the hope that I may have interested some so that they will look further into this comparatively new line of Scriptural thought, especially "the positive scientists" of our day.

JESUS BEFORE ABRAHAM.

"Jesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am." John viii. 58.

Therefore, Jesus was before Abraham. "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom, prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Matt. xxv. 34. Therefore, the kingdom was prepared before Abraham was.

"And now, O Father, glory thou me with thine own self, with the glory I had with thee before the world was." John xvii. 5. Therefore the glory was before Abraham was.

"Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me, for thou lovest me before the foundation of the world." John xvii. 24. Therefore, the Father loved the Son before Abraham was.

"According as he has chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love, having predestined us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself." Eph. i. 4, 5. Therefore the Ephesian saints were chosen in Jesus before Abraham was.

"And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain, from the foundation of the world." Rev. xiii. 8. Therefore the non-worshippers of the beast, were written in the book of life before Abraham was.

"Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." 2 Tim. i. 9. Therefore his own purpose and grace were given to Paul and Timothy before Abraham was.

"In hope of eternal life which God that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Peter i. 2. Therefore, God promised eternal life before Abraham was.

Let us now consider this matter attentively. Are not all these "Therefores" well established? to-wit: Jesus and the royalty and the glory and the promise and the choice and the enrollment, and the purpose and grace;—were before Abraham was? That the purpose and grace, the choice and the promise, the royalty and the glory, and Jesus himself, were before Abraham was? Of Jesus; that his "goings forth were of old from everlasting?" Micah v. 2. That he was before all the things and in him all the things consist? That the ages were arranged by the word of God on account of Jesus?

One thought more, "who hath saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works but according to his purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light by the gospel." 2 Tim. i. 9, 10. "In hope of eternal life which God that cannot lie, promised before the world began; but hath in due time manifested his word through preaching; which was committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Savior." Titus i. 2, 3. What an overleaping of chronology, have we in these passages? From before the world began; unto Saul of Tarsus. From the days of eternity, to Jesus of Nazareth. From the eternal purpose, which he purposed in himself, unto the resurrection of Jesus our Lord from the dead.

All times and ages and dispensations alike. All means and men. All promises and covenants; all prophets and wise men. Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Moses, Samuel, David, all,—For the sake of him who was before all things, and in whom all things consist, all passed over, all lesous.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Gen. i. 1. This was on account of Jesus.

God established his covenant with Noah. This was on account of Jesus. He made his covenant with day and night. This also was on account of Jesus. See Gen. vi. 8, viii. 22, ix. 9, 11. Jer. xxxiii. 20, 25, 26. The eternal purpose concerning Jesus, and the promise in Eden, made the covenants of promise possible. The promises and the covenants, and the oath were some of Gods promises concerning Jesus; who is the all in all things.

"I was in the spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a great voice, as the sound of a trumpet, saying; I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last." "And he laid his right hand upon me, and said; I am the first and the last, he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forever more." Rev. i. 10, 11, 17, 18. "And they sang a new song, saying, thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth; and I beheld and heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying; worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power and riches, and wisdom and strength, and honor and glory and blessing." Rev. v. 9–12. The foregoing has not been written to show the pre-existence of Jesus, but to show the pre-eminence of Jesus; and that faith in him embraces all covenants and promises and royalties, which God has confirmed in him. J. I. CALKINS.

FROM JERUSALEM TO JERICHO.

I can remember when it used to cost a person traveling alone from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea, Jordan, Jericho and back to Jerusalem from forty-five to seventy-five dollars for three days. But now I take passengers from Jaffa to Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, the Dead Sea, Jordan, Jericho, back to Jerusalem and Jaffa—a tour of ten days—for forty dollars, including carriage between Jaffa and Jerusalem, or good riding horses (with English saddles) for the whole tour, first class hotel accommodation, all fees for sight-seeing and for escorts, and my own services the whole time.

There are three routes from Jerusalem to the Jordan: one via Bethlehem and the convent Mar-Sa-Bar; another by the Dead Sea direct; and the third by way of Jericho direct. By either of the two latter it can be done in two days by good riders, when time and money are an object. For ladies who are not accustomed to ride on horseback the latter route is by far the best, and that we shall take.

On leaving the city of Jerusalem we descend into the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel iii. 2), the same is also the valley of the Kedron, pass the Virgin's Tomb on the left, and the garden of Gethsemane on the right, and ascend the Mount of Olives by the same way King David went barefoot, when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 30). On reaching the summit, and turning with our faces to the west the city is like a map before us. From here a good guide will point out every place of Biblical interest inside the city, and many outside. Here we read Matt. xxii. and Luke xxi. i. 37. One may say he has read these passages many times; so have I, but never with such interest as when on the Mount of Olives. As we look at the city it is a solemn thing to think of the scenes that have been witnessed and crimes that have been committed there,—crimes that caused the earth to tremble, and the very heavens to grow dark with horror. It was there they mocked, scourged and killed Him who came from heaven to save them! Yes, it was there they crucified the Son of the living God. After reading the 14th chapter of Zechariah, we cross over to the eastern brow of Olivet, where we have quite a different picture. The wilderness of Judea commences at our feet,—we see no green fields, nor forests of trees, but a succession of naked, white hills for a distance of 12 or 15 miles, beyond which is the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea; and still beyond, the mountains of Moab and Gilead, like a wall of solid rock stretching north and south as far as the eye can reach.

We descend in a south-easterly direction to Bethany, which is still called by the name of Lazarus (El-Azriyeh). Here Mary and Martha lived, and here their brother died and was brought to life after being dead four days (John xi. 1-44). Here Simon the leper lived, and in his house Mary anointed our Savior, and wiped his feet with her hair (Matt. xxvi. 6-9). It was from here our Savior ascended into heaven (Luke xxiv. 50, 51). How interesting it is to be able to stand on the very places where our Savior walked, talked and prayed! I have visited these places many times, but every time they seem more solemn and interesting to me. We shall return here on our way back to Jerusalem.

About a mile south of Bethany is a village—perched on the top of a round rocky hill. It is called Abu-Deace. It is the home of the Bedawin sheikhs who have the right to furnish guards for parties visiting the Jordan. The name of the head sheikh is Rashed Aracat. He is a tall, handsome, dignified-looking man, noted for his courage and horsemanship. On the 30th of September last he invited myself and Mrs. Floyd to a grand feast of several hundred Bedawins. This feast is kept up every year by all Mohammedans as the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen. xxii. 13). Every one who is able to buy a sheep will do so and kill it on that day; and those who are too poor to buy a sheep receive meat from their neighbors; and any one who calls at a Mohammedan's house is expected to eat meat; let them be Moslem, Jew or Christian, all are welcome. As we draw near Abu-Deace, the village looks like a modern ruin; but there are several two-story stone buildings in the place. The house of sheikh Rashed has several rooms. The guest-chamber is a large upper room, about 40 feet long by 16 wide. The floor was covered with costly Turkish rugs and fine Persian carpets. The walls were decorated with long flint-lock and double-barrel European guns, flint-lock pistols and very nice revolvers, two-edged knives, and several swords, said to be of the best Damascus steel, their sheathes beautifully covered with a silver thread. In this room coffee was served in cups holding a spoonful each, about every ten minutes. About 1:30 P. M. the air was filled with the steam ascending from the hot food that was being carried to the crowd outside. It was indeed a grand sight as we went out to see five or six hundred wild Bedawins squatting on straw mats, old carpets, canvass bags and bed quilts spread flat on the ground under the hot sun. In the midst of every ten or twelve persons was placed a large wooden tub full of rice, meat and vegetables, all cooked together; and for each person was lying by his side (or at his feet) several thin loaves of bread which had been baked in the ashes, in the same way (no doubt) as Sarah made cakes for the angels (Gen. xviii. 6). Among the whole number there was neither knife, fork nor spoon used while eating. Each pulled the meat to pieces with his fingers; took rice and meat and rolled it together until it became quite a good-sized ball, and then threw it into his mouth. Often one would put a ball of rice and meat into the mouth of another. This is done as a mark of respect. After the food had all disappeared, several persons in attendance carried round water in stone jars, and each poured it on his hands, and wiped them on the slack of his shirt, which, by the way, was the principle part of his whole dress. Each wore a loose garb made like a shirt with a girdle around his waist, a dirty cloth on his head, with a rope made of camel's or goat's hair to hold it on, and a pair of slipshod shoes, without stockings, which completed their entire dress.

When we go to the Jordan some one from this village (Abu-Deace of the Aracat tribe) generally meets us at Bethany, or a few rods beyond, just where we commence to descend by a rough, stony road into Wady-el-Hod (Valley of the watering place). Just at the foot of this hill is a spring of good water. It is on the border between Judah and Benjamin (En-Shemosh,—Josh. xv. 7). From this place to Jericho there is no village, not even a single house, and yet we continually meet parties of wild, fierce-looking men, generally armed with long flint-lock guns, pistols, swords, and long spears. The road is dreary and wild; passing along deep gorges and winding around naked and barren hills the stranger cannot help having a good opinion of the Samaritan, who dared to care for any one but himself while traveling along such a gloomy way. About half way to Jericho, stood an old ruined khan (now repaired and made quite new) which is said to mark the site of the inn where the Samaritan took the unfortunate man that fell among thieves. On this spot we read with renewed interest Luke x. 29-37. Before reaching the plain we pass close along the south bank of the brook Cherith, which is indeed wild and picturesque. It is a deep gorge, (four or five hundred feet) and in some places not more than three hundred feet wide at the top, with a small streamlet at the bottom. Here Elijah was fed by ravens (1 Kings xvii. 3-6). In one of these rocks it is said that a hermit lived on four raisins a day until he died. So he might have lived an one that length of time!

After making the last turn among the hills, just before descending to the plain, we get a view that pays one for all the journey: the whole plain of the Jordan is spread out before us. All around the sites of ancient Jericho, Gilgal and modern Jericho is a forest of thorn-trees that are green all the year. They grow from two to ten inches in circumference, and some of them twenty feet high. They cover several hundred acres of ground. All among these trees we see the tops of black Bedawin tents, made of camel's and goats' hair; there we hear the sound of the crying children and barking dogs. About 12 miles south is the beautifully clear, blue water of the Dead Sea. North about 100 miles is Mount Hermon, its snowy peak towering up among the clouds. Opposite us, east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, are the mountains of Gilead and of Moab—in line like a stone wall. In the center of this plain (which is about 12 miles wide just here) we can see the line of the Jordan, which is marked by the dark foliage on its banks. We cross the valley of Achor where Achan was stoned (Josh. vii. 24, 25). This valley is the outlet of the brook Cherith, and is spanned in several places by old ruined Roman aqueducts. In about twenty minutes from the valley of Achor, we reach the site of ancient Jericho. Its only remains are several mounds of earth and a few stone arches. Jericho was the first place taken by the Israelites after they entered the Holy Land. It was here the harlot Rahab lived, in a house on the wall of the city; and on the roof of her house she hid the two spies under flax stalks; and the same night she let them down by a cord through the window, after the gates of the city had been closed (Josh. ii. 1, 15). It was here that the walls fell down at the sound of rams horns and a shout of the people (Josh. vi). Here Joshua pronounced a curse on the man that should rebuild the city (Josh. vi. 26); and the curse was literally fulfilled (1 Kings xvi. 34). As we stand on the mound, just above the spring, we can say with the men of the city, "The situation is pleasant" (2 Kings ii. 19). This spring is still called the Fountain of Elisha (Ain-el-Sultan, in Arabic). From it quite a stream of water flows continually.]

We ride across the plain in an easterly direction, for about two miles among thorn trees, to modern Jericho, supposed by many to be on the site of Gilgal, where the Israelites first encamped after crossing the Jordan, Josh. iv. 19. Here the last manna fell, and they eat of the old corn of the land. And near here Joshua saw the Captain of the Lord's host Josh. v. 9-15. Here the Tabernacle was set up and remained until the dividing of the land at Shiloh, Josh. xviii. 1. Here the prophet Samuel used to come every year to judge the people, 1 Sam. vii. 16. Here Saul was made king, 1 Sam. xi. 15; and here he committed an act which was the means of his losing the kingdom, 1 Sam. xiii. 5-13. Here Elisha paid a visit to the sons of the prophets and performed two miracles,—healing the poisoned pottage and feeding a hundred persons with twenty barley loaves and a little corn, 2 Kings iv. 38-44. Here the tribe of Judah came to welcome David on his return, after fleeing from Absalom, 2 Sam. xix. 15.

From here to the Dead Sea it is an easy ride of two hours across a level plain. By making a detour of about one hour travelers can visit Beth-Hazlah, Josh. xv. 6. The water of the Dead Sea looks beautiful and clear, but when one gets into it, it feels sticky and slimy. It is so very buoyant that one will float with half or two-thirds of his body above the water. It is fifteen per cent. saltor than the ocean.

In one and a half hours from the Dead Sea we ride to the ford of the Jordan, where the Israelites crossed on dry land: right against Jericho, Josh. iii. 16. This may also be the site where Elijah and Elisha crossed on dry ground, and where Elisha returned after Elijah was taken from him, 2 Kings ii. 8-14. In spring the river here is about 100 feet wide, and in some places above it is as much wider. It is from eight to twelve feet deep. It has a very strong current. Some four or five miles above this place is a new, toll bridge across the Jordan. So those who wish to cross can do so by paying a few piasters each. The banks of the river are covered with tamarisk, oleander, willow and balsam trees, while reeds and underwood spring up in places, so that it is almost impossible to pass. It makes a good place for the Bedawin robbers to hide themselves. According to old tradition, make this the spot where our Lord was baptized, Matt. iii. 13-17.

We left Jerusalem by the way that David went when he fled from Absalom, and we shall return by the way our Savior went when he made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Our road passes through modern Jericho; the same as it did when "Jesus entered and passed through Jericho," and Zacchæus climbed a sycamore-tree to see him, Luke xix. 1-10. At Jericho there are now several quite good looking houses with tile roofs, built by Greeks and Russians. There is one large two-story building with several rooms, where travellers can sleep very comfortably for ten francs each per night (equal to about sixty cents). We have to ascend about 3,500 feet (or 3,446 feet, to Jerusalem. We follow the same way our Savior did at the time when he sent two of his disciples to bring him a colt that had never been ridden, Luke xix. 28-38. As we rise over the last spur of Olivet the whole city is before us. It was no doubt near this spot that our Savior wept over Jerusalem. Here I will end my sketch and remain your brother in Christ, waiting for his second coming.

Are You not Shocked?

At what? Why, a man has dared to say he believes in what the Scripture has taught him quite against the verdict of his "church;" has actually had the audacity to affirm that a certain thing is true, notwithstanding a number of worthy men, with and without lawn sleeves, give their opinion to the contrary; has been into a field with his Bible, prayerfully found a truth which will not square with this or that distinguished professor of theology, and means to stick by it; has the rashness to believe that what God has spoken is more reliable than the utterances of scientific oracles with a string of initials after their names; has, indeed, made up his mind to do, say, and think the right whatever be the consequences. Is it not shocking? But for ourselves we thank God, and take courage.

The best way of being thankful for what God gives us, is a liberal distribution of it. Love every one for Christ's sake, and fear none in his cause.

He that learns how to trust God has found the priceless secret of support in trouble, and relief from anxiety, filling the soul with entire confidence for the future.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Jan. 14, 1885.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER!

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but act right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER!

When sending your remittance that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty-five to forty cents to collect each one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

IN this week's issue our readers will find a letter written by Rolla Floyd to Messiah's Herald which we enjoy, as it is a special gratification to our readers to hear from Palestine.

PATIENCE must exercise continued patience in regard to communications. We have to make the paper one of general interest, and, hence, must only occupy a fair proportion with articles contributed.

WE give an article from Dr. Thomas on the "Covenants" this week, to be supplemented by a shorter one on the "Gideology" next week. These will be the conclusion of what he proposes to say on these controverted and comparatively difficult subjects.

BABYLAND.—The Christmas and New Year numbers of this "beautiful day time and bed time monthly" for the youngest class of learners and readers have come to hand. It is a most beautiful and attractive serial for the little ones, perfectly calculated to give as much delight and instruction to the little ones, as books adapted to those of maturer years afford to the more developed mental faculties. A handsomely illustrated monthly published by D. Lothrop and Co., Boston, Mass. 50 cts. a year.

THE January number of the Phrenological Journal is one of special interest. It contains portraits of some of the most prominent individuals who have been noted during the last fifty years as discoverers of the relations existing between the cranial organs, and mental characteristics. Those of Gall, Spurzheim, Combe, O. S. and L. N. Fowler, are among the number. Our limits this week will not admit of more extended notice. We shall make up for this brief allusion hereafter.

GENERAL WOLSELEY, at the head of the British military expedition for the relief of General "Chinese" Gordon, sends word that he will march on Khartoum week after next.

Latest advices from Spain state that 43,000 people have been rendered homeless by the recent earthquake. The number reported killed is 1,400; injured 900.

ADELINE, Ogle Co., Ill.

My Dear Sister:

I have been exceedingly delighted while studying the history of Joseph to discern the wisdom of God hid in many folds, which is the privilege of those who seek unto God. We have not only a type of the sufferings of Christ, but also the glory that followed. Pet. i. 11. I would like to draw your attention to the beautiful doctrine contained in Biblical names which, when understood, forms a grand link in the golden chain of living truth. The meaning of Joseph's name is Increasing, yet another, or perfect in the circumstances which seem to have continued his life we see the providence of God made very visible; his mind was deeply impressed with dreams, Gen. xxxvii., even as it is given in Job xxxiii. 14-18. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumbering upon the bed, then he openeth the ears of men and sealeth their instruction.

He was truly the master of dreams, for he saw the exquisite fulness of the earth bending to him, and the rulers of day and night with their companion lights making obeisance to him. These dreams filled his mind before he was sent to seek his lost brethren, and the sheep. His father had a peculiar love for him which made him clothe him different from the rest. No doubt Rachel, during her lifetime did the weaving of the material which covered the best one, but his father joined the pieces together (margin) clothing him with a garment of his own construction, blending all the shades of humanity in one. His father put this robe on him before sending him on his errand of love to seek that which was lost. His beloved son left the vale of Hebron, which signifies "fellowship, friendship, society" and came to Shechem, which means a portion, or early in the morning, but they were not feeding there, but in Dothan, which signifies law or custom, following the traditions of men which made void the commandments of God, therefore lost their portion which gave them a resurrection in the morning.

The loved one of his Father came not only to seek his own brethren, but said "other sheep have I which are not of this fold, them also I must bring and they shall hear my voice." Judah signifies one praised of the Lord, but if Iscariot be added, it means a man of murder or one who cuts off. Judah, like Judas, seems to have been fond of gain, for he said, "Come, let us sell him." They put him into a pit which had no water in it, and when delivered he could say with David, "He hath brought me up out of a horrible pit." He was sold to his brethren, sons of Abraham by Hagar, from thence to Potiphar by the Midianites, sons of Abraham by Keturah. Potiphar signifies, "A fat bull;" how very suggestive of David's prophecy in Psa. xxii. 12. In that household he was condemned for sin not his own; the guilt of the woman rested on the perfect one, but the law of his God was in his heart, none of his steps did slide. The ecclesiastical woman has robbed the Increaser of his garment, but fails to clothe herself with it, therefore her shame remaineth, lust and lying are her chief characteristics.

But one there was who befriended dear Joseph and made the keeper of the prison bend to his will: the proud waves of oppression could go no farther than the unseen power permitted. Two officers of the king's court were made prisoners also, and their dreams when unfolded by Joseph seem to astonish them, which gave the interpreter a little hope. The dreams of these two men were remarkable, for the issue of life and death was wrapped therein. The one to whom life was extended told his dream first and Joseph judged according to his word, and passed upon him the sentence of life which was not enforced until the third day, when the king made a great feast, and restoration was the crowning glory in the royal courts, except with those whom the king condemned, so the third day unfolded death as well as life. Joseph was the judge, the king, the disposer.

I cannot but pause a little to consider the peculiarity of each dream. In one there seems to be the savor of life unto life; in the other of death unto death. 2 Cor. ii. 16. Both served the king, and from him came their final doom. In the dream of the butler we have a vine unfolded, and in its lovely branches we have the third day, when the Great King will bring out of the prison house of death his captive ones. Zech. ix. When developed he saw the vine bud, blossom and bring forth ripe grapes, beautiful clusters which would gladden the heart of the king. He saw in his dream one who had once ministered to the king brought out of a prison house, the cup restored to him into which he pressed the pure blood of the grape. Let us now consider the dream of the baker, which was told last. He saw in the visions of the night three white baskets which were baskets full of holes (margin) or leaky vessels; time was figured in the number of baskets, the food he had prepared for the king was a weight on his head, his labor was piled up one upon the other until the unclean birds of prey devoured that which the holes did not waste. Death in its ghastly paleness was shadowed forth in the white baskets, in his service was embodied the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, the end of which was destruction and death. How different from the butler's dream, germinating life in all its beautiful unfolding was the burden of his thoughts asleep or awake. Surely none but God could interpret and pass judgment in such a state.

Thirteen long years were passed since the day Jacob sent his loved one on an errand of mercy, clothed with a garment which was brought back to his father besmeared with sacrificial blood and torn as though some beast had devoured him. Although he had told his tale of sorrow to one whom in solitude he had comforted, yet bitter disappointment made him no longer trust in an arm of flesh. His own

THE FLYING YEARS.

Oh years! Oh years! how soon ye fly!
Like eagles sweeping down the sky;
How rapidly your moments pass,
Like sand-grains dropping in the glass.
Brief years. like life is—its noon brief;
A fading flower, a falling leaf,
A passing shade, a flashing gleam,
A thought, a phantom, or a dream;
We creatures are of yesterday,—
Tomorrow we may pass away,
And leave no track upon the sand,
When dead we find the wave-washed strand.

But oh, the Everlasting One,
Who marks the ages as they run
Whose years eternally endure,
Who lives in endless bliss secure,
Though years may pass, and life may end,
This God, this Saviour is our Friend;
And we may share His love divine,
And in His endless glory shine.

What years of bliss shall for us wait
When we shall pass the pearly gate,
And in perpetual peace behold
Those streets of palaces and gold;
And in the eastern glory see
The King who died upon the tree;
Who bore the cross and wore the crown,
And on his Father's throne sits down;
While all heaven's host triumphant sing
And praise the everlasting King.

To that eternal happy home
Nor clouds nor changes shall come,
No pain nor sorrow, dew nor fears,
Shall cloud the glad, eternal years,
But joy unspeakable shall roll
Through every blood-washed, ransomed soul.

And they who, through the passing years,
Have felt earth's sorrows, woes and tears,
Redeemed from earth and purged from sin,
Shall hear the welcome, "Enter in!"
And in Love's palace dwell,
Shall with the ransomed sing and shine;
Released from sorrows and from fears,
From disappointments, pain and tears,
With joy their anthems they shall raise,
And sing the Savior's wondrous praise.

Oh, ye who mark each passing year,
Your time of sojourn pass in fear,
For not with you and earth it ends,
That fix an immortality.
But through the boundless face of God.
Your souls have been redeemed with blood;
Glad ransomed, pardoned, cleansed from sin,
You might that endless kingdom win,
And gaze upon the glories there,
And all the joyous raptures share.

Oh years! Oh years! How fast ye fly!
Dragging Retribution's mourning sigh;
Speed on! Speed on your mournful flight!
Change ere to-morn, and morn to night,
And bring the everlasting day
When fears and sighs shall flee away;
There may we meet, redeemed by blood,
Within the Paradise of God.
And, hope beyond all care and fear,
Hail God's eternal, glad New Year.

"JUDAH."

What important associations—both past and future, cluster around the name "Judah"—which signifies the "praise of the Lord." The fourth Son of Jacob and Leah, whose name was borne by the most numerous and powerful of all the tribes of Israel.

It will not be out of place to refer to some of the most important incidents in his early history, and which give him the pre-eminence, leaving out those parts which are not altogether to his credit and which show the weakness of human nature. God in his infinite wisdom uses that instrumentality is best suited for him, in bringing about his own purposes. Thus in the language of the Psalmist, "He refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim: but chose the tribe of Judah, the Mount Zion which he loved" Psa. lxxviii. 67, 68. It was by "Judah's" kindly interference that Joseph was saved, when his brethren had conspired against his life. He was a man of strong and determined character. Like Peter among the twelve apostles—he was the leading spirit among the twelve patriarchs and which afterwards culminated in the twelve tribes. Witness his pleadings with his aged father to get his consent to have his youngest brother Benjamin go down with them in their second journey into Egypt to buy corn to keep them alive; and second, in his humble supplications to Joseph (Inegoito) who was then lord over all Egypt. This touching appeal of "Judah" concerning his younger brother (Benjamin) melted Joseph's heart, he could refrain himself no longer—he wept aloud so that the Egyptians in the house of Pharaoh heard. The time had come for him to tell them that he was their long-lost brother, "Joseph," whom they sold into Egypt. Don't be grieved or angry with yourselves that ye sold me hither, for God did send me before you to preserve life—to preserve you a posterity in the earth and to save yourselves by a great deliverance. "Judah" was a mouth piece for his brethren. He had become surety for his younger and beloved brother Benjamin, and he was willing to be retained as a bondsman in Joseph's house, if so be his brother Benjamin could be set at liberty and return to his father. For details, the reader is referred to the 43 and 44 chapters of Genesis. This account of Joseph and his brethren can scarcely be read with dry eyes. The story never grows old. It conveys lessons to all future generations, the workings of God's providence through instrumentality not of the most likely kind in the estimation of man.

"He makes the wrath of man to praise him." Joseph sends for his father and all his brethren and their children—and Jacob sends "Judah" before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen for they were given the best of the land to dwell in;—and Joseph nourished his father and his brethren and all his father's household with bread according to their families.

The time arrives when Jacob is about to die: and he calls his sons together that he may tell them that which may befall them in the last days;—and when he pronounces his dying and prophetic blessing on his sons, "Judah" was distinguished above the rest, and the regal power and influence of his tribe is foretold. (Genesis xlix. 8–12) "Judah" thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou risest: he stooped down, he couched as a lion and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from "Judah" (forever) nor a lawgiver from between his feet, because Shiloh shall come and to him shall the homage of the nations be. In this prophecy we see a prominence given to Judah, that is given to no other tribe, e. g., That Judah should be the praise of all the tribes;—that it should subdue its enemies;—that it should rule over all Israel;—that its government should be monarchial;—that Shiloh should arise out of it as a lawgiver; that the gathering of the people should be to him. Such are some of the points into which the members of Jacob's beautiful prophecy concerning the things of the kingdom, in connection with "Judah" as the royal tribe, are to be understood. In not the present position of Judah as an old lion in a crouching position, stooping down and crouching as an old lion? and in view of his present prostration, Jacob inquired. "Who shall rouse him up?" Yes, who shall, do it? Who shall start him to his feet again, that he may rend and tread down and devour the enemies of Jerusalem? Who but Shiloh, whose goodly horse in the battle "Judah" is appointed to be? Does not the language of the prophet Zephaniah embrace this future rising up to the prey?

"Wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey; for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms; to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger; for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy. For then will I turn to the people a pure language that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent."

When Shiloh comes as a lawgiver of "Judah," the "law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." So we see Jacob's dying and prophetic blessing on "Judah," contains in it the hope of Israel. It also shows what a definite understanding Jacob had of the promises made to him, and his fathers. His faith was of things substantial and definable. He looked for a kingdom and an empire, whose royal domain should be the land of Canaan, and especially that part of it allotted to "Judah," and whose imperial ruler should be "Shiloh" (which signifies "the giver of peace") descended from his loins in the line of "Judah." "It is evident our Lord sprang out of "Judah" (according to Paul's testimony). The first verse of the New Testament is very suggestive. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ the son of David the son of Abraham. Abraham begat Isaac; and Isaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat "Judah"—and his brethren. From Genesis to Revelation we have the important fact set forth, that Judah was pre-eminent in the purpose of Jehovah—springing from that tribe, God's Messiah has given to him that wonderful title "The Lion of the tribe of Judah." (Lion symbol of power). In view of what has been said, we can see the propriety of that sublime language contained in the 76th Psalm. "In Judah is God known," (or according to the Massoretic text "In Judah hath God been made known.") "His name is great in Israel." "The vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant."

"When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language; "Judah" was his sanctuary and Israel his dominion." The sea saw it and fled; Jordan was driven back. The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan that thou wast driven back? ye mountains that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs?" Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob." The miraculous display of power is accounted for, by the presence of Jehovah, and which was witnessed by Israel in their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and also in their receiving the law from Mount Sinai, for it is testified that the whole mountain quaked greatly and all the people that was in the camp trembled at what they saw and heard from the top of the mount. And did not God make himself known also in their journeyings through the wilderness, in the pillar of cloud by day and pillar of fire by night, and in their daily supply of manna from heaven and water from the flinty rock?

Surely "in Judah" hath God been made known, his name is great in "Israel." If the reader will compare Ex. xix. 16–25, and Ex. xxiv. chap. with Deutronomy iv. 30–40, and Heb. xii. 18–29, he will have a better understanding of these things than I can give him. The Lord chose the nation of Israel through whom he might make himself known, and "that his name might be declared throughout all the earth." "This people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise." "You only have I known of all the families of the earth." (Isaiah and Amos.)

Israel's wonderful history in the past, is only an earnest of what will be in their future restoration. The displays of almighty power will be on a much grander and larger scale in the age to come. God's wonderful dealings with that nation, is the theme of the Old Testament Scriptures; the subject will not be an unprofitable study for the believer, especially for us who are looking for the near fulfillment of those gracious promises of God to the fathers of the Jewish race. In their history we see a picture of human nature, and also we have shown us the characteristics of Jehovah's name, viz.: "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the presumptious."

It is for us who have the high privilege of living in this age, to profit by their experience. Israel, although at present blinded, is still "beloved for the fathers' sakes, and are destined to bud and blossom and fill the face of the world with fruit."

"In that day will I make the governors of Judah like an hearth of fire among the wood and like a torch of fire in a sheaf, and they shall devour all the people round about on the right hand and on the left, and Jerusalem shall be inhabited in her place, even in Jerusalem. The Lord also shall save the tents of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem do not magnify themselves against Judah." Thus we see Judah has the preeminence as the head of the nation."

The tribe of Judah when it left Egypt numbered seventy-four thousand fighting men,—fifteen more than any of the rest (see Num. 1 chapter). It was regarded as the leading tribe in the conquest of Canaan. Its allotment was large and adapted to its future increase. It assumed the sceptre in the person of David, for it was the house of "Judah" that crowned David king, and David reigned over the house of Judah seven years and six months; and when the ten tribes revolted Judah followed the house of David. The reader will find this matter amplified in 1 Kings xi. 30–37. But perhaps I am wearying you in these desultory remarks in showing the pre-eminence of "Judah." It will not do always to dwell on the past. It is the future promises concerning Judah and Israel, that give the past their significance.

We look forward to that day when "the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people,"—when "he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of "Judah" from the four corners of the earth." "And in that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee: though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me. Behold God is my salvation, I will trust and not be afraid: for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." (The reservoir from which they draw no doubt refers to Christ and his saints in their exalted and glorified state.) "And in that day ye (Israel) shall say, praise the Lord, proclaim his name, declare his doings among the people, make mention that his name is exalted. Sing unto the Lord; for he has done excellent things: this is known in all the earth. Cry out and shout thou inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee." "And the Lord shall inherit "Judah" his portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again." You will find "Judah's" portion described in Ezek. xlviii. 8–22.

If Judah's part of the Holy Land, as anciently divided among the tribes was so much superior, embracing within its boundaries Mount Zion and Jerusalem the city of the Great King, what may we expect of it as the future seat of government—when Judah's lion shall reign King over all the earth,—when God's hand hath touched it and produced those wonderful changes spoken of in Zech. xiv. chapter.

Will it not be the "perfection of beauty? the joy of the whole earth?" and in which Jehovah will place salvation. Can we wonder why the Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob?

"Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God, beautiful art thou for situation"—"The Lord has chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation." "This is my rest forever; here will I dwell; for I have desired it." What? will God, in very deed, dwell with men on the earth? "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God.

"The Lord shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel. So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Zion; my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the hills of "Judah" shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord and shall water the valley of Shittim etc.,—but Judah shall abide forever and Jerusalem from generation to generation, for the Lord dwelleth in Zion." "His works will be declared in her, when saviors shall come up on Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's," for upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness; and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions."

To this beloved brethren we are come, [by faith] "to Mount Zion and to the City of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem," to the Mount Zion upon which the Lamb stood with the 144 thousand. O, how the builders will be astonished when they behold the stone Jehovah laid there for a foundation;—the precious corner-stone, when he will lay judgment to the line and righteousness to the plummet. Beloved, what a hope! Blessed is he that believeth, for there shall be a performance of those things which the Lord hath spoken. "Blessed be the Lord God for he has visited and redeemed his people. To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace." We acknowledge the infinite wisdom and goodness of Jehovah in all his past dealings with mankind, as revealed in his word, and which are only preparatory to that dispensation of the fulness of the times when all things shall be gathered under one head even Christ—when the knowledge of the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. When the long, long promised blessing of all nations,—reaching every family of the earth, shall be realized,—the curse of sin removed from the earth and all things made new. Creation groans for this "manifestation of the sons of God," when the order will be, God first, Christ second, the Saints third, Judah fourth, Israel fifth, and the nations sixth. O, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen.

JOHN. O. WOODWARD.

Brother John Foore of Galesburg, Nuesho Co., Kan., is expected to commence a series of meetings three and one half miles from Shoals, Martin Co. Ind., on Saturday night before the second Sunday in January, 1886, to continue about two weeks, the Lord willing. If any of the brethren in Indiana desire him to preach for them while he is in the state, they can address him at Galesburg, Kan., till about Jan. 8, and after that for a couple of weeks his address will be Shoals, Martin Co., Indiana.

The Star of Bethlehem.

There, in the solemn hush of night,
Hermon in snowy splendor towered,
And Hebron gladdened in the light
Which on her russet brow was showered.

Low coursing, in the dark-blue sky,
A new-born orb resplendent shone.
The light of Jora was paled thereby,
And Venus into shade was thrown.

Not as some blazing meteor flies
But see—majestically slow.
It sails along the Orient sky,
And gives the night a mellowed glow!

The Travelers on the pathless Wilds
With bold assumes the Star surveyed,
And cry, while fay each bosom thrills,
"It leads the way! It leads the way!"

While thus their trust in Heaven they proved;
Unseen, bright angels o'er them bent,
The Morning-stars in music moved,
And that sphered Light before them went!

Above the Syrian plains it poised,
And rained upon the land a flood
Of silver radiance, till at last
O'er Bethlehem's white-robed slopes it stood.

The Magi—with their gifts of gold.
And frankincense and myrrh—then rouse
The Heavenly Babe, by birds of old
Foretold in strains from seraphs caught!

They found him in a manger laid:
They knelt before Him, and adored;
The regal look His brow displayed
Told plainly here was Christ the Lord!

Beautiful Home.

What a hallowed name! How full of enchantment, how dear to the heart! Home is the magic circle within which the weary spirits find refuge. It is the sacred asylum to which the care-worn heart retreats to find rest from the toils and inquietudes of life.

Home! that touches every fiber of the soul, and strikes every chord of the human heart with angelic fingers. Nothing but death can break its spell. What tender associations are linked with home! What pleasing images and deep emotions it awakens! It calls up the fondest memories of life, and opens in our nature the purest, deepest, richest gush of consecrated thought and feeling.

Some years ago some twenty thousand people gathered in the old Castle Garden, New York, to hear Jennie Lind sing as no other songstress ever had sung the sublime compositions of Beethoven, Handel, etc. At length, the Swedish Nightingale thought of her home, paused, and seemed to fold her wings for a higher flight. She began with deep emotion to pour forth "Home, Sweet Home." At once there was an uproar of applause that silenced the song. Tears gushed from those thousands like rain. Beethoven and Handel were forgotten. After a moment the song came again, seemingly as from heaven, almost angelic. Home, that was the word that bound as with a spell twenty thousand souls, and Howard Payne triumphed over the great masters of song. When we look at the brevity and simplicity of this home-song, we are ready to ask, What is the charm that lies concealed in it? Why does the dramatist and poet find his reputation resting on so apparently narrow a basis? The answer is easy. Next to religion the deepest and most ineradicable sentiment in the human soul is that of the home affection. Every heart vibrates to this theme. Home has an influence which is stronger than death. It is a law to our hearts, and binds us with a spell which neither time nor change can break. There childhood nestles like a bird which has built its abode among roses; there the cares and the coldness of earth are, as long as possible, averted. Flowers there bloom or fruits ripen on every side, and there Paradise would indeed be restored, could mortal power ward off the consequences of sin. This new garden of the Lord would then abound in beauty unsullied, and trees of the Lord's planting, bearing fruit to his glory would be found in plenty there.

Home of my childhood! What words fall upon the ear with so much of music in their cadence as those which recall the scenes of innocent and happy childhood, now numbered with the memories of the past. How fond recollection delights to dwell upon the events which marked our early pathway; when the unbroken home circle presented a scene of loveliness rarely sought but in the bosom of a happy family! Intervening years have not dimmed the vivid coloring with which memory has adorned those joyous hours of youthful innocence. We are again born on the wings of imagination to the place made sacred by the remembrance of a father's care, a mother's love, and the cherished associations of brothers and sisters.

None can tell how often the commission of crime is prevented by such memories. If, then, the spell of home is so powerful, how important it is to make it pleasant and lovable! Many a time a cheerful home and smiling face does more to make good men and women than all the learning and eloquence that can be used. It has been said that the sweetest words in our language are "Mother, Home, and Heaven," and one might almost say the word home includes them all, for who can think of home without remembering the gentle mother who sanctified it by her presence? And is not home the dearest name for heaven? We think of that better land as a home where brightness will never end in night. Oh, then may our homes on earth be the centers of all our joys! May they be as green spots in the deserts, to which we can retire when weary of the cares and perplexities of life, and drink the clear waters of love which we know to be sincere and always unfailing.

Home's not merely four square walls,
Though with pictures hung and gilded:
Home is where affection calls,
Filled with shrines the heart hath builded.
Home! go watch the faithful dove;
Sailing 'neath the heaven above us!
Home is where there's one to love us!
Home is where there's one to love us!

Home's not merely roof and room,
It needs something to endear it;
Home is where the heart can bloom,
Where there's some kind lips to cheer it!
What is home with none to greet us!
Home is sweet,—and only sweet
When there's one we love to meet us.

My Dear Children.

In my last I told you about a brave shepherd boy, in this I want to tell you about a sweet babe whose name signifies "one drawn out." His parents lived on the banks of the Nile, a river situated in Egypt. They loved God, and tried to do every thing pleasing to him. At the time the babe was born a very cruel king ruled the people who hated the Israelites. Fearing they would become a mightier nation than the Egyptians he ordered every boy baby to be thrown into the river, therefore commanded his servants to search each home and not regard the earnest plea of the poor mother to keep her little one, but tear it from her. The meaning of the king's name is, "That which disperses," or spoils, "Every Hebrew woman was always more glad when she became the mother of a boy than a girl, because the promise of a Redeemer was to come in this way. You can now better understand the deep love this dear mother had for the sweet little boy of whom the Scriptures say "He was fair to God," Acts vii 20 margin. How very beautiful he must have been; she had another son, but there was something so lovely in this one that I think she would have given up all she had to save this precious babe. As it grew stronger its cry became louder. She had hid it three months, but now her hope to do so any longer was gone, for no doubt the cruel servants would enter her house in search of the little one and the dear mother would tremble greatly lest they should find it. I can imagine how her sad heart would go up to God in prayer to direct her what to do, and perhaps while she was waiting upon God, he impressed her mind to go to the edge of the river and gather some rushes, and of them weave a basket. No doubt all the time her busy fingers was weaving it, her aching heart would yearn to know if this was truly the right way. For no angel if the Lord came to instruct her, and she knew nothing about the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob except what her parents had told her, and the trying circumstances which then surrounded her would almost forbid her to hope. A mother like the one who is writing would consider the plan this mother took to be the very way to expose her darling infant to every danger, but her strong living faith in the God of her fathers caused her to continue the purpose in her heart and watch the result. With great care she secured the basket with pitch so that it would resist the water, and when she had fed and had neatly dressed the precious fair one, giving it as she doubtless thought her last loving embrace, with a sad heart, amid bitter tears, she laid it in its tiny resting place on the river side among the flags, which was not far from the cruel king's palace. I have not told you that this dear babe had a kind sister, who stood afar off lest any one passing should throw it into the river, or carry it away, and we are sure the mother's keen eye and listening ear would eagerly catch the first sound of any footsteps going toward the spot where her darling treasure lay. But while the sister was watching, strange to say, the daughter of the cruel king and her servants were wending their steps in the very direction where the babe was. The sister had no time to tell her mother, who was no doubt weeping and praying for her helpless little one, for she well knew if the Princess had a kinder heart than her cruel father, and would take it to the palace no mercy would be shown. Therefore no doubt the watchful tender sister give up all hope now that the life of this precious one would be spared, and think of the bitter despair that must have filled the heart of the sorrowing mother, how she must have pondered. Can this be God's way of protection? Have I trusted in vain? this is contrary to what I expected, can the remainder of man's wrath praise thee, O God? But I am pleased to tell you dear children this royal princess, was kind and benevolent, and although brought up amid grandeur she felt the sorrows her cruel father had inflicted upon the Hebrews. When she came to the rivers brink she was the first to spy the little basket, and told one of her maidens to fetch it, perhaps the mother had placed it there when asleep, nestling it in its little basket, but when the king's daughter opened it, the sweet babe wept. No doubt by this time it was hungry and cold, its pitiful cry brought compassion to her tender heart, and convinced her some poor Hebrew mother had struggled in this way to save it. The watchful sister who stood afar off when first the babe was laid there now ventures near it, but appears like a stranger passing that way, and said to the king's daughter, "Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew woman that she may nurse the child for thee;" she said, go, and the maid no doubt said, come, mother, come quickly, the king's daughter is not going to take our sweet babe to the palace, but sent me to find some Hebrew mother to nurse it for her. How gladly did her footsteps hasten to the spot, lifting up her heart in silent gratitude to him in whom she had trusted. The king's daughter little thought she was giving back to the mother her own sweet infant whom she had longed to comfort and feed. The precious one never looked so fair to her as now, by faith she hid him, and by faith trusted him on the river's bank, not fearing the cruelty of the king's command, because he was fair to God. Can you not imagine what joy the dear father must have felt when he came home in the evening from his terrible hard work to hear the sweet story of God's loving care over his precious boy; he could surely discern that a Royal Hand had indeed drawn him out for some wonderful work in the future, his father was of the tribe of Levi, and the meaning of his name is Honorable people: his mother's signifies, "glorious and honorable."

Conference Notice.

The first quarterly conference of the Church of God in the Abrahamic faith, will be held, the Lord willing, at the Winchester school house in the township of Byron, Kent Co., Mich., commencing on Friday evening, Jan. 16, and continuing over Sunday. Brother A. M. Smith of Otsego, and other preaching brethren will be present to preach the word. A cordial invitation is extended to all lovers of the truth to attend this meeting and help move the cause of Christ to his name's honor and glory. Those coming from the north and south on the Grand Rapids & Indiana R. R., morning and evening, will stop at Carlisle Station, and inquire for Brother Edward Smith. Teams will be in readiness on Friday to convey the comers to the meeting. Those coming on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern will stop at Byron Center and inquire for Brother William Moses, or Brother Lorman Torrell. M. A. WOODWARD, Sec.

I wish to say to the brethren that I am ready for a call to labor in the Master's vineyard anywhere, and at any time. Address me at Galesburg, Mich. L. H. CHENEBROUGH.

FOR THE NEW YEAR.

Another year! another year!
Has borne its record to the skies,
Another year! another year,
Untried, unproved, before us lies;
We hail with smiles its dawning ray—
How shall we meet its final day?

Another year, another year!
Its squandered hours will never return.
Oh! many a heart must quail with fear
O'er memory's blotted page to turn.
No record from the leaf will fade,
Not one erasure may be made.

Another year, another year!
How many a grief has marked its flight!
Some whom we love, no more are here—
They sleep in dust and utterless night.
Ah! none can bless the coming year
Like those no more to greet us here.

Another year, another year!
Oh! many a blessing, too, was given
Our lives to cheer, our hearts to cheer.
And sanctify the joys of heaven.
But they, too, slumber in the past,
Where joys and griefs must sink at last.

Another year, another year!
Ours we no longer can the part,
Nor let us shrink, with fearless fears,
From the dark shade the future casts.
The past, the future—what are they
To those whose lives—way and holy?

Another year, another year!
Perchance the last of life we see.
Who, ere its close, Death's call may hear
None but the Lord of life can know.
Oh! to be found, wherever that may
May come, prepared to part away.

Another year, another year!
Help us earth's thorny path to tread;
So may each moment bring us near
To Thee, except us Lord and God.
Savior! we yield ourselves to Thee,
For time and for eternity.

THE COVENANTS.—PART I.

It seems I have failed as yet to make the covenant and genealogy question satisfactory to all in some respects; and that it is really necessary, in the interest of the truth on that important subject, to make further explanations as to some points, before they are lost sight of. Some interested parties in the old country as well as in this, in writing me relative to some misunderstood and misrepresented features of the question. I think it better therefore to respond to all through the RESTITUTION, in this way—endeavoring if possible, to make some things a little plainer, that all may be perfectly satisfied.

It is understood by some that the throne and kingdom of David was, by the terms of the covenant established with him forever, that is without end, unconditionally; but not so with Solomon: that with him it was conditional, and the condition was obedience. That Solomon as the head and representative of his line, was on probation for the throne and kingdom of David, ... for its everlasting continuance in his line."

But right here is the mistake, the misapprehension. The throne and kingdom of David; and that of Solomon, and of Israel are one and the same. As one is established, so is the other. The unending establishment and continuance of that throne and kingdom was forever settled by the unconditional terms of the covenant with David. We shall find by the careful examination of the Scriptures, which we shall soon make, that the conditional feature or part of the covenant, resting forth that for which Solomon and his children (David's children) were on probation was not the "everlasting continuance in his line," but the uninterrupted continuance. We shall find that it was not whether the rightful heir should be brought through the line of Solomon, or through the Nathan line: nothing of the kind. That was settled by the unconditional terms of the covenant. But we shall find it was whether there should be a "failure of a man on the throne of Israel"—a temporary failure, a break, or interruption. We shall find from this that depends upon the obedience or disobedience of David's children—or Solomon and his children. We shall find it was whether or not God's chosen Nation—the children of Israel should continue their uninterrupted occupancy of the "goodly land"—the territory of the kingdom, or whether they should be driven from it, "cast off," "The temples destroyed" and their throne and kingdom be "overturned and become no more until he come whose right it is." It was this result that would have been averted by the obedience of David's children—Solomon and his children, and the people. It was primarily the greater duration out of the same conditional feature of this same "everlasting covenant" when made with Abraham—"I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations [what were made with David and Solomon as types, and Christ as the antitype, as the Royal seed,") for an everlasting covenant.... and I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee,... all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession;" ... "and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies." That is; all the kingdoms of this world are to become his." Gen. xvi. 7, 8; xxii. 17. This is the unconditional part of the covenant. The conditional part of the covenant with Abraham is as follows. "Every man child shall be circumcised, and the uncircumcised man child shall be cut off from his people, he hath broken my covenant." "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant, ... and shall do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God, to provoke him to anger. I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall utterly perish, ... ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall be utterly destroyed; and the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number, ... and there ye shall serve gods," and "utterly destroyed" is applied to Israel as a nation. That is, it appears from the overmuch wicked Rabbi, [illegible] them, [illegible] and the fourth the actual rebels who were destroyed [illegible] Num. xvi 20-49; [illegible] dead [illegible] day, so these will not appear.... I declare unto you this day that ye shall surely perish, ... not prolong your days upon the land whither thou passest over Jordan to go in and possess it." Gen xvii 22-24; Deut. iv. 10 30; xviii. 18. When [illegible] children of Israel [illegible] into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee and shalt possess it, ... [illegible] (the people), shalt in anywise [illegible] king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose: (David [illegible] xxix. 19;) one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee.

... in it shall be, when he (David) [illegible] upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book, ... and it shall be with him, (David did as here required, for he said thy law, thy commandments, "they are ever with me." Ps. cxix. 97, 98; and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: ... that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left; to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he and his children, in the midst of Israel." Deut. xvii. 14-20. Here we learn that David's uninterrupted continuance of his occupancy of his kingdom over Israel in their land, and the continuation of the people—the subjects of the kingdom—in that land, depended upon the obedience of David and his children, and the people. He was obedient, his kingdom prospered, and the Lord gave rest round about from all his enemies 2 Sam. vii. 1; and then made a covenant with him establishing the throne and kingdom with him and his sons, Solomon and Jesus, forever—without end—"The kingdom of the Lord in the hand of the sons of David," 2 Chron. xiii. 8.

It was thus permanently and conditionally established by the following unconditional clauses and terms of the covenant, and the like.

"I have exalted one chosen out of the people." Deut. xvii. 16. "The Lord God of Israel chose me (David) before all the house of my father to be king over Israel for ever." 1 Chron. xxviii. 4. "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant: Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations. ... His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established for ever as the moon." Ps. lxxxix. "Also the Lord telleth that he will make thee an house. ... The Lord will build thee an house, ... thine house (family—"house of David") and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: (that is, in his presence, ultimately,) thy throne shall be established for ever"—endlessly, 2 Sam. vii. 11, 16; 1 Chron. xvii. 10, 14, 16, 25. "Behold a son shall be born to thee.... his name shall be Solomon. (This being one of the unconditional clauses of the covenant; David's terrible sin in killing Uriah to get his wife, could not make it void defeat it or interfere with it; even though the sin was so horrible as to "give great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." And I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. He shall build an house for my name: and he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever." 1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10, "I will set up thy seed after thee and I will establish the throne of his kingdom." 2 Sam. vii. 12. "I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; (Solomon and Jesus) and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son."

1 Chron. xvii. 11-13. Let it ever be borne in mind, that this "SON," distinctly includes both Solomon and Jesus. This is evident not only from the definite remarkable wording here and elsewhere, but from the fact that Paul applies this wonderful declaration "my Son" directly to Jesus. Heb. i. 5. I say it includes both Solomon and Jesus. That is Solomon was not only the type, but the actual literal beginning of that "seed" of David which ultimately culminated in the "one seed which is Christ"—"the seed of David according to the flesh." In other words, Solomon was the beginning of the flesh of David's "son" which culminated in the constitution of the flesh of Jesus; or, the flesh of Solomon was the beginning of the flesh of him "who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh and declared to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." Rom. i. 2, 3.

But I proceed to quote one or two more of the unconditional clauses of the covenant about this "chosen" Son of David. "And king Solomon shall be blessed and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord for ever..... And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon." 1 Kings ii. 44, 45. "The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and his Sons"—Solomon and Jesus. 2 Chron. xiii. 5. "My covenant will I not break nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Psa. lxxxix. 34.

I think the above clauses quite sufficient. It will be observed that they are all absolutely unconditional; and that they establish the throne and kingdom with both David and Solomon for ever—without end, without a single condition, and without any alteration.

But although the kingdom is thus established to continue without an end; it does not necessarily follow that it was to continue without an interruption—without a temporary failure of "a man on the throne of Israel." Instead of that, the terms of the covenant as expressed in various clauses distinctly show, that its unbroken continuance without "a failure of a man on the throne of Israel," from its occupancy by Solomon clear down to Christ's return, and occupancy as the never-dying Heir—depended entirely upon the obedience of David's children—Solomon and his children. Their obedience would secure not the coming of the Royal Heir—David's spiritual Son in the line of Solomon instead of Nathan, not the neverending continuance of the throne and kingdom; these were secured by the unconditional terms of the covenant. (There were "the sure mercies of David." Isa. lv. 3; Acts xiii. 34.) But their obedience would secure such continuance of the kingdom perpetually, that is, without an interruption or temporary failure, while their disobedience would result in a failure for the time being of "a man on the throne of Israel," 2 Chron. xiii. 8.

We will now examine the conditional terms and clauses of the covenant. I have already quoted the words of the Lord by Moses (Deut. xvii. 14-20) pointing down to David as the "chosen" king, more than 300 years before he was born, which show that the perpetual uninterrupted continuance of his kingdom for the time being—during the forty years of his reign (which began about 13 years before the covenant was made with him)—depended upon his own and his children's obedience. But after the covenant was made with him, and his covenanted son, Solomon, succeeded him on the throne, to whom David's never-to-end divine right to sit upon the throne of the Lord over Israel, had been granted, by virtue of the covenant, as above shown; after that, the perpetual, uninterrupted continuance of the throne, from that point down to the coming of him whose right it is, depended upon the obedience of Solomon and his children—David's children—as had been made known to David in the covenant, made with him twenty-seven years before, viz: if his children were not obedient there would be a failure to David of a man on the throne of Israel for the time being. "Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he charged Solomon saying, I go the way of all the earth; be thou strong therefore, and show thyself a man; and keep the charge of the Lord thy God to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses;....that the Lord may continue his word which he spake concerning me, saying, if thy children (Solomon and his children) take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (David) a man on the throne of Israel." 1 Kings ii. 4. Nothing here about "bringing the deathless heir through another line." But simply a temporary failure of a man—to David—to sit on his throne, as has been the case ever since Zedekiah was dethroned, and is to continue to be the case until he come whose right it is. The failure is therefore "not utterly." but for the time being. Again, another of the conditional clauses of the covenant reads as follows. "If he (Solomon) commits iniquity. I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men, but my mercy shall not depart away from him as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee." (David). 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15. "The sceptre shall not utterly depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, for Shiloh (Messiah, Prince of Peace. Dr. Young) shall come and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Gen. xlix. 10. I believe this to be the correct rendering. In Saul's case, it was a refusal to establish his kingdom, and a taking it away from him, his house or family forever—an "utter departure." But in Solomon's case it was established in his hand forever—without end, but not without intermission. It has not therefore utterly departed. It is only a temporary failure. "If his children forsake my law,....and keep not my commandments, then I will visit their transgressions with the rod and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him. Psa. lxxxix. 30-33. It is therefore worse than folly to try to "construe" the language so as to mean that it has utterly departed from Solomon just as from Saul, except in the manner of doing the same thing. It is truly surprising to see what some will resort to, in order to sustain a mere imagination.

Again, about ten years after Solomon came to the throne, and had finished the house of the Lord, he was anxious there should be no failure of the kingdom, and he prayed, quoting God's conditional promise to his father David, praying God to keep his promise. He says, "Therefore now Lord God of Israel, keep with thy servant David my father, that thou promisedst him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit on the throne of Israel; so that thy children take heed to their way, that they walk before me as thou hast walked before me." 1 Kings viii. 25. Who cannot see, that if this failure, that man, through the disobedience of David's children—Solomon, etc.,—was an endless eternal failure as to Solomon, it was the very same to David? It was therefore simply a temporary failure to both—to David as well as to Solomon—a vacancy of the throne and kingdom for the time being, and which interregnum we are expecting soon to terminate by the appearance upon the scene of the rightful, never-dying Heir.

Again, (1 Kings iii. 3-7), we are informed that God heard and answered Solomon's prayer. "The Lord said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication that thou hast made before me; I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; (that is, without end, and without intermission. That "house" would have been standing there yet, and God's name there yet, and so have been perpetuated without break or intermission, "perpetually" as defined a few words below, if Solomon and his children had been obedient) and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually, and if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart and in uprightness, to do according to all I have commanded thee, and wilt keep my statutes and my judgments; then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever (that is perpetually) without end and without intermission) as I promised to David thy Father, saying: There shall not fail thee (David) a man upon the throne of Israel. (This sentence clearly defines what was meant, viz: that there should be no failure of the kingdom of David—no intermission—if Solomon be obedient). But if ye shall at all turn from following me, ye or your children;....then will I cut off Israel (not Solomon merely) out of the land which I have given them; (not, I will bring "the deathless heir through another line," as has been strangely imagined and written) and this house, which I have hallowed for my name ("forever," as in verse 3) will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a by-word among all people."

This plainly sets forth what should be, and what has been the result of the disobedience of Solomon and his children. It was simply a suspension, an intermission for the time being, a taking away from Solomon and his father David God's "mercy" (the kingdom) until he come whose right it is, and not as it was taken from him that was before them—as corroborated by the following. "I will not take my mercy away from him (Solomon) as I took it from him that was before thee," (David). 1 Chron. xvii. 13. The same conditional clause is found in these words, viz: "If thy (David's) children—not merely Solomon only—will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, their children (that is, Solomon's children's children, not one child, the spiritual immortal one) shall also sit upon the throne for evermore." That is, continually, without any intermission. Again, the same conditional clause appears, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7, expressed in these words, viz: "Moreover I will establish his kingdom for ever;—that is, without end, and without intermission—if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgments as at this day, [Solomon was obedient at that day]..... that ye may possess this land, and leave it for an inheritance for your children after you forever," [continuously, without intermission.]....But if thou forsake him he will cast thee off forever." That is, thee and thy children and all Israel. 1 Chron xviii. 7-9. The word "thee" is probably used here in the same sense as in Deut. xvii. 14, 15, viz: "one from thy brethren shall thou set king over thee." That is over the children of Israel, not over one person. If "cast off forever" means any more than David did, when, speaking prophetically, he said, "O God, why hast thou cast us [the children of Israel] off forever?" Psa. lxxiv. 1; or than was meant when God said, "I will cast off this city Jerusalem which I have chosen, and the house of which I said my name shall be there forever;" 2 Kings xxiii. 27, and 1 Kings ix. 8, or, if forever, in this case, means any more than in Jonah's case, when he said, "I am cast out of thy sight; the earth with her bars was about me forever," that is, continually without any intermission, during the whole time he was in the belly of the fish, three days and nights; or in this, "he shall be thy servant forever," during life, Deut. xv. 17, and in many other cases wherever applied to anything which necessarily has an end; I say if in Solomon's case anything more was meant than in those cases, then it was that he was to be cast off like any other person if he persistently to the end of life, forsook God whom he once loved and obeyed. But in neither case would the question of Christ's descent in his line be affected. That was settled by the unconditional clause of the covenant; besides that Rehoboam his eldest son, and successor to the throne, was born long before Solomon turned away from the Lord and became disobedient. Besides that again, it does not appear that either Solomon or Coniah ever committed a more horrible sin than did David when he "despised the Lord and his commandment" in that matter of Solomon's mother, Bathsheba and her husband Uriah; then which no greater occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme" was ever given by any man. Nevertheless the Lord "put away David's sin that he should not die." It seems to have been absolutely necessary for the Lord to overlook it and spare David's life, in order that his covenant which he had made with him should not be broken, viz: that a son should be born to David, whose name should be Solomon, and in whom the throne of David's kingdom over Israel was to be established forever. Hence, although David's terrible sin greatly displeased the Lord, and its punishment and consequences followed him all the rest of his life, yet it could not be allowed to defeat or interfere with the carrying out of the unconditional feature of the covenant and purpose of Jehovah. Just so was it with the sins of David's children—Solomon and his children. Their sins could only cause an intermission or temporary interruption or suspension of the unconditionally established, never-ending kingdom. A meeting, of the sitting of a court may be unconditionally appointed and established to be held from one o'clock p. m. until ten—nine hours. But it does not follow that there must therefore of necessity be no intermission, dependent upon conditional circumstances.

In the light of the foregoing, who can fail to see that the result or consequence of disobedience, first on the part of David and his children [as I have shown] and then of Solomon and his children, was simply the failure for the time being, of a man on the throne and kingdom of David, as it now the case; simply an intermission or interruption; and that there is not one word about a change of the rightful Heir from Solomon's to Nathan's line. We have this interruption and casting off for the time being as the result of disobedience, brought to view. Psa. lxxxix. 38-44. David, after referring to the covenant "declaring the perpetuity of his throne to the strongest language possible," says prophetically, "But thou hast cast off and abhorred, [that is, cast off the Ruler off the throne, and the people off the land—the entire nation] thou hast been wroth with thine anointed, [David's representatives, Solomon, Zekekiah and others] thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant [David], thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground: [for the time being, but not utterly]. Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground," [until he comes whose right it is]. Nothing here about "bringing the deathless Heir through another line." To have done that on account of Solomon's sin would have broken the covenant as much as it would to have cast off David on account of his terrible sin. It has been said, "If it is impossible for David's seed to endure forever unless it comes through Solomon," etc.? I answer, it was impossible for David's promised seed to come otherwise than through Solomon; for it was impossible for God to lie. He promised David, that a son shall be born to thee—Solomon; and he said that of all David's sons he had chosen Solomon to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel; and that "the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon, and established forever;" as I have shown. He also said, once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David. His seed [of which Solomon was the beginning, by virtue of his being the beginning of the fulfillment of the covenant] shall endure forever.

It has been said, "It is a mistake to say that 'the kingdom was rent away from both lines—from all of David's children.' You cannot rend away from a man what he never possessed," etc. This, like many other things that have been said, is the result of misapprehension and a contracted view of the purposes of God. Such a view lacks breadth and comprehensiveness, which is the case with much that has been written on this subject, although the writers are evidently unconscious of the fact, and hence much misapprehension, and many erroneous conclusions.

The "kingdom" of Israel did not consist merely of the throne and its occupant. It includes the territory and the subjects, or the ruled, as well as the rulers. The subjects, the twelve tribes, or children of Israel "possessed" it as well as rulers, and were called, "the children of the kingdom;" and Christ said "the children of the kingdom shall be cast out." He also said, not to the rulers in Solomon's line, but to the descendents in both lines, to the nation: "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Matt. xxi. 43. In consequence of disobedience, it began to be taken or "rent" from them in Solomon's time and continued to be rent, overturned and taken from them, both rulers and ruled, until the rending was completed in the destruction of the Capital, Jerusalem, and that wonderful "house of God," Solomon's Temple.

But although they have been thus "cast off" and "cast out" in consequence of disobedience, the unconditional feature of the covenant stands sure. "I will bring them again to place them; for I have mercy, and they shall be as though I had not cast them off." Zech. x. 6. And although there is a temporary failure, yet the covenant stands sure—The "Sure mercies"—that the time shall come, and doubtless in the near future, when "David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel." Jer. xxxiii. 17; as the never-dying Heir—David's Son and Lord—will take the throne, and "reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

TO CORRESPONDENTS!

The Restitution advocates the Anti-apostasy theory of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

EARLY CHRISTIAN UNANIMITY.
PART I.

The coming kingdom of Christ is to to be a Divine, visible monarchy on earth, over all nations. The testimony of the Bible to that effect is ample and explicit. Hence it is written of the Lord Jesus Christ—"The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. He shall reign from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one. The kingdoms of this world are [to] become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." John, in spirit, heard the redeemed sing: "Thou hast made us unto our God, kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth."

These and many other deliverances in Holy Scripture teach us that this earth is to be the place of Messiah's kingdom when he shall take to himself his great power and reign; and that this is the kingdom promised to the redeemed for their inheritance. "The kingdom, and dominion, and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him" Dan. vii. 27.

Yet some maintain that the kingdom, for which the faithful in Christ Jesus are taught to hope, is not on earth but in heaven; and, in proof of this, quote the words of the apostle Paul, "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom" 2 Tim. iv. 18. But this is only quoting Scripture against Scripture, and thus proving nothing. There is, however, nothing in these words at variance with those used in the song of the redeemed. When the venerable apostle expressed his confidence that the Lord would deliver him from every evil work, and preserve him blameless unto his heavenly kingdom, he was thinking of that kingdom promised to the saints of the Most High—"the kingdom under the whole heaven."

The term heavenly denotes not the locality but quality of the kingdom of God. Hence we pray: "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven." What is it that renders heaven so transcendentally grand, glorious, and morally excellent? Not its locality, but the character of its inhabitants—their perfect obedience to the will of God. "And were the population of earth to possess and maintain a character similar to the inhabitants of heaven, surely that would warrant the appellation heavenly. And such will be the condition of this world when the glorious Lord, by his potent and universal reign, has brought all in subjection to God.

In order to illustrate the heavenly character and benign grandeur of the kingdom of Messiah upon earth, and impress the picture more vividly on your minds, we ask your attention to the following essential and distinguishing characteristics of that glorious reign.

1. The laws of that kingdom will be perfectly just. It is the kingdom of God, and its whole arrangements are made by him. Being himself perfectly wise, just, and good, all his enactments must partake of the same qualities. "Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne; mercy and truth go before his face." The thrones of iniquity which frame mischief by law can have no place under his administration.

The necessity of righteous laws for the regulation of society is apparent to all. The professed aim of all legislation is to that end, and in so far as a legislature is successful in constructing just and wise measures for the regulation of the affairs of the community, so far as the happiness of the community is provided for. How far short of perfection must the enactments of man be compared with those of him whose wisdom is infinite! The kingdom of men has existed for ages in many forms. In the present day, even in our own country, which we are wont to regard as the most favored of any in this respect, how great has been the failure! Hence the constant need of altering, amending, and reforming, and new enactments, which are seldom obtained without years of delay and enormous expense, and, after all, come far short of accomplishing what was expected. But "the law of the Lord is perfect," admitting of no improvement. He who made man knows best what laws are needed for men as individuals, families, and communities; and this perfect knowledge and wisdom, associated with justice and mercy, is to construct all laws in the kingdom of God's dear Son. "Out of Zion"—the place of his throne—"shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Thus the happiness of the kingdom of Christ is secured, so far as an absolutely righteous and perfect code of laws is capable of securing it to its multitudinous peoples. But more—

2. This righteous law shall be righteously administered. The well-being of a kingdom depends not only on the excellence of its laws, but also on their being righteously administered. Of this truth we have many illustrations, and chiefly in point of failure. Many legislative enactments have failed to accomplish their end, because their administrators had not enforced them; and the benefit of just laws is often prevented by their unequal application. But the righteous administration of the righteous laws of the Lord, among all the nations of the earth when his kingdom is established, is secured by the appointment of righteous and immortal Rulers—the Lord Jesus Christ and his glorified Church. For "God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath ordained" Acts xvii. 31. Thus shall be inaugurated that blessed era so beautifully depicted by "the sweet psalmist of Israel:"—"He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God. And he shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even as a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by the clear shining after rain." This was, to David, a matter of pure hope and fond desire, for he adds: "Although my house be not so with God, yet hath He made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure, for this is all my salvation and all my desire" 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-5. This salvation and this desire of the royal prophet-poet shall be realised when the Lord's Anointed, of the seed of David according to the flesh, is enthroned on Mount Zion, and reigns before his ancients gloriously. Thus hath Jehovah spoken: "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots; and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge, and the fear of the Lord; and make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord. And he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears; but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth; and He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins" Isa. xi. 1-5. "And in mercy shall the throne be established; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging and seeking judgment, and hastening righteousness" Isa. xvi. 5.

This administration of righteousness in the world was not only

"the hope that cheered David's heart," but also the hope of all true Israelites who walked in the footsteps of faithful Abraham, and the theme of their national songs—songs not the mere utterances of poetic genius, of the aspirations of patriotic feeling, but songs dictated by the Spirit of God for the solace and strength of his people. Here are a few specimens:—

"Give the King Thy judgments, O God, and Thy righteousness unto the King's Son. He shall judge Thy people with righteousness, and Thy poor with judgment. He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor. They shall fear Thee as long as the sun and moon endure throughout all generations. He shall come down like rain upon the newly-mown grass, as showers that water the earth. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. For he shall deliver the needy when he cries; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. Man shall be blessed in Him; all nations shall call him blessed" Psa. lxxii.

"O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness, fear before him all the earth. Say among the heathen that the Lord reigneth; He shall judge the people righteously. Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof. Let the fields be joyful and all that is therein, then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord, for he cometh to judge the earth. He shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth. The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice!" Psa. xcvi. and xcviii.

Not only will the reign of Christ be a heavenly kingdom by reason of its righteous rulers, but also—

3. The rulers of that kingdom shall be invested with power to enforce absolute obedience. We can fancy a kingdom with righteous statutes righteously administered, yet failing to secure the peace and well-being of its subjects by their disobedience and rebellion, whatever the form of government might be. The emperor of all the Russias has absolute power as a monarch, yet he cannot enact and carry out measures, however just, without the consent of the nobles, or secure the end of these measures if his subjects to a large extent refuse to obey them.

In the United States of America, where the laws are avowedly the expression of the people's will, legislative enactments, for good or evil, have sometimes been frustrated by organised disobedience. And the annals of our own country might also furnish illustrations of the failure of legislative measure through evasion of the law, or the dread of organised rebellion.

Such contingencies can have no place in the kingdom of God. Its rulers are able to protect the laws and crush rebellion. If the kingdom and nation that refuse to serve Israel under the new covenant shall perish, yea, be utterly wasted, Isa. lx. 12, how shall they escape who refuse submission to the statutes of Israel's King? Is it not written of him that "every soul that will not hear him shall be destroyed from among the people?" Acts iii. 22. Examples of the manner in which rebellion shall be treated under Messiah's rule are described in various parts of the prophetic word, see Psa. ii., xx.; Zech. xiv. 16-19; Rev. xix. "He must reign till all his enemies are put under his feet" 1 Cor. xv. 25.

True, indeed, when one thousand years of this divine rule shall have expired, Satan, having been again set free, shall succeed in deceiving the nations that are in the four quarters of the earth, and entice them to a strange and daring revolt; but the folly of the attempt will only the more emphatically illustrate the truth I am maintaining, by the complete and perpetual destruction of the Satan-led hosts, and their incorrigible and infatuated leader. The fire comes down from God out of heaven and consumes them, Rev. xx. 7-10.

Thus all failure in the execution of the righteous rule of Messiah is effectually prevented. But more—

4. Another element in the heavenly character of Christ's kingdom will be the spontaneous obedience of its subjects to the Divine law. Though power will be present to enforce obedience and crush rebellion, obedience for the most part will be the response of a grateful and intelligent appreciation of the excellence of Jehovah's law. When the Lord shall send the sceptre of Messiah's strength out of Zion, his people shall be willing in the day of his power, Psa. cx. 3. When the Redeemer comes to Zion he will turn away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26. His people shall be all righteous. "They shall know the Lord from the least of them to the greatest."

This greatful obedience will not be confined to Israel, but will characterise the Gentiles also, while all shall not be [illegible] nor be discouraged till he hath set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for his law. Wait for his law. How expressive of satisfied submission! They suspend their action till they have ascertained his will. What a contrast to the state of the people now. Then "many people shall go and say, Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" Isa. ii. "Men shall be blessed in him, and all nations shall call him blessed" Psa. lxxii.

And thus the kingdom of God, "under the whole heaven," shall be a heavenly kingdom.

An Inscription from a Tomb in El-Kab.

An inscription, which appears to us highly significant, is found in one of the tombs at El-Kab. Judging from the peculiarity of the language, from the style of the pictorial decoration of the rock-chamber, but principally from the name of its former possessor, Baba, the tomb must have been erected in the times immediately before the Eighteenth Dynasty. Although no royal cartouches ornament the walls of the tomb, to give us information about the exact time of the construction, yet the following considerations are calculated to instruct us on this point, and to fill up the gap satisfactorily. Among the members of the great family of the Thirteenth Dynasty, and the greater number of whose tombs are situated in the rocky necropolis near El-Kab, Baba appears to be the third generation as the successor of a certain Sebkhut the father of the queen Nubkhas. In the pedigree of the family of the captain Ashmes at El-Kab the name Baba appears again, and this time as the second appellation of our hero's father, Abana, a superintendent of the king Ra-Sekenen (Taa III.). If we are not mistaken, this is the Baba, whose tomb, situated under that of Ashmes at El-Kab promises us important disclosures.

For the whole posterity of Ashmes, children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, repose in their progenitor's tomb, and in the pits in the rock, which Pahir, the ancient governor of Eileithyia prepared for himself and them. We should, however, look in vain for the sepulchral chamber of their ancestor, Baba, unless it be that rock-tomb of a Baba in the neighborhood of that of Ashmes. The inscription, which is found in the sacrificial hall of this tomb on the back wall opposite the entrance door, contains the following description, in a style of child-like simplicity, of his existence on earth, blessed by his great wealth in children.

"The chief at the table of the sovereign, Baba, the risen again, speaks thus: I loved my father; I honored my mother; my brothers and my sisters loved me. I went out of the door of my house with a benevolent heart; I stood there with refreshing hand; splendid were my preparations of what I collected for the festal day. Mild was (my) heart, free from violent anger. The gods bestowed upon me abundant prosperity on earth. The city wished me health and a life full of enjoyment. I punished the evil doers. The children who stood before me in the town during the days which I fulfilled were—great and small—10; just as many beds were provided for them, just as many chairs (?), just as many tables (?). They all consumed 220 ephahs of durra, the milk of three cows, 52 goats, and 9 the cares, a hin of balsam, and two jars of oil.

"My words may seem a jest to a gainsayer. But I call the God Month to witness that what I say is true. I had all this prepared in my house; in addition I put cream in the store-chamber, and beer in the cellar in a more than sufficient number of bin measures."

"I collected corn, as a friend of the harvest god. I was watchful at the time of sowing. And when a famine arose, lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of the famine."

Not the smallest doubt can be raised as to whether the last words of the inscription relate to any historical fact or not: to something definite, or to something only general. However strongly we may be inclined to recognize a general way of speaking in the narrative of Ameni where "years of famine" are spoken of just as strongly does the context of the present statement compel us to refer this record of the famine lasting many years" to an epoch historically defined. Now since famines succeeding one another on account of the deficiency of water in the overflowing of the Nile are of the very greatest rarity, and history knows and mentions only one example, namely, the seven years' famine under the Pharaoh of Joseph:—since Baba (or, if any one prefers to say, the Baba), for the most part the contemporaries of the Thirteenth and Seventeenth Dynasties lived and worked under the king Ra-Sekenen Taa III. in the ancient city of El-Kab about the same time in which Joseph exercised his office under one of the Hyksos kings;—there remains for a satisfactory conclusion but one fair inference: that the "many years of famine" in the days of Baba must exactly correspond to the seven years of famine under Joseph's Pharaoh, who was one of the Shepherd Kings. We leave it to the judgment of the reader to form his own opinion as to the probability of this most obvious agreement between two different records of the same extraordinary occurrence. At all events, in this comparison, no one will be able to accuse us of exaggeration or searching after far-fetched arguments. The simple words of the biblical account, and the inscription in the tomb of Baba, are too clear and convincing to [illegible] admit the slightest of a possible misunderstanding.—From Brugsch's Egypt under the Pharaohs.

The Burden of Paul's Teaching!

"Repentance toward God, and faith toward Jesus Christ." Repentance means a change of mind or will, in which one turneth against God and his stubborn, perverse will which refused his mercy, and [illegible] to the rule in true obedience. Thisis repentance toward God. The fool says, "No God," the repentant sinner says, "I want God, I must have God, and at any cost." Then faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" comes in as the life power. Maintaining always the true position of repentance toward God—i. e., God first in everything—faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ makes all the life of holiness to which he calls us, possible and practicable. "I will serve God," is the word of repentance; "I can serve God," is the utterance of faith. Paul's preaching was not of one kind to the Jews and another kind to the Greeks; he had the same Gospel for all. And his Gospel was not a mere logical conclusion; he testified it as being, himself a witness of it.

And having thus spoken, he broke to the Ephesian elders the fact that this was a farewell meeting. "And now, behold, I go bound in the Spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me." Should Paul draw back? Should he doubt the leading of God? Could it really be God who guided him to go forward into imprisonment, and then to be hindered from the preaching which, more than that of any other man, had been used to establish the kingdom of Christ on earth; could it be God's leading? Paul did not doubt it for a moment; God spoke to his soul, and wherever he led, there his servant was ready to follow. "But none of these things move me," he said; "neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus to testify the Gospel of the grace of God." "Joy," when only bonds and afflictions awaited him! was Paul speaking ironically? No, no; far from it. Paul's joy like our Lord's, was to do the will of God. He had had proof of the power of God in a prison from his experience at Philippi, and all the past dealings of God with him were only a strong encouragement to trust more for the future.

A LAST FAREWELL.

Paul had many sorrows, but he was always rejoicing: his joy was never suspended, because the Lord's own joy was in him (John xv. 11); and very truly the joy of the Lord was his strength. Paul never worried over plans upset, for he never made any: he had no trouble about funds for his work; the Lord was his banker, cashier, and treasurer, and it was impossible ever to have his account over-drawn. The things which vex most men could not touch Paul, because he saw God in everything, and to every step forward [illegible] persecution and prison was just "joy." "And now, behold," he says, "I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more. Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." How many of God's working children can say the same?

THE COVENANTS.—PART II.

THE GENEALOGY.

I will now make some further apparently necessary explanation as to the genealogy question, which, when understood, is in perfect accord with the foregoing.

The learned Dr. Barrett, in his very able and elaborate dissertation on this subject, from a MS. in Trinity College, Dublin; after a thorough investigation of the genealogy of Jesus, in all its features, and from every standpoint; says in reference to Salathiel, as follows: "That Salathiel in Matthew is the same with Salathiel in Chron. iii. 17, admits of no doubt: And that Salathiel in Luke is the same Salathiel as in Matthew, and consequently that Mary the mother of Jesus, descending from Salathiel, corresponds literally, from David by Solomon." He also shows clearly that in 1 Chron. iii. "A verse is transposed (shewing how and why it occurred) a thing not unfrequent in the sacred writings, and that the text therefore, of verses 19-22 inclusive, should be read in the following order: verse 18. And the sons of Salathiel, Zerubabel and Shimei; and the sons of Zerubabel Meshullam, Hananiah and Shelomith their sister," etc., including Pedaiah, sometimes called Hepheiah, which was "Hezra," and Obadiah, which was "Abhud," giving sufficient evidence as to how the changes and mistakes occurred—some Hebrew words and names being very different in the Syriac and Arabic, etc. He thus shows that instead of Zorobabel being the son of Pedaiah, he was his father, and that Zorobabel was the son of Salathiel; agreeing with Ezra iii. 2, 8, and v. 2. Neh. xii. 1. Haggai i. 1-12-14, and other Scriptures—as many as eight places. He also gives evidence sufficient for any reasonable honest mind, that Susanna was the wife of Jechonias and the mother of Salathiel: and that this was "a received opinion among the Jews," in whose writings also, "the mother of our Lord is called Mary the daughter of Eli," (Heli). But as I have before shown, it matters not whether Susanna was the name of the wife of Jechonias or not, so long as he himself was in the Solomon line and "begat Salathiel." It was evident that his wife was a daughter of Neri, and Salathiel her husband therefore son-in-law of Neri, from the fact that Matthew corroborated by 1 Chron. iii. 17, says "Jechonias begat Salathiel." This being true is proof positive that he could only have been "son (in law) of Neri," according to Luke. Neither does it matter whether Mary was the daughter of Heli, or of some one in the other line, so long as both lines as given by both Matthew and Luke come through Zorobabel, Salathiel, and Jechonias, and so long as it is a remarkable fact that only one person by the name of Salathiel—Shaltiel, and only one Zorobabel—Zerubabel, can be found in all the Scriptures; and these in the Solomon line, and through which line therefore, of necessity, come Joseph, Mary, and Jesus according to the flesh.

In the light of all this, how would it look for any person, after admitting as follows, viz: "It seems too plain to need any words to prove it, that if the Salathiel in Nathan's line (there is not a particle of evidence of a Salathiel in Nathan's line except by marriage) is the the same Salathiel that "Jechonias begat," then the two lines come together in him, and of course the blood of both Solomon and Nathan, runs in the veins of all his descendents." How would it look I say, for such person to still persist in the imaginary and erroneous conclusion—"I still believe that Salathiel was the son of Neri, in the same sense that Nathan was the son of David?"

Again, it has been said, "We know that Salathiel and Pedaiah his brother, had each a son by that name; (Zorobabel) and it was not surprising to find another in Nathan's line." It will be seen however, by the above, that it is possible to suppose and assert "we know," and yet be mistaken. To talk about Zorobabel having been "a favorite family name at one time;" and to talk about another Salathiel and another Zorobabel, and say "Oh, perhaps there were others of the same name—another Zorobabel begotten by another Salathiel at the same time in Nathan's line, as we suppose," etc., when there is no evidence or intimation of it in the Scriptures, will be fighting against God upon less grounds than Ingersoll has for all his audacity and blasphemy.

The following questions (with several others which are answered above) have been asked me by a person in Glasgow, Scotland. 1st, How does Luke give so many more generations between Jesus and David than Matt. does? 2nd, How do you account for Matthew's discrepancy, when he says [illegible] Jechonias and Jesus there were fourteen generations, yet he only mentions twelve?" I answer, that Matthew speaks of natural sons, properly such by way of natural generation. But Luke speaks of both natural and legal sons: that is, he includes those who were legally sons of one who had died and his brother had taken his widow and raised up sons to the deceased brother, and whose name they bore as his legal sons; and also sons-in-law by marriage, as in the case of Neri and Heli. Besides Matthew, for some unknown reason left out some, which fact can only be determined by close careful examination and comparison of the Scriptures in many places: one illustration being the leaving out of Joakim between Josias and Jechonias, as corrected in the margin Matt. i. 11, and 1 Chron. iii. 14-16, Joakim being the father and Josias the grandfather of Jechonias. This accounts for the above discrepancy in Matt. Joakim and Jesus being included make the fourteen generations. It will be noticed that Luke does not use the term "begat," as he included putative sons as well as natural.

No reasonable person who has faith in God and the Bible, should expect this subject to be so plainly revealed as to deprive superficial quibblers of any chance to object and refuse the truth. There is not a single Bible truth so plain that it cannot be objected to and rejected by those who are so disposed. It has been wisely permitted that the Bible as a book should contain what may be properly termed a "human element;" that is, mistakes of various kinds, as the result of the human agency employed by its Author. I have now said all I consider necessary on this subject. I think honest intelligent persons should be satisfied. I shall not therefore, be careful hereafter to respond to queries and quibblers. I have seen what has appeared in the Millennarian of late, consisting of what I think may be correctly denominated, misapprehension, misrepresentation, mistakes, erroneous deductions and conclusions, vagaries, etc., which I deem unworthy of further notice. As to the term "Josephites." I used it because it occurred to me as the shortest and plainest term of designation—much easier than saying every time "those who hold that Jesus was the natural son of Joseph," and not as a term of disrespect; for there are those whom I greatly respect and love, who, I regret to think, have, to some small extent at least, fallen into what I consider, this most terrible and fatal delusion. Dr. L. C. THOMAS.

Plymouth, Indiana, Jan. 21, 1885.

SINCE our last, extremely cold weather has prevailed in many parts of the country, extending even to the Gulf of Mexico. In some localities there have been destructive wind storms. In many places snows have obstructed railroad travel.

SOME that write to us expressing disappointment that their articles have not appeared after waiting four or five weeks, are not, perhaps, aware that we have had articles from other contributors, equally as worthy of a place, that have been on hand for as many months.

A VOICE FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

What is this we read? what is this we hear? Our Lord disparaged? Disparaged in rank, in place, in power, in the greatness of his nature, in the truly divine dignity of his origin? This is what we hear. Does this representation come from above? Of all things, I thought the sacred majesty of our Lord was to be most sedulously and jealously guarded. I did think the name of Jesus was a thing ever precious and inestimable. I did think you and I who say we love him, were bound in conscience and volition, in love and honor, and with impregnable firmness, to keep high above and before all, on earth and in heaven, under God, the true eminence of his sonship forever, unquestioned and settled. Settled without the first beginning of a doubt, the faintest suggestion of a query. Settled as the mountains are settled on their bases. Why, why should I ever be separated from my Lord by a fate so unhappy, as this, in the least secret chamber of my heart, to doubt his own word of affirmation? Do we need to be children again, to learn the alphabet? Do we need to be put in Peter's place, to have Peter's faith, and there avow our loyalty to the Lord with the same grand words—"Thou art the Son of the living God." Why;—is not this faith of Christ's greatness born in us? Are we to be re-schooled? Are we thus faint and fallen, that we have lost the birth-power of God in us, whereby we knew the [illegible] ty of Jesus? Are we ever [illegible] pitifully belittled in our Christian calling as to think Jesus only and merely a man? Is this the power and height of our attainment,—this the rank and range of our testimony? Must the apostle John rise from the dead to rebuke the babbling of the doubters? Should some John Knox burst his tomb in Scotland? Should Wickliffe's ashes hasten to make up anew the frame and form of the old preacher, or Polycarp come from Smyrna, resurgent out of the dead cinders of martyrdom, to hush that questioning of unbelief whereby our Lord's descent is brought down to the paltry level of Joseph? Jesus implied plainly, and said expressly, that God was his Father. What need of debate? Has unbelief become lunatic? Nay, let us rest in the calm of an assurance, that like Carmel, knows no jar from the petty ripples racing, or larger billows raging, on the Mediterranean beach.

This is a subject not to be lightly passed over. Do we see Mary sitting at Jesus feet? Who would be less reverent and loving and happy in the presence of the most noble and notable of all men, than Mary was? And where is in our best and first of all men, so noble and notable? Is it not that he came from God, and that with all the humility of a servant, and with all moral perfection, he is great also in his descent? I cannot consent to be my Master's robber, and deny him. What he is, and whence he came, let not my daring and presumptuous lips refuse to confess, or maintain. Whom by faith I look on his face, marvelous in the lines which tell of suffering, and yet sinless in every feature and expression, because he is sinless in character—I rejoice to know that this Savior and glorious second Adam, is born of God. God is his Father, and God only. It is painfully abasing to see or conceive in him a merely Josephic derivation, and rob him by imputation of his sonship, and would I rob the Father, also, who in articulation that had a sound which some thought thunder, affirmed—"This is my beloved Son?" Will not a man believe God?

Joseph is not in one suggestion, one dimmest, faintest tint, touch, conclusion, construction, consideration or imagination, ever hinted in Scripture as Messiah's father. How quickly he drops entirely out of view, any way! Mary re-appears repeatedly. And Mary stands—yes, she stands where woman never stood before, by the cross of the transfixed Messiah in his last great trial. Yes, there she stands. What painter ever found the shred of a warrant from Scripture, for putting at the crucifixion the man Joseph on his canvass? Nay, we see all the way that this man kept himself hid—and would he not like Cranmer, more than a thousand years latter, rather have thrust his right hand in the fire, than have by his sign manual given a false attestation of paternity, and thus affronted heaven, or misled the faith of millions yet to be born?

Our coming King is Divine. That Son of Man, who is to repair the mischief of the dust-man Adam, has his arm strong, because God made it so. Consider the august Holy Spirit breathing and inciting the new being of a greater than Adam in the one appointed for the function and of mother-hood. Who would not honor the Father of all, by most devoutly and gratefully acknowledging the mission and power of that Spirit? Is it not of God? Look at Jesus in Mary's arms. Who spoke when there came a voice, and we had it sounding down the ages,—"Out of Egypt have I called my Son." And we know what love and power guided the flight, for the Father loved the Son, and loves him always. And if least things are sometimes among the greatest, so the little "the" dignifies Jesus, for as one is "the" Father, so the other is "the" Son.

Angels of God! Received ye the mandate of worship, and as Jesus comes ascending to the Majesty's right hand, do ye hail him with acclamations? Gabriel is one of you,—Gabriel, the angel of the Annunciation. And there is that unnamed angel, that stood by the sufferer in Gethsemane. And there are all the angels that shone on the dazzled eyes of Daniel and John, and that came on errands from heaven all the way from Adam to Peter, and all the way from Eden to Olivet and Patmos. Angels will not worship a man, unless he has the likeness of God, and sits with God on his throne as Jesus does.

O, how sad is anything and everything that would or will or can make us see him less than God's only begotten Son, who is to raise us up from our place and state of humiliation. By how much that Counsellor, and Wonderful, is to raise us, by the space between he depth and the height, the space he traversed in stooping down, down,—may we weigh a little the greatness of Divine grace. May I rise high in light, and gladness. The height from which Jesus came, and to which he rose again, after daring and doing so much for Adam's race, gives me courage to hope for the grandeur of the resurrection of those Judah's Lion died for.

Of all things I must keep a sacred place for Christ. He must be ever endeared and beloved—guarded in the most faithful and loyal esteem, the most affectionately thoughtful and scrupulous memory. He is to have a place kept pure and consecrated in the mind, a place like that where the anointing oil was kept—a place of incense. Stacte and frankincense may blend their fragrance for Jesus, sandal wood and cedar. There is to be no letting down of his greatness. His groups and troops of friends cannot see him disparaged and keep silent. They will rally round his standard. They will contend for his honor. They will declare his divinity. They will see in him the likeness of God. To them, nothing will be named or known other than this: The Redeemer of men is the begotten of God.

Peter, John and Paul,—well have you said of Christ, that he is chief—chief by royal birth. This is the stronghold of loyal millions all along the ages. By it we live. It is the Gibraltar of faith. It is the truth of the church—the truth of the world, the truth of space and duration. Arks, altars, temples, pyramids proclaim it. By it and from it, a precious mystery and miracle of God, comes the myriad miracle-working of redemption, comes the resurrection of the dead, comes immortality, comes the kingdom, comes union with God, and co-working with him.

Here let the true Christendom of today immovably take her stand. And the call is to all saints, to hold this citadel to their last breath.

ETERNAL SIN AND SUFFERING.

Thompson in his Christian Theism, page 410, asks his weighty and solemn question: "Are eternal sin and suffering compatible with the infinite goodness of the Creator? or can they be assumed to be incompatible?" As a part of his direct answer to this he says: "If finite evil (sin) may exist in the creation of Infinite Power, and Goodness, we can discover no impossibility in eternal evil, nor assume that the one is more consistent with divine perfections than the other.... If evil may exist, it may continue without end." This kind of argument is not sufficient to settle his awful question, which has so troubled and perplexed the minds of many great and good men for centuries. It may be satisfactory to those holding the common view on this point.

How can temporary evil and suffering be made the premise or the ground of the conclusion for divine eternity? What are a thousand, or seven thousand years compared with infinite duration, and even countless years, or countless ages burdened with human sin and suffering? It staggers the reason of man and contradicts every principle of justice, mercy and goodness.

Look at the premise and then at the conclusion. During the six or seven thousand years of evil and consequent pain no individual life spans the whole period. In the supposed eternity of woe each life is endless. During the present each person has in a certain sense a ground of hope based upon a probationary state, and freedom of choice in the matter of destiny. In the future, the doom of each one being certainly and irrevocably fixed, hope can never come in to blunt the keen edge of eternal anguish.

In the present state there is crowded into nearly every life more happiness than pain; more moral goodness than moral evil.

In that world to which the common theory consigns the finally impenitent, sin, according to Benson and others, is continuous and persistent, and woe and anguish most exquisite and without mitigation or intermission. Language is beggared in its description.

In the present world there is never at any given point of time a half billion of sinners in open and avowed opposition to the will and government of God, and these intermingled with the good; which circumstance greatly modifies and tones down the terrible features of evil.

In that fabled world of woe will be gathered finally, the wicked of every generation from Adam down to the last sinner; numbering multiplied billions, with no admixture of good qualities in themselves and no good members, or subjects of this vast empire of Satan to hinder or modify the reign of evil. In a word it will be a tremendous aggregation of sin and sinners! And all this sin and suffering throughout vast eternity will be compatible with divine goodness(?) Why, because sin and suffering existed temporarily under the advantages on the part of man, the sinner and the sufferer, of hope, faith, a chance for moral improvement, with a preponderance of moral goodness in his favor. Because this is compatible with God's goodness, therefore eternal sin and suffering without these circumstances are compatible with his goodness. Was logic ever lamer than this? What end could such a destiny subserve in the economy of redemption?

NOT PEACE, BUT A SWORD.

Paul says, "as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men."

It is pleasant to have peace, to sail along smoothly, to have the good opinion of friends and neighbors, but is this possible with those who are with men "a peculiar people" "whose citizenship is in heaven," and "whose lives are hid with Christ in God?"

The confessing of Christ before men, in the way that God requires, necessarily separate us widely from the world.

Citizens of another country, with our wealth invested, our honors awaiting us, our homes prepared, and our real lives to be lived, when we come to that country: how can the inhabitants of "this present evil age," love and affiliate with us?

We have taken the oath of allegiance to another ruler: we are working for the cause and interests of a King, and they count us as rebels: they hate us:—They "have no king but Cesar," we look for Christ to be King over all the earth.

"Ye shall be hated of all men, for my name's sake," is as true now as when first uttered.

The persecution, the bitter names, the smiting, is part of the heritage of the follower of Christ. Yet instead of being silent hoopsas of the shame, we are to "speak in the light, and proclaim upon the housetops," what Christ spake in the ear and in darkness.

Christ came not to send peace, but a sword, not to give peace, but rather division; and this strife, this division was not only to separate us from the world, but from those of our own household. "A man's foes shall be they of his own household."

He that loveth (or preferreth) these to Christ is not worthy of Christ.—Christ will not own such an one when he comes in the glory of the Father and of the holy angels.

We must follow after Christ and not after our friends. It is a solemn matter to seek peace at the expense of Christ and his truth. The cross must be borne. Truth must be confessed, or buried. "He that endureth unto the end shall be saved."

O Father, lift our eyes above,
Till we find rest in Thy dear love;
And still that [illegible]
Which passeth [illegible]
And makes our hearts [illegible]
Half living as we are to Thy Throne.

May we our daily [illegible]

The Washington Monument.

The view from the floor, 500 feet high, is every American's share of the million dollars this monument cost. The shaft may commemorate the virtues of Washington, but it will certainly please the sight-seeing appetite of the American people. Already there are from one to two hundred visitors daily to the base of the shaft, craning their necks upward and longing to go to the top. When the elevator is placed at the service of the whole country at large it will be kept busy. As I said, the view is something to see. Arlington rises to the southwest, and to the right the flags of Fort Nigel are seen. The spires of Alexandria may be seen to the south far over the shimmering river Potomac. Right below the dredging boats engaged in filling the flats—puffing away, and running out into the river may be seen the ring dikes which have been built, and between which the boats are dumping their loads constantly. At the base of the monument stands a coach. The horses look like mice. With their feet under their bodies they seem to creep along over the ground. Men look like insects. The little village of sheds in which the stones were but looks decidedly respectable. Over to the north is the White House, and the Huge State, War and Navy Building, that looks not unlike a child's blockhouse that he builds till it just topples, but does not fall. The long front of the Treasury is pleasing, as it looms up to the right of the White House. Then begins the city. You have seen bird's-eye views of New York, London or Paris. This is the scene. We are up so high the whole city is brought into perspective and is "enamelled." Wide streets and avenues branching off to every point of the compass; business blocks of red brick plunging up skyward, the houses painted white and staring with innumerable windows, the multiform appearances of residence architecture showing up over the tree-tops, and the busy pavements, rattling with street cars and wagons, all looking like so many active bugs—it is a grand prospect. The Capitol looks small, as well as everything else. You see it looking over the Smithsonian and that excrescence of architectural idiocy, the National Museum. The Smithsonian, which was designed by the scholars of the country, and was intended to reproduce the Norman castle, with the chapel at one end and the lecture hall and the armory at the other, looks simply like an old barn with a few brownstone bandboxes and night-caps stuck on it. The Capitol's weakness is the main part first built. The whole building reveals at once its composite structure. The center is too small for the wing, and the enlargement of the center would dwarf the splendid dome. The whole thing may be seen at once from the monument, if ten thousand critics had never remarked the same thing twenty times before from the ground. Looking down the river, headland after headland sweeps into sight, and, as Colonel Casey says, "We can almost see Mount Vernon; a headland shuts it out of sight. We can see the Monat, but not the Vernon." To the north, Howard University, and farther out the Soldier's Home can be seen.

ADELINE OGDEN Co., Ill.

Dear Children:

Let me draw your tender minds to a scene of deep sorrow which occurred at the foot of Mount Olivet, almost two miles east of a place, the name of which signifies, "The village of peace" nestled beneath the Mount was a beautiful village of ample size, the meaning of its name is very suggestive considering the circumstances which happened there; it is, "The house of song or favor." Thither the steps of our blessed Lord would hasten when those he loved dwelt there. The little group consisted of two sisters, and a beloved brother. It was a delightful home, each endeavoring to serve the Lord with a pure heart fervently. At one time the sister whose name signifies, "Exalted Magnificent" devoted her precious life to the service of sin, but [illegible] the Lord she bitterly repented, and yielded willing obedience to him. As soon as he entered their peaceful home the world and its lust harkening with deep earnestness to his wonderful Words of Life. Her grateful heart overflowing with love, thought no offering too costly to lavish upon her Lord, and had forgiven all her sins. Her savings were gathered and with it she bought a box of precious sweet-smelling ointment, and when she poured it forth on his head, like life-living, glorious name its whole fragrance filled all the house. The other sister whose name signifies, "Bitter" was exceedingly kind and tender in her disposition, always desiring to minister to the wants of our Lord in getting a good meal for him, even as it is written of her, "she was careful and troubled about many things, but that good part which cometh by hearing the word of the Lord, she did not seem to grasp as fully as her sister did. On a certain day their brother whose name signifies "The help of God" fell sick, his dear sisters watched him with devout care, and perceiving there was no hope of recovery they sent a hasty message to Jesus. Saying, Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick. Knowing the warm affection Jesus had always manifested toward them, encouraged confidence that this loving plea would immediately induce him to come, instead of which he abode two days in the same place. No doubt they watched the sound of each foot-step, and strained their eager eyes looking every moment toward the road they expected he would come. The disappointment must have been intense. Perhaps as they watched their dying brother they said one to the other, why does not our Lord hurry? it is so unlike him to treat us with silence, for he loved our brother, and never did we need his tender sympathy as now, and life was ebbing fast, doubtless they whispered to the dying one. The Lord will soon be here, my brother, and you know he will come you be encouraged. He will surely come. But their hopes which they had so fondly nursed were all crushed, and in bitter despair they saw the beloved brother breathe his last. O, death was terrible, because it was blended with such utter hopelessness, had they never known the power of Jesus to heal the sick, and his ardent love for them, they could have borne the bereavement with more resignation, or if for one moment they could have imagined that the Lord had a purpose in carrying them their deep distress would have been, cancelled. Silently they laid their loved one away for examination to feed on him. Many dear friends came to comfort them, and it was told by one that Jesus was coming toward their home. Hastily the sister whose name signifies Bitter went forth to meet him, and her sad heart greeted him with those words "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died," and a bright spark of faith which the sight of Jesus kindled, still glimmered in her sorrowful mind, or she would not have given utterance to the words which follow. But I know that even now whatsoever thou wilt ask of God God will give thee. Jesus said unto her, thy brother shall rise again; she answered I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus said unto her I am the resurrection, and the life, he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this? she said, yea. Lord, I believe that art the Christ, the Son of God which should come into the world."

These precious words of life caused her to forget her grief for a moment; hurriedly she sought her sister, and silently whispered, "The Master is come and calleth for thee." She delayed not to come to him, and in her deep distress, she fell at his feet and said "Lord if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Oh, what a touching scene; every eye was moistened with tears, and when Jesus looked upon them his tender sympathy for the bereaved burst forth in a heavy groan, for his spirit was troubled. In all their affliction, He was afflicted, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He then said, "Where have ye laid him?" they answered, Lord, come and see. And as he journeyed toward the grave with the mournful little group, his pent up sorrow gave vent to bitter tears. Blessed Redeemer! mingle thy tears mingle with poor humanity. Yes, dear children "Jesus wept," precious Jesus, what a grief it was to him that has dear friends whom he loved should be crushed with the cruel death, for he knew sin was the cause. And as the little company wended their way to the grave, again they heard the voice of Jesus, and he, not loving compassion for his friend made them say, "Behold how he loved him!" and others said, could not this man have opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died." When they came to the grave about [illegible] it, and Jesus commanded it to be removed. The dear sister thought it impossible one who had been dead four days and was going to corruption could ever be brought to life. Every eye was watching with great earnestness when they saw the stone removed, for they did not realize the wonderful miracle he was about to perform. Then Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father I thank thee that thou hast heard me, and I know thou hearest me always, but because of the people that stand by, I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. And when he had this said, He cried with a loud voice "Lazarus come forth," and he that was dead came forth bound hand and foot with grave clothes, and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them loose him and let him go." Children beloved, Jesus had raised others to life, but none gone to corruption like this one. And this he did to testify to all those who hope in a resurrection to eternal life. That the gates of the grave shall not prevail against them, for he the life-giver will surely bring them forth. About nine days before the death of our dear Lord, the sisters made a supper, and Jesus with the one whom he raised from the dead, sat at the table. O how little did they contemplate such joy when they laid him in the silent grave. And all those whom Jesus will raise to life everlasting, will sit down with him at his table in his Kingdom of glory.

Your dear Teacher.

Jewish Colonization of Palestine.

Among the incidents connected with the centenary of Sir Moses Montefiore, referred to last month, was the following, which took place about a month before the actual date of the anniversary:—"A delegate from twenty-three congregations in Russia presented him with an album, containing the fervent wishes and prayers for the prolongation of his life, signed by fifteen hundred and sixty-two representatives of fifty societies bearing the name, 'The Friends of Zion,' whose object is the cultivation of land in Palestine."

Since then, we read that a Conference, composed by these same "Friends of Zion," was held at Katowitz (Upper Silesia) from Nov. 6th to 11th to consider definite means for promoting the colonization of Palestine. According to the Jewish Chronicle, it was largely attended by delegates from Austria, England, France, Germany, Holland, and Russia. The proceedings took practical shape in the foundation of an "Association for Promotion of Agriculture among the Jews, and especially for supporting the Jewish colonists in Palestine." The Union thus formed is named after the venerable Montefiore. Among the duties assigned to the provisional Committee are these:—To exert itself to secure for the Association the official recognition of the Russian Government; and, to endeavor to obtain, by means of a deputation, the sanction of the Porte for an unrestricted settlement of Jewish colonists in Palestine. Sir Moses is said to entertain sanguine hopes that the liberty craved of the Turkish government will soon be granted.

News Items.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., January 13.—Ex-Vice President Hon. Schuyler Colfax dropped dead at the Omaha depot at Mankato, Minn., at 10:30 this morning. He arrived on the Milwaukee and St. Paul Road and walked over to the main depot, took off his coat, sat down and died. In a few minutes. The direct cause of death was caused by heart disease.

The death of Schuyler Colfax leaves but two ex-Vice Presidents surviving—the venerable Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, who is in vigorous health, and Wm. A. Wheeler, who is in very poor health, wifeless and childless, lives at Malone N. Y. General Grant and Mr. Hayes are the surviving ex-Presidents, and will soon be joined by General Arthur.

FRESH SHOCKS OF EARTHQUAKE.

MADRID, January 15.—Earthquake troubles are here yesterday at Torrox, Comillas, Monturque and Algarrobo. The severest at Santiago province still continues, and the rivers are greatly swollen. The suffering of the people who have been rendered houseless by the earthquakes is intense. According to the official record, the number of persons killed by the earthquakes in Granada was 695, and the number of injured 1,430.

Terrible havoc, both to life and property, has been reported from the recent typhoon in Japan, and especially on the west coast. At a place called Kanashiki 500 houses were destroyed and 1,800 persons killed. At Tamashima the sea walls were carried away, 400 lives lost, and 430 houses blown down; while at Imabari, Matsuyama, and Iyo 151 houses were wrecked, 112 junks sunk, and 170 persons drowned.

The canal which Germany intends to construct to unite the North and Baltic Seas is to be large enough to admit of the largest war vessels passing through it. It is estimated that the work will be completed in five years.

ENGLAND, TURKEY AND EGYPT.

CONSTANTINOPLE, January 18.—The Sultan has ordered that 6,000 men be ordered to Suakim, and that the cost of the expedition be defrayed with revenues from certain Egyptian territory on the Red Sea coast.

LONDON, January 18.—There was a special meeting this afternoon of the officials of the War Office. The meeting was in session several hours. The unusual occurrence of a council at the War Office on Sunday caused every one to connect the circumstances with the startling information received today that Turkey was about to take an active part in the Egyptian war.

LONDON, January 19.—The excitement caused yesterday by the unusual occurrence of a council at the War Office on Sunday, greatly increased today by a report that the Government decided to resist any attempt on the part of Turkey to occupy any portion of Egypt or land any troops in that country. There is considerable bustle at the War Office today. Orders have been sent to Chatham, Portsmouth and Woolwich, which have caused much activity at the great naval stations. Another battalion of troops at Malta has been ordered to embark at once, on the steamship Poorah, for Alexandria. Other troops are under orders to be in readiness to move at a moment's notice. The indications all point to stirring events in Egypt. There is no doubt that the Ministry is determined not to allow Turkey to interfere in Egyptian affairs by putting an armed force in any portion of Egypt.

CAIRO, January 19.—Preparations are making to send reinforcements to Suakim. The reinforcements consist of a battalion of infantry, a squadron of hussars and two guns.

Perhaps as strange an aerial phenomenon as has ever been experienced or observed in the northwest was that in the Missouri slope Tuesday night. At about midnight the entire heavens were brilliantly illuminated with a bright, warm light. The experience of the pedestrian was similar to that of a sudden lighting of a lantern in a darkened room. It resembled one of standing beneath an electric light tower in the evening just as the lights first throw out their brilliant rays. One solitary sword-like ray reached out from Aurora's northern lighthouse, and, as if touching some magnet set firmly in the south or connecting with another electric current in the very center of the starry dome, a perfect ocean of flickering light was produced with a small circle of dazzling brilliancy in the center. The phenomenon lasted about twenty minutes, during which time newspapers could be read with perfect ease out of doors or at a window in an unlighted room.—Bismarck (Dakota) Tribune.

THE RIGHT MUST WIN.

Oh, it is hard to work for God,
To rise and take his part
Upon this battle-field of earth,
And not sometimes lose heart.

He hides Himself so wondrously,
As though there were no God;
He is least seen when all the powers
Of ill are most abroad.

Or He deserts us at the hour
The fight is all but lost;
And seems to leave us to ourselves
Just when we need him most.

Ill masters good, good seems to change
To ill, with greater cause
As, sent of all, the good with good
Is always overpowered.

Ah! God is other than we think;
His ways are far above,
Far beyond reason's blight and feeding
Only by child-like love.

Workman of God, oh! lose not heart,
But learn what God is like;
And on the darkest battle field
Thou shalt know where to strike.

Thrice blest is he to whom is given
The instinct that can tell
That God is on the field when he
Is most invisible.

Blest, too, is he who can discern
Where not right seems right,
And learn to take the side that seems
Wrong in man's short-sighted eye.

For right is right, since God is God;
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To fail would be to sin!

The Doctrines Concerning "Death and Hell," as Elementary Truths Essential to the Proper Understanding of the Scriptures.

I doubt if there are any subjects that ought to be kept before the general public more than the truths concerning death and hell. We as a people ought to bear in mind that our duty does not end in building each other up in our faith, but that it is also incumbent upon us to preach what truth we may possess to those who have not come into possession of it. Now the ignorance and superstition concerning the above subject is so gross, so palpable, so derogatory to the character of God, and so bewildering to the mind concerning his purpose in the gospel that we ought to set ourselves against it with all our power. Moreover, the truth concerning these is an entering wedge to many whereby they are made to learn greater truth, and popular theology may be said to be "weakening" on the subject. Seldom do we hear the ranting fury concerning hell that we used to in our boyhood. The preacher of today either modifies the torture of the damned down to some slight eternal inconvenience, or keeps the subject altogether out of sight. Indeed some of the passes that apparently good souls have been driven to in order to account for the strange conduct of God (as they are led to believe) in torturing his creatures to all eternity, worse than even the vilest created wretch would treat his own dog, and that too in the face of the fact that they are bound to preach of him as the most generous and kind of all beings, are quite painful to those of sympathetic minds.

Some conclude that "his ways are past finding out," and leave the matter there, which would be enormously true if the facts in the case were as they understand them, or rather we might say, as they do not understand them, for they have come to the conclusion that the subject is not understandable. But we might pause to ask, is there not just a vein of vanity right here? Do not some learned folks conclude that what they do not know concerning the matter is no use for any one else to try and find out. I suppose that it is best at all times to set our minds to believe that people are honest about these matters, but it is hard at times to keep the mind set that way. One would think that the discovery that God was indeed merciful, and that even the destruction of the wicked was for a beneficial purpose, (which every one can understand when he understands that God will destroy the wicked, and that "with an everlasting destruction," and when he moreover understands that destruction is destruction exactly as we understand it in English) I say one would think this would give joy to the hearts of those who profess to worship God in spirit and in truth; but the experience of those who advocate the grand truth of conditional immortality, goes far to contradict such an idea.

At first on its presentation to a person professing to be a Christian, it is usually accoled as entirely unworthy of his condescending consideration, and it is only by dint of continued effort, by arguments that are almost more than ocular demonstrations, by cautious play and insidious device, that you can get even good men to listen to you. Still, brethren, we need not denounce any one on that account; this has been the history of the most of us in our discovery of religious truth, it had to be pushed and thrust at us and we rejected it the same way. Therefore let us stick to it in patience and let others know these elementary and negative truths of our religion, even at the risk of being considered monotonous, in order that they may learn further.

There is no use trying to learn children to read who cannot spell, and we to the world must begin at the Bible alphabet. "God made man a living soul," "Thou shalt surely die" etc. When that is understood and that hell is the place of the dead, or more properly the state of the dead, and that Jesus as the Redeemer has been sent by a kind and merciful God to redeem us from this place or state and give us life and glory, then the mind begins to open to receive all the other co-relative truths contained in the Scriptures, which otherwise it is absolutely impossible for it to grapple with. The conditional immortality association is doing good work in England and the colonies, and we may say the continent of Europe; and here we have a country even more enlightened on a general average than any country in the world. A country not divided up in various languages or parted by sectional strife to any extent; and may we not consider this our field? I think so. Let us rally, under the standard of "Jesus and the Resurrection" and let life only through him be our watch word. Let us be united with charity to all sectarian, and non-sectarian, with a purpose in view, with God for our judge and his Son for our reward.

Another object we have in proclaiming these negative and elementary truths is for the defense of the gospel. The raving of Ingersoll and his army of blatant scoffers are exultant in the triumph of "modern thought" over the waning superstitions in connection with the doctrine of hell, and they lear and laugh at the strained efforts of the modern clergy to "pass" or gloss the matter. Hell is their particular butt; nothing delights them so excessively as to exhaust Webster's Unabridged of words to lavish in the expression of their supercilious contempt of the doctrine of "hell fire." When you impress them that they fight a man of straw so far as the Bible or Christianity is concerned, it takes their breath away and they have no power. In short the doctrine of "life in Christ" gives arms and aught to the soldier of the cross and robs the adversary of his weapons and power. Let us proclaim it individually, let us unite in proclaiming it. Let us find work in the proclamation and defense of the gospel and we will not be troubled with divisions if we have the spirit of Christian charity.

Editor Restitution:

Time, that measure by which we determine the length of our years, is onward ever in its course; and in the heyday of early life how slowly do we seem to be borne onward, to the expectant time, when we are to reach our majority! The restlessness of our nature is ever prompting us in the time of hope; and how little we reckon on the time when "The grasshopper shall be a burden," "and the lights be darkened." Yet there time come, and the hopes of early life have given place to realization, and this has proven to be less than our expectations. How many there are, who hopeful, and trustful, have only lived to see the dark shadows of adversity and sorrow, with only here and there a bright spot in their lives! How many there are too, who seemingly live in the full enjoyment of the life that now is. They have wealth and health, friends to associate with; all the luxuries money can buy: and yet, ah! and yet, there comes a time to even such, that there props and helps must fall them, "The life is more than raiment" and the body than meat." How few there are who "consider the lilies of the field;" and yet in them is a great lesson; and were it not so, the great teacher never would have used the illustration!—Consider the lilies; the sparrows; the grass that to-day is; and then look upon all the splendor of the mighty ones of earth; "Not one of them can add one cubit to their stature" neither can they make one hair black or white." —Their days are numbered, and swift as the weaver's shuttle, they wear out, or fret out their sojourn. Life, then, viewed as a thing present, has much about it alluring, tempting! I thank my God for life! I thank him doubly, as I contemplate this retrospectively: for, have I not received of the Lord good? Has not my cup overflowed in blessings? and dare I be unmindful of the source from which ten thousand blessings flow? Is it true—"In him we live, move and have our being?" Yes, and it is equally true, "He is not far from every one of us"—and while this is true in a general sense, how much truer is it, when we can fully establish the relationship of "Sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty." I am no Pessimist neither all Optimist; if one or the other, then surely more of the latter than the former. There is much, very much in life, and this our world, well calculated to make the present quite enjoyable—Some place their bliss in pleasure, some in gain. But godliness, with contentment is great gain!—Pleasures that go to make the life beautiful, are pleasures indeed!

Time—wonderful time! how sadly, and how shamefully hast thou been used; it has been given for good use, and yet how wasted! It has been given that we might serve the Creator, and yet how it has been used for the creature! It has been allotted, that in the review of the three score and ten, we should see its brevity, and work while the day lasted. What, said the apostle James, is your life? and methinks had he lived in these days of frivolity, drunkenness, and dissipation of endless variety, he could have added tremendous emphasis to the inquiry! History repeats itself; and whether in one form or another, it is substantially the same in effect. Then, the forms of enticement were one—Now, they are many, and as they multiply, greater is the necessity for a watchful spirit, that the snare, and the trap which so cunningly is spread, or set, may not catch us unawares. None of us who have lived beyond fifty years, can fail to perceive, how with the increase of facilities for good, the ratio has been kept well ahead for evil. I am surprised sometimes, yea often, when trying to wedge in a golden grain of truth, to find such perfect indifference to this, and such great readiness to follow in the wake of Dame Fashion not only in the matter of "What shall I wear?" but what is the popular view concerning that which passes for truth. And is the state of the public mind and morals? The present seems the only thing worth caring for; "The hope set before us in the gospel," is called a minor matter, salvation through Christ the only thing! I have no direct issue with any on this, other than to ask, is not the hope of the Bible that which contains this truth, and if so is not the container greater than the contained?

Now in this I have no desire to in anywise lessen the work or office of Jesus; but candidly, firmly, and forever to rest in this—That Jesus the Christ, so far as he could, finished the work his Father gave him to do! and now having made peace through the cross, we have peace and joy in believing;—Believing what? Ah! here comes the question—"That your sins are forgiven for his names sake"—Yes.—Is that all? No: "This is the promise which he hath promised, eternal life; and this life is in his Son," "He that hath the Son hath the life!" and the promise of glory is—"I will raise him up at the last day." Herein comes the hope. Not a thing of "minor" value, but major in all its proportions. If the hope of going to heaven at death, in disembodied form, is the hope of the Bible, then Christ has brought to light nothing, absolutely nothing!—If the forgiveness of sin is all there is to be preached or written about, then is there no more thought or truth evolved! For, forgiveness was well placed before the Israelite in all his law and commandments. If, I repeat it, "Going to heaven at death" and "forgiveness of sins" is all we have before us, then is ruled out the great work of Jesus Christ—Son of David—Son of God—when he comes in his own glory, the glory of God, and that of the holy angels! For, he must sit upon the throne of his glory, and this glory, will consist in his having right and title thereto, with power granted of his Father to fulfill the promise made to Abraham, "In thee and in thy seed (Christ) shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Take this element of gospel truth out, and virtually it is taken out by the teachings which are "popular," and I fail to see any thing wrought by the coming of Jesus of Nazareth. The hope which maketh and which will not make ashamed, takes hold of realities! God is true; Christ is true; and to deny their words is making them liars, and for one I shudder at the thought of doing this; and therefore, having "a good hope through grace." I repeat, "I doubly thank God" for the life that now is, because with an exalted hope, I can, I do look forward to a time when the darkness, the doubt, the superstition of the present, shall give place to light, to assurance, and clear vision; when the glory of the Lord will show itself in wisdom, righteousness and truth, covering the earth! Time is! the moments well employ! Show out of a well ordered life and conversation, that truth! God's unadulterated word, is that which shall more you to act well your part, the merit is not in fine spun theories, but in the rugged, solid, and firmly established word of God which liveth and abideth forever. As one, who does not live wholly in the past, I feel a growing confidence in the promises of God and of Christ; and knowing, can it be called presumption to say "knowing" whom I have believed, to also say he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day? No! a thousand times! for if the hopes set before us in the Scriptures are true, they are true indeed.

And now my dear brother, I should fail of my intention when I sat down to write you, were I to close without saying how greatly I have prized THE RESTITUTION, this year past, you have fully justified in my humble judgment, the trust confided in you as Editor. The articles selected have been excellent, and many a good thought has been presented to its readers.

I must speak praisingly of the articles by Ed. White of England, they showed much depth of thought of thought and excellent reasonings, and if nothing else had appeared, I should have been well pleased, but many able contributions have appeared and I am glad the paper has trumpeted no uncertain sound concerning our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. I believe in God, the Father, Almighty, and in this Son Jesus Christ our Lord, who has been declared this only begotten and well beloved, in the highest and holiest sense. To him I now bow the knee, and yet hope to do so when with him in his Kingdom, I shall acknowledge him Lord of all.

"ABSENT FROM THE BODY, PRESENT WITH THE LORD."

The teaching of the Apostle Paul in 2 Cor. v. has been grossly perverted; and the Apostle is often made to bolster up a theory which he never entertained. All are no doubt familiar with the very common expression forming the above title; and that it is confidently assumed to be a passage of Holy Writ. We often meet with persons who manifest the greatest astonishment when we tell them those words—as they quote them—are not to be found in the Scriptures! The common belief is, that when this mortal body dies, the person (assumed to be the soul) at once is taken to "mansions in the skies," to be where God dwells. Hence the common phrase, "sudden death: sudden glory." But if Paul had said—"We are confident that when we shall be absent from the body, we shall at once, or the very next moment, be present with the Lord;" it would have been out of harmony with his teaching elsewhere; except in the case of those who live on till the Lord actually comes again. But Paul has not made any such declaration. Good Dr. Watts sing—

"Absent from flesh! then flies my soul,
Where feets of wings could ne'er climb,
Beyond the bounds where planets roll,
Surpassing the years and joys of time."

I don't know where the Doctor got this idea, but I find nothing like it in the Scriptures of truth; on the contrary, I find Job (xix. 26) expected in his flesh (immortal flesh and spirit—not blood) to see his Redeemer standing in the latter day upon the earth. Such, and not heaven, was Job's hope, and likewise that of the early Christians.

Now, the above words with others—and not as commonly quoted—are found in 2 Cor. v. 8. They read as follows:—"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord." We shall do well to see what has led up to this statement on the part of the Apostle. He, a little while before, was addressing the Corinthian Christians respecting his ministerial calling, and states in the first verse of the previous chapter, that, "Therefore," (showing a connection with the previous part of the Epistle) "seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not." The Apostle intimates that he had been giving out what he had received from God; and that God was using the weakest instruments for the fulfilment of his purposes of mercy; that the excellency of the power might be of God and not of man. So the Apostle compares himself and fellow-laborers to "earthen vessels." Now, an earthen vessel is weak, frail, and brittle, and it may suddenly collapse from a blow of some kind at any time directed against it; and so is mortal man who has the treasure of the glorious gospel. He is not only subject to disease, pain, and death; he is also liable to accidents of various kinds by which he may be suddenly disabled or even fatally injured.

Besides all this, the early preachers had to endure much cruel persecution, which caused them great weakness and prostration at times, and apart from the sustaining grace of God, their very lives were burdensome in the extreme. Nevertheless, God worked much by the means of these weak instruments, and if one of them failed he could raise up another, and so the excellency of the power is of God and not of man. When our Lord died upon the cross, scars and wounds upon his body bore witness to the cruelty to which he had been subjected; and so great was the persecution Paul had to endure as a bearer of glad tidings and minister of the Lord, he was seldom free, if ever, from the marks of of cruelty inflicted upon him in various ways by his enemies. He says, "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed: we are perplexed, but not in despair: persecuted, but not forsaken: cast down, but not destroyed. Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body." The apostle was willing to die for Christ, if need be, though he did not unnecessarily provoke opposition and persecution for the sake, or with a view of being called, a martyr, for he had hope of a glorious resurrection from among the dead. In chapter iv. 14, he says:—"Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you." And therefore, in the midst of his afflictions he looked not at the things which are seen, or are temporary; but at the things which are not seen—that is not seen at present (except to the eye of faith), but will be at, and beyond, the resurrection.

Paul, having asserted his confidence in the resurrection, proceeds to speak further upon the change to be undergone in that resurrection, and this he does largely in what is obviously figuratively language. The present state of existence is represented by "our earthly house of this tabernacle" which may be dissolved; but the resurrection state is represented by the "building of God" which can never be dissolved or destroyed. It is of an "eternal" character. In this mortal state, subject as we are to infirmities and afflictions, we do groan—earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house (or immortality) which is from heaven. But the Apostle certainly did not look upon death as a friend, as some profess to do; for he says, "not for that we would be unclothed (or die), but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life," or immortality. If the Lord had returned in Paul's day, then he would not have died; but would have undergone a sudden change, by which he would have got rid of mortality and come into the full possession of immortality.

Paul's treasure was in heaven, his heart was also there; he knew as long as he remained in this mortal state, he would be "absent from the Lord." And so, in this eighth verse, he says:—"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord;" and yet he was submissive to the Lord's will in respect to this matter. Further, having assurance with regard to his acceptance with God and ultimate salvation, he therefore labored, "that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him"—In respect to his service as a minister or servant of God. I think the Apostle simply meant by the word "present"—being alive in this mortal body and state and by "absent"—death, or being "unclothed" or in unconscious sleep.

Paul, having stated that he labored and for what he labored, goes on to say—"For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ: that every one may receive things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad (compare with 1 Cor. iii. 4-16). I understand from this verse, that every servant of God will have to be judged by Christ respecting his work or service, and receive in his own proper person or body—not disembodied soul or spirit—according to that he hath done here (while professing to be one of Christ's disciples), whether it be good or bad. If the Apostle, previous to the resurrection, sleeps in the grave thousands of years, he will know nothing of the time intervening between his being "unclothed" (or his death), and his putting on immortality or the "house which is from heaven!" for, "the dead know not anything." Eccles. ix. 5.

Paul did not wish to die, nor does he ever refer to an intermediate state (unless death be that); but he preferred being made immortal and being present with the Lord, to remaining in this mortal body. In Phil. i. 23, he says—"For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ: which is far better." Yes, the hope of Paul was—being with the Lord. It was by this hope—"the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him"—that he beseeched the brethren. In the midst of his own trials and afflictions he consoled himself by thoughts of a resurrection, and the coming of Christ in power and glory; and when administering comfort and consolation to his suffering and distressed brethren, he spoke to them of the resurrection from among the dead, the changing (or clothing upon) of the living, and their all being caught up "together"—not one at a time!—to meet the Lord in the air, and then ever being with the Lord (1 Thess. iv. 15-18.) Moreover, when the Apostle had finished his course here, and the time of his departure was come, or when upon his death-bed, his dying testimony was an expression of confidence uttered in those beautiful and triumphant words to be found in 2 Tim. iv. 8.—"Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing"—his glorious advent.

"He tells the hope—that Christ the Lord will come,
In all the glory of His Royal right,
Redeemer and avenger, taking home
His saints, and crowning the conquest might!
This is the hope."—Dr. Lord

THE MILLENNIAL AGE.

The millennium is not a symbolical state. How can men say so with the open Bible before them? "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." These words describe a fact, not a symbol. Then it is not a symbolical reign of Christ, it is a personal reign of Christ over this earth, the scene of his rejection and suffering and death.

Again, it is a distinct dispensation, different from all that have gone before. We are now under the dispensation of the Spirit. But though it is a distinct dispensation it will in some respects be like this, for the gospel will be preached and the Holy Spirit will carry on his work more widely than ever before.

Another thought is that during the millennium there will be communion interchanged between heaven and earth, such as cannot be enjoyed now. There will be some such blessed fellowship between the heavenly and earthly Jerusalem as obtained in Eden before man's fall. Then the glorified people of God, the Bride, the Lamb's wife, shall reign with him over the earth; "they live and reign with him a thousand years." Then it will be the final dispensation. God has manifested himself in divers ways, but in this last dispensation God's covenant with his people will be carried out

IN ALL ITS LITERAL FULNESS.

Now it is blessed to think that upon Christ shall be manifested and this millennial day shall dawn. How it rejoices our hearts, cast down by the rising tide of infidelity and lawlessness, discouraged by the slow progress the gospel is making. In view of all this we remember that Jesus shall yet be worshiped and exalted, and his name held in reverence forever. Read Isa. lx. and Ps. xlv. and see the glowing description given of that kingdom where the King shall reign in righteousness.

That age will be ushered in by the first resurrection and a widespread judgment on Christendom and Israel. The time of the tribulation is coming rapidly on us, the time when God's people will be driven together, if they will not draw together. These events will be accompanied by a multitude of conversions, the Spirit of God sending out his servants with marvellous power. I believe Jerusalem, not London, will then be the headquarters of the great missionary societies. Then love as well as power shall be manifested. Victor Hugo, the great Frenchman, said, at the time of the French collapse, after the German war, "The need of the day is a man of marvellous genius, able to take the reins of this world, and rightly lead and govern." These words are true; they shall be fulfilled in a sense we never thought of. Then Satan shall be bound, evil checked, and we shall see the development, during the thousand years, of everything that is good. No wonder, in view of these things, the Old Testament is full of glowing descriptions of the joy, peace, comfort, prosperity, and contentment of that blessed time, when creation itself shall share in the glorious liberty of the sons of God.—*C. I have taken THE RESTITUTION, for the last eleven years. Its weekly visits are very welcome to me, isolated as I am from any of like faith. I always look with interest at the "Letter Drawer," the names of many correspondents have become quite familiar to me, and seems to me if I get into the kingdom I shall greet many whom I have never seen in the flesh as dear familiar friends. There are some old correspondents to the paper whose names I have not seen for a long time. Give them an invitation brother Chaplin, to let us see their names now and again. Particularly do I think just now of H. V. Reed, J. F. Wilcox, Thos. Churchill, (the latter baptized me). With well wishes and prayers for our Father's blessing on you. I remain dear Bro. Yours truly

Enclosed is pay for another six months for our beloved paper, THE RESTITUTION. I have had a severe time with inflamation in my eyes, but now they are better, and I can see to read its pages once more. All praise to God for his loving kindness to unworthy me.

O, it is sweet to trust in his loving promises, and, while I journey on through this life of affliction and trial I have One to cheer and light my path to the end. God has spared my life to see another year, and I now consecrate it anew to Jesus, and may my love to him be increased till I see his smiling face in our Eden Home. God bless you in your labors. I wish you a Happy New Year.

I am now in the Real Estate business here and may possibly be of service to any of the brethren who may think of coming to California. I am arranging to lecture on Bible themes in this section, and am resolved by the grace of God, to devote more time and attention to this matter than I have done for some years. Would to God I had the means to devote all my time and energy to this work. It seems like a shame to all this lovely valley of Santa Clara, than which the sun shines on none more fair, I say it seems like a shame that there is not one man to my knowledge preaching the gospel of the kingdom as the apostles preached it eighteen hundred years ago. There are many churches, so called, and much professed Christianity, but steal the word of the kingdom is so corrupted, that Paul, if he could rise from the dead and visit us, I think would pronounce it "another gospel," and yet "not another," because it is not the gospel at all. In worldly goods I am very poor, and have a wife and four children to support, but I am resolved to do all I can to clear myself from the blood of these my neighbors, who are evidently walking in darkness, and missing the glorious "high calling" in Christ Jesus. If any one of God's children who read this could and would join me in this work and lend a helping hand, my heart would rejoice. Your Bro. in Christ.

MODERN CHRISTENDOM.

The great mistake of modern christendom, by which the power of the gospel promises are nearly broken, and the Bible motive for repentance and holy living rendered useless. The mistake consists in changing the promises of future reward so as to have them fulfilled in this life, or at death, in some figurative sense. 1st. The second coming of Christ, is used more frequently than any other motive, in the teachings of Christ and the apostles, to convert sinners and lead Christians to prepare themselves for the final judgment. In Matthew xxiv. he declares his coming will be as it was in the days of Noah, when they "knew not until the flood came and took them all away." Then, of two in the field and two at the mill, "one shall be taked and the other left." "Watch, therefore for ye know not what hour your Lord shall come." "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." Again, "What I say unto all watch." In Luke xxi. after speaking of the signs that would show his coming in a cloud with power and great glory," "was nigh even at the doors," and their redemption and His "kingdom nigh at hand." He says, "and take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares"—that it will come upon the world as a snare. "Watch ye therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." Thus by many illustrations, he has taught us the supreme importance of being ready for his coming,—to hear then the plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter into the joy of thy lord."—"Come ye blessed, inherit the kingdom."

In all that Jesus has said about his future coming, there is a mighty motive, both of promise and warning to vigilant and sincere, that will move to repentance and a life of well-doing all who believe his words. Did the apostles use this motive frequently with their brethren and others? Felix trembled when Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come. "He will judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." The same apostle wrote to the Thessalonian Church, that they had turned to God with a strong purpose to wait for His Son from heaven as the purpose to serve God. Paul wrote to Titus, that the grace of God that brought salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ." He writes to the Hebrews, "Unto them that look for him, he will appear the second time unto salvation."

Here, "The blessed hope of Christ's glorious appearing is the motive for denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and for living soberly and righteously in this present world, and looking for him; that he may appear unto us without sin unto salvation, John says, "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is, and every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." This is not a carnal, but a spiritual hope. Paul presents to us the hope of salvation at the second appearing, and John shows us what the salvation means, "We shall be like him and see him as he is"—that is "fashioned like unto his glorious body."

All who desire with all the heart and believe that they, if faithful, shall, by resurrection or change become immortal, spiritual and celestial bodies, like the glorious body of our Savior, and be the King in his heavenly realm for ever with him, they [illegible] purify [illegible] pure, [illegible] then the life [illegible] "looking for that blessed hope"

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JANUARY 28, 1885. NO. 4.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months for the same rate.
Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations, the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

A FEW MORE MESSIANIC PASSAGES THAT HAVE BEEN TAMPERED WITH IN TIMES PAST. READ AND COMPARE.

ISAIAH (ESAIAS) XXXII.

1. Behold, a just king will rule as king, and princes will rule as princes, in the midst of a judicial sway. (Interpretation, Christ now the Royal Priesthood in the Millennial Rule.

2. And there will be the man (Christ) who hideth his words (in parable language) and he will hide himself from a raging water-flood of impiety prophesied by Daniel. (Interpretation, Christ's first coming and ministry, the period here referred to) And he will appear in Zion (second appearing here) like a rushing, glorious river in a thirsty land.

3. And never again will they trust in men, but they will give their ears to hear.

4. And the heart of the weak will attend to hear, and the tongues that stammer will quickly learn to speak peace.

17. And the works of righteousness will be peace, and righteousness will obtain rest (interval rest) and those who trust during that age, (will obtain rest understood.)

CHAPTER XXXIII.

14. Transgressors in Zion have transgressed (time, the rejection and crucifixion of Christ), trembling will lay hold of the irreverent (time, ever since, cumulative unto the day of judgment) who will tell you that fire burneth? Who will tell you of the eternal place?

[illegible] One who goeth his way in right- [illegible] who walketh familiarly [illegible] who hateth [illegible] and who [illegible] from bribes, [illegible] ours heavy that [illegible] may not hear a judgment of blood, one who shutteth his eyes that he may not see iniquity; (mercy here depicted).

16. This one will dwell on high in a cave of a strong rock; bread will have been given unto him, and his water is sure.

17. A king in the midst of glory will ye see; your eyes will see a land afar off (the eyes of faith.)

CHAPTER XLII.

1. Jacob my servant, I will interpose for him (Jacob here one of the many appellatives of the Christ;) Israel my chosen one, my mind hath accepted him. I have given my Spirit to be upon him. He will bring out a judicial way for the nations.

2. He will not clamor nor succumb, nor will his voice have been heard without.

3. A broken reed he will not crush down, and smoking flax he will not quench; but in truth will he bring out a judicial way.

4. He will flourish and he will not have been struck dumb with terror until he shall have established judicial sway on the earth; and in his name will nations hope.

CHAPTER XLIII.

1. And now in this wise saith the Lord God who created thee, Jacob, and molded thee, Israel. Fear not, because I have redeemed thee. I have called thee by thy name, mine thou art.

2. And if thou goest through water I am with thee, and rivers will not encompass thee; and if thou goest through fire, thou shalt not be burnt, flame will not scorch thee.

3. Because I thy God am Lord, the Sanctified (Holy) One of Israel, the One who saveth thee. I gave Egypt and Ethiopia in exchange for thee, and Seba for thee,

4. Since when thou hast been held in honor in my sight; thou hast been glorified, and I have loved thee, and and I will give men for thee and rulers for thy head. (Head, the Christ).

5. Fear not, because I am with thee. From the east will I lead thy seed, and from the west will I gather thee together.

6. I will say unto the north lead, and unto the south hinder not. Lead my sons from afar and my daughters from the ends of the earth,

7. All who have been called in my name. For in my glory have I prepared him, and molded him and erected him:

8. And will lead my people have [illegible] led out, and blind eyes are there and like mine, and though they have ears they are deaf.

9. All the nations have been gathered together and rulers from among them will have been gathered together. (Notice the numerical significance of these last two verses, the 9 and 9 a consummation" and the new thought that opens up in the tenth verse following. Who will declare these things; (the gospel each of Christ's day) or who will declare unto you the things from the outset; Let them bring their witnesses and be justified, and obey and speak truthfully.

10. May ye have become my witnesses, and I will be a witness, saith the Lord God, and my servant (Christ) whom I have chosen, that ye may comprehend and believe and understand that I am. No other god hath been preferred before me, nor ever will be after me.

11. I am God (elohim) and there is no other except me that saveth. (The grammatical construction in last clause of tenth verse, the same as in John i. 15. preference not precedence meant in each passage)

CHAPTER XLIV.

21. Thus saith the Lord who redeemeth thee and who moulded thee from the womb: I am the Lord who consummateth all things; I stretched out the heavens I alone, and I expanded the earth.

25. What other will dissipate the signs of soothsaying vain-boasters, and divinations from the heart, turning back the thoughtful and putting behind them the counsel of their senseless ones:

26. And establishing the spoken (prophetic) word of his servant (Christ primarily but also any of the prophets) and proving true the counsel of his messengers (angels): who saith unto Jerusalem, thou wilt have been built, and unto the cities of Idumæa, ye will have been built up, and the waste places thereof will spring up.

27. Who saith unto the abyss, thou wilt have been laid waste, and thy rivers will I dry up. (In John's Apocalypse "and there was no more sea").

28. Who saith unto (concerning) a lord (Cyrus communally translated) think thou, and he will do all my purposes; and saith unto Jerusalem, thou wilt have been built up, and I will found my sanctified house.

CHAPTER XLV.

1. In this wise saith the Lord God unto my anointed ("christ) unto Cyrus (a lord) (some of the prophecy true of Cyrus and much more of it applicable only to the Christ) whose right hand I have made strong, that nations may be obedient before him, and the strength of kings will I rend asunder; I will open before him doors and cities will not have remained closed;

2. I will go my way before him and level mountains; brazen doors will I break in pieces, and iron bars will I crush;

3. And I will give thee treasures of darkness hidden away; unseen things will I bring out for thee, that thou mayest comprehend that I, thy God, who callest thy name, I the God of Israel, am Lord.

4. For the sake of my servant Jacob and Israel my chosen one I will call thee by thy name, and I will accept thee; but thou didst not know me.

5. Because I God am Lord, and there is no other God besides me. I have strengthened thee, and thou didst not know me,

6. That they from the rising of the sun and they from the setting thereof might comprehend that there is no God except me. I God am Lord and there is none besides;

7. I am the one who fitted up light and caused darkness, who causeth peace, and bringeth about calamities (evils). I the God who doeth all these things, am Lord.

8. May the heavens from above rain expressed joy, and the clouds rained righteousness; may the earth have sprung up and budded with mercy, and may they together have sprung up with righteousness.

12. I awakened him (the Christ man) in righteousness, a king, and all his ways are upright. This one will build my city, and return the captivity of my royal people, not with ransoms (One ransom) nor with votive gifts, hath the Lord of Sabaoth said.

14. Thus saith the Lord of Sabaoth Egypt hath grown weary, the commerce of the Ethiopians and the men of Saba uplifted (with pride) will cross over to thee, and will be thy bond servants, and they will have followed thee bound hand and foot, and they will cross over to thee and do thee homage, and offer votive prayers in thee (that is in thy name), because God (the God) is in thee and there is none except thee.

15. For thou art a God and we did not know it, (See Peters first sermon in Acts) a Savior the God of Israel.

16. All those who withstand him (Can this be Cyrus?) will have been put to shame and confounded and they will go their way in shame. Renew yourselves toward me ye isles.

17. Israel is being saved with an eternal salvation by the Lord. They never will have been put to shame nor confounded until the age and still onward.

18. Thus saith the Lord who made the heavens: He is the God who showed the earth and made it; He defined it; not in vain did he make it, but he moulded it to be inhabited. I am Lord and there is none besides.

19. Not in secret have I spoken, nor in a dark place of the earth. I did not say unto the seed of Jacob, seek ye in vain. I am, I am Lord, the one who talketh familiarly of righteousness and who declareth truth.

21. May ye have been gathered together and come; may ye have taken counsel together ye who are being saved from the nations.

22. May ye have turned unto me and ye will have been saved, ye from the God of the earth: I am God (elohim) and there is no other.

23. I swear by myself, that, unless righteousness shall depart from my mouth, (my words will not have returned back, every knee will bow to one, and every tongue will swear by God,

24. Saying "righteousness and glory will come unto him; and all who act limitations to them (those who bow the knee and swear) will have been put to shame.

25. From the Lord will they have been justified, and in God will all the seed (not seeds) of the sons of Israel have been glorified.

Editor Restitution:

I am at my comfortable home, in possession of good health, where I shall remain unless called away or invited, most of the time until spring opens.

I have lately spent thirteen days in Canada: I trust with profit to the cause of Bible truth. The first Sunday was spent with the brethren in Norwich, and its vicinity. We had a good turnout, and an excellent meeting, closed the services of the day by eating the memorial supper, and it was a blessed season to the lovers of the Bible truth. On Thursday in company with Bro. Davis, and Sister Weldon, I visited Sister Alling who is dying with a cancer, and administered the memorial supper, a solemn yet joyful season.

On the second Sunday I preached in Burgessville, in the Town Hall, which was well filled with an intelligent congregation, who gave undivided attention to my message. In this locality, if I was there to preach on every first day, and once or twice through the week much good could be done.

During this ramble, I visited eight different families, not to talk upon politics, the price of wheat and soft times, but on the plan of human redemption as unfolded to us in the Scriptures of Israel. Our duty to present it to all who have a desire to hear, and the signs of the times which bespeak in tones of thunder that the coming of the Son of man, Jesus, the Messiah, is in the near future. Also the character we must possess in order to be ready to meet him.

As to the good, or hurt I may have accomplished in this campaign, the Lord alone is to be the Judge. To the glory of the Judge, I acknowledge the brethren did their duty to me. Fraternally, H. V. LYON.

THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST UPON EARTH A HEAVENLY KINGDOM.—PART II.

That the kingdom of Christ upon earth will be a heavenly kingdom, will appear more distinctly if we consider the necessary results of this righteous administration, as—

1. There will be universal peace among the nations of the earth. Given one universal sway of righteousness, one King over all the earth, judging the people righteously, with the will and the power to enforce the performance of right, each man to his neighbor and war is an impossibility. So we find it predicted of Messiah's reign—"The work of righteousness shall be peace: and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever." Isa. xxxii. 17. "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Micah iv. 3, 4. "There shall be abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth," Psa. lxxii.

The evils of war are but faintly apprehended by us who live in a country happily free from the horrors of the battle-field; but the impression made on our minds by descriptions of that scene of blood, tumult, and death is most appalling. And that is not the sum of the evil. Think of the consequent misery to families and individuals; the destruction of property, and the produce of the field; besides the moral enormities, anger, hate, deceit, and cruelty. Then think of the enormous expense of war—sometimes called peace—establishments—involving the perversion of a vast amount of capital, talent, and natural production; and the consequent heavy burden of taxation entailed on the community. Reflect for a moment on the amount of good that could be effected, were that talent, labor, and capital employed to promote the welfare of the community!—a consummation to which, with all our boasted "progress," we are apparently no nearer than our forefathers. Under the universal and everlasting sway of "the Prince of peace," "there shall be abundance of peace;" the whole physical, intellectual, and moral resources of the world, properly applied to the end for which the Almighty Father provided them. Then shall be realized, all the world over, the transcendant blessing which formed the theme of the angelic song; that announced the Redeemer's birth:—

"Glory to God in the highest,
Peace on earth,
Good will to men."

2. Another effect of this righteous rule will be entire freedom from oppression of all kinds, throughout the world. "He shall proclaim liberty to the captives," and "break in pieces the oppressor;" "deliver the needy when he crieth, and him that hath no helper. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence, and precious shall their blood be in His sight." So it is written of him in the oracles of God.

The deliverance here predicted includes all who bear the name of the slave, but extends beyond these to every victim of oppression of all kinds, in all countries. He will "destroy those who destroy the earth." His reign of righteousness shall extend its benignant influence over the vast population of the world.

The Gospel of the kingdom of God is indeed "glad tidings of great joy" to the oppressed everywhere—the proclamation of a universal and perpetual jubilee. When Messiah sits on the throne of his glory, the mandate of liberty shall go forth with power irresistible. Every yoke shall be broken, and all who submit themselves to the perfectly righteous law of the Lord, shall have safety and peace under the protection of the Almighty.

"Blessed jubilee! let the glorious morning dawn"

3. Another necessary result of Messiah's reign upon earth will be the proper and peaceful adjustment of labor and capital. The constant conflict between employer and employed, which now works so much evil, shall no longer exist, for all arrangements between men shall be according to righteousness—a principle now openly ignored in "the labor market." The righteous Lord who loveth righteousness will take cognisance of labor and its reward. All shall be under him; His righteous administration shall extend to all the affairs of his numerous subjects. The difficulties which are now alleged to stand in the way of the governmental regulations of such matters, can have no place under his unerring and righteous rule. And the reward of labor shall be according to justice.

One great anomaly in the present state of things is, that the introduction of machinery is often injurious to the workmen immediately concerned, and he seldom, if ever, receives that sort of good from it which should reasonably follow—a reduction of his hours of toil without pecuniary loss. Under the righteous government of the kingdom of Christ, this anomaly cannot exist. There is good ground for believing that under that Divine Monarchy mechanical appliances will attain to the highest perfection. If it shall be so, that all the heavier kinds of labor shall be performed by mechanical agency, and men simply control its operations, surely all shall share the benefit. Lighter toil, and shorter hours of labor, will secure abundance of leisure for mental culture, and the study of the wondrous works of God.

We have reason to expect this, not only as the necessary result of the Divine government of the world's affairs, but from the statutes enacted for Israel, when Jehovah was their King. The proportion of time securing rest from labor, under the theocracy, is truly startling to an overworked moderns. Albert Barnes estimates that the whole amount of time secured for rest to the laborer, from one jubilee to another, would amount to about twenty-three years out of fifty. This leisure was secured even to the bondman and the stranger.

As the law was a "shadow of the good things to come" in its sacrificial and sacerdotal enactments, so we believe it is to have been in its social and political relations. Though some of its provisions, being of a temporary nature, shall be done away, yet the law of the kingdom of God over Israel in the past is an indication of what it will be in its perfected condition. All that was absolutely good in the past, shall exist in perfection in the future.

As regards "the Sabbaths," and religious festivals, their restoration is distinctly predicted. See Isa. lvi. 1-7; and lxvi. 23. In the latter passage, it is predicted that "from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, all flesh shall worship before" Jehovah. See also Zech. xiv. 16-18. There shall be a universal Sabbath law. The worship of the Lord of hosts shall be world-wide, and the consequent blessing of holiday rest secured alike for Israel and all nations. One King over all the earth; one religion for all peoples. Then shall be realized the sublime idea of the Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man! In view of such a future for the world, may we not devoutly and earnestly pray—

"THY KINGDOM COME!"

4. We might in the same way point out how another necessary result of the kingdom of Christ upon earth will be a righteous commerce, but our limits forbid. We pass on to notice—

5. That under Messiah's righteous sway there will be the effectual suppression of all vice. To state the matter is surely sufficient, when we reflect that all is to be under the control of the peerless and sinless One who, though born of a woman, and subjected to the severest temptations, remained holy and undefiled.

Reflect for a while on the amount of blessing that is involved in the expiration and absence of all vice in the world. Think of the fearful extent to which the flood of vice in its various forms has prevailed, and the terrible ravages it daily effects. even in this land where so much is done to counteract and repress it. Murders, theefts, adulteries, and such like, are events of daily occurrence. To such an extent has our criminal population increased, that our legislators are at their wit's end how to dispose of it; and, what is still more alarming in spite of all their measures it steadily maintains its ground.

Amongst the numerous vices which prevail, there is one fearfully common amongst all classes; I mean profane swearing, and irreverent use of the names and attributes of the Almighty. So far as actual law is concerned, the State takes no jurisdiction in this matter. In the kingdom of God this cannot be. The irreverent use of the Sacred Name will be treason, as well as impiety in the highest degree; and he who dares to take the name of God in vain will not be held guiltless, for "the Lord shall be King over all the earth in that day." "From the rising of the sun, even to the going down of the same, His name shall be great among the heathen, in every place incense shall be offered unto his name." The grateful utterance of every heart shall be,—"Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name."

Another debasing and fearfully prevalent vice, the suppression of which seems to be beyond the province of our national law, is that one which we instinctively feel ashamed to mention. Not being skilled in forensic lore, we are unable to understand why "the social evil," so fraught with mischief to society, should be beyond the reach of "the powers that be." One thing is certain, it has reached an alarming height; and who can calculate the amount of sin, suffering, and sorrow, that follow in its train! The hearts broken, and homes made desolate; the blasted hopes; the violent, premature, and hopeless deaths its fearful harvest yields! What heart does not bleed at the spectacle of a woman—young, tender, affectionate, and beautiful—thus debased, fallen, lost! All that is virtuous made callous as the stones she treads. Thousands of such die every year, yet their number is not diminished. "Onward, still onward sweeps the dark, miasmal river; quietly, yet effectually, sweeping all efforts made to restrain or prevent its flow. True, indeed, many kind hearts and ready hands are earnestly at work striving to reclaim these fallen sisters to the path of virtue and peace. Surely their deeds are recorded in heaven; and the eye of Him who came to call sinners to repentance looks on approvingly, and will acknowledge their unselfish efforts in his own time. Neither is their labor altogether fruitless—few and thin a few are restored, but alas! the number of the saved is so small as to be imperceptible. The aggregate remains, and is constantly sustained.

"In that blessed kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, such iniquity cannot exist. When He, who pronounced a lustful look to be adultery committed in the heart, sits on the throne of the world, and administers its laws, such enormities shall no longer be.

There is another vice, rampant in this and many other lands, which defies all attempts to remove it—Drunkenness; not only degrading in itself, but the cause of many other evils. From its spring—murder, theft, impiety, and crime in all its forms; misery, poverty, disease, and death. Like the deadly Upas tree, its fatal influence effects all around it. No rank or condition of men is proof against its insidious and blighting effects. It finds its way into the family circle, and smites down before our eyes the affectionate father and well beloved son. Through its ohilling powers a mother's heart has ceased to have pity, on her, suckling child; and the lovely maiden—emblem of truth, love, and tenderness—has succumbed to its insinuating wiles, so that her whole being becomes perverted, till finally she sinks into the abyss of misery and shame. Frequently has this vice, like a murderous fiend, entered the very Church of God, and snatched from our fellowship the brother dear to our affections.

In apostolic times, they who were "drunken, were drunken in the night," but now, at noonday, the drunkard reels in our public streets. As yet, all efforts made to uproot the evil have failed. Thousands of its victims die annually, and some are reformed, but the ranks of the drunken are continually reinforced by new victims.

But when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, the existence of a practice so deleterious will be impossible. He will "gather out of his kingdom everything that causes to stumble, and them who do iniquity."

To those who are anxiously seeking to relieve the sufferings of humanity—to save the fallen, and prevent others from falling into the snares of vice in every form, and to promote the happiness of mankind of whatever color or condition—"The Gospel of the Kingdom" should be welcomed as "good news" indeed. It tells of the sure coming time when might and right shall be united, and the teeming population of the earth shall rejoice in righteousness, piety, and peace; when, in a word, God's will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven.

To impress the picture more vividly on your minds, we have attempted to delineate it somewhat in detail. The delineation is, indeed, meagre and imperfect, dimly sketched, the half not told, and yet it is wonderfully grand. How transcendantly glorious, then, the scene, when it shall burst upon our vision! Is not the prospect Godlike—heavenly? And it is no dream of fancy, but a grand reality which the Almighty has pledged His word to accomplish.

This is what we have seen:—The kingdoms of the world become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, whom all peoples and languages shall serve and obey. The result of which is:—Universal and perpetual peace, with its attendant blessings—freedom from oppression in every land—labor and capital properly adjusted by the unerring rule of righteousness, a righteous commerce, distributing the fruits of the earth, and the products of labor and skill all over the world—vice in every form rooted out, while all people, in all lands, serve and worship Jehovah of hosts.

And earth, with its ten thousand tongues,
Shall fill its courts with sounding praise."

Such is "the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him." Not merely to live in it, as its subjects, enjoying that blessedness we have been trying to describe, but to be partakers with the Christ in its righteous administration. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I overcame, and sat down with My Father in His throne." Rev. iii. 21. "The glorious Gospel of the blessed God" not only tells of forgiveness of sins, through faith in the blood of His Son—forgiveness, full and free, to the guiltiest of the sons of men—it also tells that, whosoever will, may become children of God through faith in Christ Jesus, and because children, therefore "heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ." Though in themselves altogether unfit for such honor and power in the kingdom of God, He "makes them meet for the inheritance."

When Christ shall appear, "they shall be like Him. He will "fashion anew the body of their humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself." Phil. iii. 21.

Many are anxious to know the mode of existence of the glorified and incorruptible Rulers over the nations upon earth. For ourselves, we have found nothing revealed on that point, but we are content with the announcement of the glorious fact that they "shall reign with him," and they "shall reign on the earth." Fashioned like the Son of God mentally and bodily, they shall share with him in his benignant sway over the nations of the earth.

All this is implied in the ascription of praise by the Seer of Patmos, in which we humbly and gratefully join—"Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood; and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion, forever and ever, Amen."

It is not the flashing meteor that attracts so much attention for a moment and then goes out in darkness, but the steady shining of the fixed stars, that is reliable. So with Christians. It is not the flashing, brilliant talkers that count, but the steady people who live and shine every day.

I wish to say to the brethren that I am ready for a call to labor in the Master's vineyard anywhere, and at any time. Address me at Galesburg, Mich. L. H. CHEADMOUGH.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Jan. 28, 1885.

SOME articles that have of necessity been deferred appear this week. Some others will find a place are long.

THE Editor does not manage the financial business of THE RESTITUTION. Books are sent out by the Business Agent. He forwards also all statements regarding subscriptions. In those statements some mistakes are unavoidable; and when made will be most cheerfully corrected. Write kindly and explain to him. A bill has just reached us requesting payment for a paper for which we paid a year in advance. We like the journal, and shall explain all, as we hope, to the satisfaction of the publisher, instead of severely blaming him for a mistake.

AMONG paper lately received have been several numbers of the Agents Herald. This Journal exposes all manner of frauds "without fear, favor or affection;" and in this much needed work, we wish it the most abundant success. It is published at 706 Chestnut street Philadelphia, Pa., at $1.00 a year.

SEVERAL numbers of a sterling temperance paper entitled The Voice have also come to hand. This Journal is published by Funk and Wagnalls at 10 and 12 Dey Street New York. We also wish this paper unbounded success in the cause it so ably advocates.

The Chicago Evening Journal makes the following remarks on the late explosions in London causing such damage to Public Buildings.

"It is more than probable that the London dynamite explosions are the work of the conspiracy of Anarchists which extends all over Europe. The Nihilism of Russia is the center and impulse of the conspiracy, and nothing short of concerted and resolute international measures will repress or crush it."

Even while seemingly exonerating the Fenians in the United States, from a participation in the fiendish murders of innocent persons, of which the greater number were children, it still places them in the light of miscreants capable of similar, or worse atrocities as the following makes evident. The world just before the flood was filled with violence and our Savior has predicted that just such a state of things would obtain at the end of this age. The Journal says:—

"At the same time, there is no doubt that the "dynamite clique" in New York, have collected immense sums of money under the pretense that it was to be used in the dynamite campaign. But the money thus collected from the poor Irish enthusiasts in the United States has probably not been so used, but has been embezzled by those who have collected it." The dynamiters in the United States are mean enough, no doubt, but their guilt does not "extend to the actual use of dynamite in England." Their guilt is simply that of fraud and larceny; not of conspiracy to destroy valuable property and commit wholesale murder. That they are wicked enough to commit any crime is not doubted, but the improbabilities of the case seem to acquit them of the charge of having participated in planning or executing the recent London explosions."

MILLWOOD, Ind.

Editor Restitution:

By your permission I will present your readers with a short exegesis of the Savior's answer to the request of the thief on the cross.

Does it contain a promise in connection with the request, or a denial?

I occasionally see in THE RESTITUTION, and still more frequently, by our public speakers in oral discourse, an attempt to answer the (Orthodox?) argument in favor of the thief's getting into Paradise with the Savior on the day of crucifixion, by simply changing the punctuation, i.e., remove the comma from "thee," and place it after to-day. Thus: "I say unto thee to-day, shalt thou be with me in Paradise.

But this will never do, unless we take the grounds that instead of the Savior giving him any consolation at all, just flatly denied him his request, by asking him a question which naturally requires a negative answer. Shalt thou be with me in Paradise? The natural inference would be; no, never. For this class of questions always requires a negative answer.

For instance: Would I ever have looked for such treatment from my old avowed friend? The natural answer would be, No, never. Shall I endure all this? No, certainly, not. But, again: I refer the reader to the case of Naaman, the leper, when the king of Syria sent Naaman with a number of his servants, with great presents and rewards to the king of Israel, requesting him to heal his servant Naaman of his leprosy; the king of Israel rent his garments, in astonishment, saying: Am I a God, to kill and make alive, that this man doth send to me to recover a man from his leprosy?

By asking this question, the king most assuredly wished to deny in the most emphatic language possible, that he was God, to heal the leper of his terrible disease. 2 King. v. 7.

But there is another class of questions that requires an affirmative answer. Thus: Suppose a mother on a holiday morning says to her daughter, Jane, now be careful to-day that you don't get your new dress soiled. But on returning home, behold the astonishment of her mother when she sees Jane's dress all bespattered by having a bottle of ink spilt over it. And she says to her: "Did I not strictly charge you this morning not to get your dress soiled to-day?"

Any person of good common sense will readily perceive that this question requires an affirmative answer.

Again: Suppose a farmer sends his boy to town with the team with a load of produce. So when the boy is ready to start his father cautions him to be sure and not leave the team stand alone without tying the horses. The boy drives to town, and in front of a customer's door he is stopped by the man just coming out with a two handed basket, the boy measures the fruit into the basket, receives his pay, and is about to drive on, when the man asked him to help him carry the basket inside the door. The boy being of an accommodating turn, takes hold of one handle, and just as they reach the door-steps the horses are scared at something, and before he can get hold of the reins, got started and ran away, doing considerable of damage. Now when the boy returned, he was met by his father; saying, "Did I not tell you to not leave the team without tying those horses?" The boy at once understanding the force of this strong language tremblingly answers in the affirmative, as the question requires.

But one more; 1 Cor. ix. 1. Paul says: "Am I not an apostle?" "Am I not free?" "Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" "Are not ye my work in the Lord?"

Now it is evident that Paul, in each of these questions, intended an affirmative declaration of the most emphatic, and strongest language possible.

Hence, it is seen at a glance that whenever a question of this class has the little negative "not" in it, it requires an affirmative answer. And to the contrary, when this negative is absent, a negative answer is required.

Therefore I would caution my brethren who undertake to write or speak on the subject involving a reference to the original text, of which they have no knowledge, lest they give their opponents a club to beat them over the head with.

But, says one, "It is claimed by our best scholars that the punctuation in the Savior's answer to the thief is wrong." Admitted. But there is something else wrong, in the King's Translators, which must first be corrected, before attempting a change of the punctuation.

Let us look at the original text, as given by B. Wilson in Diaglott.

"Amen lego soi semeron meta emou esee en to Paradeiso."

Indeed I say to thee to-day with me thou shalt be in Paradise.

You see I have omitted the comma here, but will insert it in the following to show how the meaning of the sentence changes with the changing of the comma.

First, then, as to the Common Version. "Verily I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

This would give to the thief the promise that he should be in Paradise that very day, with the Savior.

Now let us change the punctuation in the Common Version. "Verily I say unto thee to-day, shalt thou be with me in Paradise?"

This makes it a question which requires a negative answer, equivalent to saying; "Thou shalt not be with me in Paradise."

Thus it is evident that the King's Translators, being believers in the natural immortality of man, in order to favor that notion, purposely so arranged the wording of the text that the punctuation cannot be changed without destroying the entire sense.

Let us now take a glance at the original text.

"Indeed I say to thee to-day with me thou shalt be in Paradise."

Now let this be punctuated as in the Common Version, with the comma after "thee," and it unquestionably conveys the idea that the thief should be with the Savior in Paradise that very day.

But now the question may be raised; "Does this idea correspond with the context? It is worthy of note that the thief requested of the Savior to be remembered at a certain point of time.

Query. What point of time is referred to in this request?

Answer. "Remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom."

This then designates the time, when. And must surely the answer must agree with the request in point of time.

Thus placing the comma after to-day, in the Savior's answer to the thief, we have the following reading.

"Indeed I say to thee to-day, with me thou shalt be in Paradise." When? Answer. When he comes in his kingdom. Compare Luke xix. 12 to 27. with Acts iii. 20 to 23, and you will see that that time is yet in the future.

Therefore neither the thief or the Savior got into Paradise that day.

As a further proof that the Savior did not promise the thief that he should be with him in Paradise that day, I would suggest the following few brief thoughts:

First. Was Jesus in Paradise between his death and resurrection? If so, where was Paradise? And in what did it consist? Did it consist in a state of unconsciousness? Not a very curious condition, truly! for David says; "In death, a man's thoughts perish." Ps. cxlvi. 4. Query. If a man's thoughts are perished, how much, or what does he know? Answer. Solomon says: "The dead know not anything." Eccl. ix. 4-6, 10.

Query. Could the thief be with Jesus in Paradise that day when Jesus was dead, while the thief was still alive?

Did the thief die that day? Is there any evidence that such was the fact?

Did Jesus go to Paradise that day, either before, or after his death?

What constituted the personality of Jesus, and that of the thief? Are the names of the persons and their corresponding pronouns ever in the Scriptures applied to anything but the bodily organism? If so, point out an instance of the kind.

Again. Is Paradise in the presence of God in heaven? If so, Jesus had not gone there when he appeared to Mary, after his resurrection, for he positively told her that he had not yet ascended to his Father. John xx. 17.

So turn any way you will, and you will find that the Common Version in this instance contradicts the facts in the case; while the rendering I have here given is strictly in accordance with the original text, and corresponds with all the facts in the case. Here I leave the subject for the present. Hoping and praying that both the writer and reader may be prepared to enter into that glorious kingdom when the Nobleman returns from that far-away country; having received Kingly authority. And to this end I would yet cite that note-worthy admonition of the apostle Peter, found in his second epistle, chapter i. 5-11.

"Use all diligence to add to your faith fortitude, knowledge, temperance, or self-control, patience, piety, or Godliness, brotherly kindness and love. For if these abound in you, you will not be fruitless or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; but he that lacketh these things is blind, having closed his eyes, and forgotten that he was purified from his old sins. Therefore, brethren, endeavor the more earnestly, to make your calling and election sure; for in doing so, you will never fall. For thus you will be furnished with an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

O may God grant that this may be the happy lot of both writer and readers.

JOSEPH MEARSMORE.

THE TRUTH AND ITS RESPONSIBILITIES.

If the light of the glorious gospel of Christ hath shined in our hearts, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, then their is a responsibility resting upon each one of us which we must avoid with any degree of safety. Let us notice some of them, and first, their is our paper, THE RESTITUTION. The Editor and officers of the Board of Directors have taken upon them the responsibility of publishing and sending out over the world the good news of the coming kingdom and eternal life only through Jesus the Christ, the only begotten Son of God. Now how much their burden would be lightened if each believer would share the responsibility with them, by doing what they can to circulate the paper. Then there is the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, a responsibility taken upon themselves by a number of brethren in the Kirk, and they ask each lover of the truth to share the responsibility with them; by becoming a member of the Association and paying the sum of one dollar a year or twenty-five cents a quarter or more, and who can tell the good that would result if every one that can (and there is but few that cannot) would give such a small sum to such a noble cause. Then there are others who take the responsibility of sustaining meetings and opening missions where the gospel can be proclaimed to the world, and we should see much better results from such efforts if each believer would share the responsibilities of such efforts, by at least attending themselves when the opportunity is given. Now, Brethren and Sisters, God has invited us to be heirs with him and joint heirs with Christ, but he first invites us to be co-workers with him now, and we must share with him and his Son, our Lord and Master, the responsibilities of his truth. Our Lord has promised to make some one rulers over many things, but it is only to those that have been faithful over the few things that he will say, Well done good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of your Lord. Now as we have entered upon the New Year let us say, "This year for Jesus, and his truth," shall be our watchword, and so shall his grace mercy and peace be with us all. Yours in hope of eternal life through Jesus the Christ, the only begotten Son of God.

Look For Joy.

Trip lightly over trouble,
Trip lightly over woes;
Weakly make grief double
By dwelling on it long.
Why wrap your hearts so tightly?
Why sigh over blossoms dead?
Why cling to forms unsightly?
Why not seek joy instead?

Trip lightly over sorrow;
Though all the day be dark,
The sun may shine to-morrow,
And gayly sing the lark;
Pale hopes have not departed,
Though roses may have fled:
Then never be down-hearted,
But look for joy instead.

Trip lightly over sadness,
Stand not to rail at doom:
We're yeasts to string of gladness,
On this side of the tomb;
While stars are nightly shining
And heavenly overhead,
Encourage not repining,
But look for joy instead.

Reading The Bible Well.

A little boy came home one day from church services, from which his parents had been detained, and asked his father if he had ever read the twenty-first chapter of Revelations?

"O yes, often," said the father.

"But did you ever read it aloud to us here at home?"

"I think so."

"Well, father, I don't think I ever heard it. The minister read it to-day, and it was just as if he had taken a pencil and paper and pictured it right out before us.

So much is there in good reading, I have often wondered how Jesus read the old prophets the day he went into the meeting, and took up the Scriptures, and read them before the congregation. The eyes of every one were "fastened upon him," and all "wonder at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth." If we could read the Bible as he did, what a power it would be in our houses! It is worth a mother's while to study elocution, to some extent, as well as to study deeply into the spirit of the word, if she would make her bible reading effective on the hearts of her children. A monotonous way of reading takes much of the life out of the sweetest portions of it.

A conversational tone and manner is much more instructive than the "Bible twang" which the old Scotch grandmother held so sacred that she sharply reproved her laddie for using it when reading the newspaper.

ADELINE, COLE CO., Ill., Jan. 7, 1885.

Dear Children.

I wonder if a little boy or girl can be found who does not love to hear the sweet word mother. As soon as they enter home if her face is not seen to greet them, they anxiously ask, where is mother? and now truly desolate a home seems without her, for none can fill her place in yielding solace to her dear ones, unwearied steps of love now or seems to tire, and her busy hands seek no rest until slumber gently folds them. This is why I have chosen a beautiful story about a widowed mother who had two sons, who was extremely poor, and in debt, and her creditors caused her much grief, having no way of paying her indebtedness, they declared they would take her precious boys, and make slaves of them. I think these cruel men were Gentiles. God having commanded the children of Israel thus, "If thy brother that dwelleth with thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee, thou shalt not compel him to serve thee as a slave, but as a hired servant, and a sojourner. Their mother was a daughter of Abraham, and one who had been the wife of a God fearing man. In her deep distress she went to a prophet whose name signifies, "My God saveth," to him she told her sorrow; the tender hearted prophet was moved with compassion, and said to her, "what shall I do for thee? Tell me what hast thou in the house?" She said, thine handmaid hath nothing in the house, save a pot of oil. Dear children, have you known greater poverty than this? no furniture to make her house comfortable, probably not even a bed to rest her care worn body on; all was sacrificed, perhaps to sustain herself and dear boys, and as she gazed on the little pot of oil, no doubt she said to herself I must have light, this is all I have left, it will not pay my indebtedness, or bring freedom to my dear sons. The Prophet of the Lord did not reprove her because she was so helpless, but told her to go abroad and borrow of her neighbors empty vessels, not to scant in the number but borrow many. When she returned home she told her dear boys what the prophet had commanded her to do. Quickly their eager steps entered many a house in search of empty vessels, and doubtless they said one to another, I wonder if mother thinks she is going to get our freedom with these empty cans, if they were full of something then we may hope, and perhaps said to her: mother, you cannot surely pay your debts in this way. But her strong faith in the word of the prophet of the Lord led her in the path of obedience. He also told her to put the vessels in a room, and take with her, her two sons, and the pot of oil, and close the door, for her work was to be done in secret, only her own household was to see it. O, how strange that out of her scanty supply she was to fill to the brim her neighbors empty vessels. It did not increase until she poured it forth, and then how it flowed! When the dear boys saw one large vessel after another filled they must have been struck with amazement, and I can imagine I hear them say, mother I thought you had only a little in the pot, tell us, where did it come from? This is truly wonderful, mother, who has given the increase. Their mother could answer them, "To him that hath it shall be given, and he shall have more abundance." The oil flowed until every vessel was filled. She wondered what she was to do with such a rich supply, and again went to the prophet for instruction, he said sell it, and pay your debts, and yourself, and dear sons live on the rest. Now dear children, if our blessed Lord had not given us many precious lessons on what oil represents we should not understand this—He speaks of five wise virgins who had oil in their lamps, and five foolish who had no oil, so that oil represents light, or heavenly wisdom, this dear widowed mother, was a figure of many a dear toiling mother who will yield up every thing for the glorious light of life, as this pot of oil brought freedom, and sustained them, so will the light of the glorious gospel if we make a sacrifice of all but the pot of oil, it cancels debt, brings liberty to the slave, and being the embodiment of light, it sustains life. What peculiar care God manifested in ward this dear trusting widow, and her fatherless sons.

Your affectionate Teacher.

LONDON, January 24—2 p. m.—An alarming explosion has just occurred in the Houses of Parliament.

GUY FAWKES COME AGAIN.

LONDON, January 24—5 p. m.—The glass roof of the House of Commons was completely shattered. The clock in the house stopped at precisely 2:18, this afternoon. A heavy beam, which formed one of the supports to the gallery, was projected into the speaker's chair, seriously injuring it. Mr. Gladstone's seat was torn to pieces.

It has been ascertained that a large quantity of explosive matter was placed inside of the great ornamental gates leading to the crypt under Westminster Hall. These gates were blown clean off their hinges and thrown to the ground. All the windows on the north and south sides of the building were blown to atoms. The concussion shook down from the grand oak roof the accumulated soot of "centuries." This, in its downward movement, made a dense cloud.

The statues of King William IV. and King George IV. in Westminster Hall were overturned.

The fact that an unusual number of ladies visited the Parliament building to-day, has given rise to suspicion that the miscreants who perpetrated the outrages were either women or men in women's disguise. It is now remembered by the attendant about the building that parcels were carried by many women, and they seemed to be now unusual care in guarding them.

LONDON, January 24—4:30 p. m.—Another account of the explosion at the Tower gives the following details: The scenes in around the Tower are indescribable. Several children are among the injured. Their pale faces, bloody heads and broken limbs roused the great crowd congregated in the vicinity to frenzy. Yells are heard on every side to "Lynch the villians!" "Roast the fiends!" All the visitors are still detained in the Tower, and will be kept there until their antecedents are inquired into.

Hundreds of rifles were damaged in the Tower, which was ignited, and the fire suppressed with great difficulty. Much ancient armor was destroyed.

6 p. m.—The explosion occurred on the second floor of the White Tower. All the authorities agree that dynamite was used. Three hours are thoroughly wrecked and the explosion damaged many hundred stands of arms. The explosion took place exactly at 2 o'clock.

Lord Cholmsford and General Milton are now engaged in the work of inspecting the attacked structure.

LONDON, January 24—5 p. m.—The city is in a frenzied state of excitement. The whole police force is on duty and the troops in and around the city are under arms. Police patrols are stationed everywhere in close proximity to each other and a cordon of Police has been drawn around every public building. Chief Superintendent Williamson, of Scotland Yard, has personally inspected the scenes of the explosions, as have also Inspectors Livingstone and Kelly. One of the wounded policemen is dying. Several men have been arrested, but are believed to be innocent of any connection with the horrible outrages.

Three distinct explosions, supposed to be of dynamite, occurred in the city of London this afternoon. The first was in the crypt of Westminster Hall; the second was in the Strangers' Gallery in the House of Commons, and the third was in the Tower of London. The three events were nearly simultaneous, or occurred in rapid succession, and produced an indescribable degree of excitement and alarm. That portion of the tower known as the "White Tower" was the scene of the explosion in that building, and there was the usual throng of visitors when it occurred. Fourteen persons are reported as having been injured. Both Houses of Parliament are in Westminster Hall, and the tower is about two miles distant. The two buildings are of historical interest, and are situated on the left bank of the river Thames. Parliament is not in session at present, and no person is reported to have been injured by the explosion in Westminster Hall. Some of the costly windows were wrecked and other damage was done, including the complete demolition of the lobby of the House of Commons.

The dynamiters, dynamatours or dynamiterds (by other name they are equally execrable) have extended their operations to South America, and the President of Chili has shared the fortune of many other prominent men in receiving an infernal machine with the usual arrangement of powder and match heads. Luckily, suspicion was aroused by the appearance of the package and the intended result of the plot was averted.

It is reported from Rochethat an alliance has been formed between England and Italy, and the Italian troops are en route for Egypt to co-operate with those of England in the Soudan.

The city of London, while intensely excited over Saturday's dynamite explosion, is also troubled by serious fears for General Stewart's little army in Egypt, being at last accounts confronted by the Mahdi's forces.

Turkey has notified Italy that she will oppose with 30,000 troops an Italian occupation of Tripoli.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 26.—There was a sharp earthquake at thirty-five minutes past 1 o'clock this morning. No damage is reported.

Advices by mail from Spain describe the terror and suffering among the people of the provinces recently convulsed by earthquakes as pitiful in the extreme. Entire villages and hamlets are in ruins, some of the people perishing, and the inhabitants of the entire country are in a fearful state of trepidation, not knowing at what instant their homes may tumble down over their heads. There is great suffering among rich and poor alike from hunger and a lack of the ordinary comforts of life, many being either homeless or afraid to take shelter in their homes. Earthquake shocks are of almost daily occurrence.

PASSING EVENTS.

Turkish atrocities upon the Bulgarians in Macedonia continue to be committed. It is said that in some places the Bulgarians are afraid to go out of their houses because murder or kidnapping are so much on the increase. Five, nine, four, and fourteen persons were lately carried off from the villages of Golesnik, Goree, Broko, and Sviata respectively, while Ipriskey, Prapodish, and Parvitzee have been burned to the ground by incendiaries, and twelve of their inhabitants have been murdered. It is computed that more than 200 Christians have been assassinated in Macedonia within the last few weeks.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM.

An American paper the Freeman, Iowa, U. S., says:—"The Star of Bethlehem can now be seen at a little past midnight. Nineteen hundred years have nearly elapsed since the first appearance of this wonderful star is recorded. The appearance of this remarkable heavenly body gives rise to grave conjectures by scientists and theologians. Some see in the appearance of a great change of some kind. The blood red sunsets, earthquakes, rumors of wars, signs in the heavens, and great social upheavals, are precursors of a grand event of some kind close by. Fingal, a writer of ancient history, is of this opinion, as we notice in a recent communication of his to the papers."

A rising of Anarchists apprehended in Paris. The radical and socialist circles are largely arrested, and seditious pamphlets and posters are being actively distributed. The Republican leaders are denounced with a vigor and hatred never before shown to public men, even under Napoleon III. The French correspondent of the New York Times cables to his journal that in Paris the sentiment against the wasteful and foolish Chinese war is fierce among the working men, the cry against the tax on bread comes at the moment when the public mind only needs such a cry to carry it away into violence.

Editor Restitution:

I will be at Antioch the first Sunday in February, 1885; to hold a series of lectures, at least over the first Sunday, and longer if the brethren think best. All are invited. Come, and let us have a good time once more.

REMEMBER

That this is the last issue of the present subscription to THE RESTITUTION for the present with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but act right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER

When sending your remittance that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty-five to forty cents to collect each one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

"I WILL BE TO YOU A GOD."

Reading one morning, at worship
In earnest, questioning mood,
The story of Moses in Egypt,
And deahage of Israel's God;

It flashed on me all at like a vision
As bright as there
How God's loving mercy and mission
Reflect here in the things He has done.

Oh, the depths of love there was in it,
When He said, "For the dear fathers' sake,
Hear forth to me for a people,
Yourselves to myself will I take."

"Ye shall" were the God will I be"
The creator, and
The Creator, eternal, eternal,
Ever with deliverance.

And I felt as the words of the Went not from my
The great
To people
And
Would it
My

Ye
Want
And
The

And Ye
May

How That Where
What hear, and delight in the sound?

Then the Lord who makes a bold oath
Was pleased to
In
He Not
He

He shall be the God of the Promise,
He knows, He hears, and can see,
He
He
He is ready to deliver for those!

EGYPT AND THE COMING CRISIS IN THE EAST.

An influential London commercial weekly journal called Money, writes thus, in two deeply interesting articles:—

"With the rest of the public, we have had enough of Egypt, and would like to see the problem laid at rest. We are compelled to admit, however, that there is a strong divergence between our hopes and our expectations. .....To the public at large there is but one solution to that question—annexation, and we imagine that those ... are the most disposed to charge ... ly pessimist belong ... holding this ... cannot be many ... who believe that ... will early evacuate Egypt. But the simplicity of the plan of solving the question by annexing the country out and out, renders it abhorrent to a Ministry which has never yet looked at plain facts plainly, or from the moment it entered office issued from the mire of crass purposes. Telegraphing from Alexandria a few days ago, the Times correspondent said: 'A letter received from an eminent Liberal politician says that England will never bear of annexation. My only reply is that England is annexing all Egypt's responsibilities without bearing of it, and is thereby reaping all the disadvantages without the advantages. We are using the Egyptian army supplying her railways with material, conducting her finances in defiance of international arrangement, ordering her to name new judges, directing her police system and maintaining the Government with our arms. What more could we do if we annexed the country? Nothing, except secure benefits for the people by restoring confidence.' All this is true enough; we have said the same thing over and over again, but, however such views may be shared by certain members of the Cabinet, it is tolerably well known that they are not held by all. The assertion of the eminent Liberal politician, 'that England will never hear of annexation,' is nonsense. Anybody who mixes with the world, who studies the temper of the public objectively, and does not in his political fervor pass off his own views as those of the people at large, must be aware that England is quite ready to annex Egypt. We venture to affirm that if such a measure, called as a protector or not, were announced to-morrow, it would provoke more general approval and enthusiasm than the passing of half-a-dozen Franchise Bills.

"We have already expressed the opinion that our present system of mismanaging Egypt has done no more than the most astute policy could have done to root our influence in the country, and we will therefore not take to task too severely those who have been instrumental in bringing it about and supporting it. Looking back four years, to the period when this country had no desire and no intention of establishing an empire in Egypt, we imagine that any statesman asked then what was needed to give us control of the Nile, would have considered the inquirer crushed by the reply—Three things: To overcome the opposition of the Khedive and people of Egypt, to overcome the opposition of England, and to overcome the opposition of Europe.' In less than three years the first two obstacles have been swept away, and the last is rapidly disappearing. Considering, from the point of view of Continental statesmen, what a magnificent prize Egypt is, such a revolution is marvellous. However slow the progress of events may have seemed in the past in their sluggish course from crisis to crisis, when we cast a comprehensive glance over the entire period, we can not but be amazed and elated at the constant rapid converging of events in our favor. Not a shot would be fired in Egypt if we formally annexed the country to-morrow. That of itself is a remarkable change from the time when Egypt seemed to possess all the elements of powerful armed opposition to any step inspired with schemes of conquest..... We are persuaded that Egypt will pull through eventually, and settle down as a protected State of a peculiar nature, although, for the reasons we have used, that must be a continuance of the period of indistinct suzerainty.

"Not until early next year, when the Soudan campaign comes to a close, can there be any attempt made by the Government to formulate a final policy for Egypt. When that takes place, symptoms are already indicating that there will be a great crisis in the East. That crisis will affect not only Egypt, but Turkey and India also. It is not improbable that the resources of England will be tested by the greatest strain that has ever come upon them in the course of her history. We have already (see Money, Sept. 24 and Oct. 8) demonstrated that we cannot evacuate Egypt; that annexation in some form or other will be thrust upon us by the sheer force of events; and that against the original desire of the country England will become mistress of a magnificent province which any of the Powers of Europe would give all their recent annexations to acquire on similar easy terms. So splendid is this acquisition that there is not a State in Europe that does not envy or hate us for securing it. France, we all know, is seeking a territorial counterpoise in half-a-dozen different parts of the world. Germany is taking up a position in South Africa, so as to reap the results of any embarrassments that may come upon us in the course of the next few years, and is further playing the part of a dangerous rival on the Congo. Both these powers are thus preparing for the future, and to check us in proportion to their efforts are secretly giving their support to a third, whose aims are of a malevolent description. The ... empire would suffer little material damage by the loss, ten years or otherwise, of the Cape dominion. It would survive a French annexation of Siam or Burmah. But there is one possession, the exclusion from which would throw all our commerce out of gear, and deprive our province in Egypt, the Cape, and a dozen other places of all relative value. That possession is India.

"On the subject of the Russian advance upon India a deal has been written. Our moneyed interests in India are so enormous that the public in general, and the financial world in particular, have a right to demand that they shall be thoroughly safeguarded. Respecting the real character of the Russian menace, there is no longer any essential difference of opinion. It is no longer a matter of contention that Russia occupied Merv in order to be able to coerce us if we refused her any compensation for allowing us to permanently control Egypt. In discussing foreign politics Englishmen too often assume that foreigners look upon the actions of their Government from the same point of view as themselves. It is only by placing oneself in the position of Russian statesmen that one can obtain a clear appreciation of the progress of affairs in the East. For thirty years Russia has always intended to buy off England from opposing her designs on Turkey by giving her, or helping her to take Egypt. We have occupied Egypt without anybody's aid, and Russia, chagrined at having lost the power of tempting us, is now seeking the means to coerce our statesmen into an acquiescence with her designs. This will explain the sudden annexation of Merv, for which creek—it has just come to light in Russia—she began to prepare directly we appeared likely to remain in Egypt, and struck a blow when our conflict in the East Soudan rendered it difficult on our part to retort on the spot. She is now gradually massing troops in the oasis, the Trans-Caspian Railway is being extended 185 miles to Askabad, and in various ways she is acquiring the power of entering Herat whenever she likes, and pushing on thence to India. Of course she has no designs upon India, and Earl Dufferin went out of the way last week at Belfast to assure the world what a foe to annexation and war Russia possesses in State Secretary Giers; but, none the less, experience has shown that what Russia is never going to do is precisely that which she always does do, while the new Viceroy is too consummate a diplomat to embarrass his future policy by exciting Russia in advance against him. In diplomacy, as in business, there is no simpler way of getting the better of an adversary and foiling his designs than by keeping on smiling terms with him. In solving the Eastern Question to our advantage time is everything to England. Our trade suffers nothing from the crisis, we are able to consolidate our position in Egypt and India, and our colonies grow more powerful to help us in case of need. In regard to Russia, the continuance of the crisis, as we have demonstrated times out of number in these columns, exercises a most crushing effect on her development. While it ... her credit lies ... at the lowest level, trade has suffered enormously, and the material progress of the country has been checked to a degree which few Englishmen are aware of. No one knows better than the Emperor that the rapid solution of the Eastern Question is the only cure sovereign can resort to in order to put an end to this condition of things, and this will explain the immense sums that are now being lavished on the army and navy, and in the restoration of Sebastopol and the Black Sea Fleet.

Bearing in mind that Russia's chief opponent, if not indeed her only real opponent, to her designs on Asia Minor and Constantinople, is England, and that the only way she can coerce England is to strike at her in India, it is impossible not to regard the deepening of the Eastern crisis with considerable misgivings."

THE BODY OF THE PHARAOH WHO REIGNED WHEN MOSES WAS BORN.

Brother Hawkins, of Grantham, forwards the subjoined extract from "Egypt after the War" (by Villiers Stuart), describing the recovered body of "the Great Sesostris, father to Pharaoh's daughter." He remarks "It appears to me to be one more link in the chain of evidence, and not the weakest one of the direct and indirect evidences that recovered Egypt presents of the exact and literal truthfulness of the Mosaic record. It is singular but providential that such discoveries keep pace with modern lapse of faith, if we may call that lapse of faith which never knew. consequently never rejected, the gospel of the kingdom of the ever blessed God." The extract is as follows: "I viewed the mummy, the mortal remains of the illustrious Pharaoh, Rameses the Great. The mummy does not appear to have been rifled by the Arabs, the bandages are all undisturbed, and the breast rises so high as to give the idea of something bulky being stowed beneath the linen envelopes. There it lies, the body of the mighty Sesostris, who had left such deep traces of his long reign in history as a conqueror, and in architecture as a builder; even in Scripture, as the Pharaoh who made the captive Israelites build him the treasure cities of Pithom and Rameses, and whose daughter brought up Moses. An interesting bit of evidence has lately come to light identifying him with the treasure city that bears his name. Naville has translated the great historical slate at Aboo Simbel. It is in the form of an address from the God Pthah to the divinely favored monarch, and in line sixteen he says: 'Thou hast constructed a magnificent city to fortify the frontiers of the land, even the city of Rameses; it is solid upon the earth like to the four pillars of the firmament.' This conclusively sets at rest any doubt that may have existed as to the identity of this Pharaoh with that taskmaster under whom Moses slew the Egyptian, and fled to escape the consequences. The coffin is not the original one, but of latter date, substituted, as the inscription on it declares, owing to the damaged condition of the first. The text traced in black upon its surface, runs as follows: 'The 10th year, the 4th month of the season of Pirt, the seventh day, the of date withdrawal of King Ouser ma Ra Setep en Ra—the great God—from the tomb of the Lady Ap... of the great palace, by the priest of Amen, king of the Gods (even by (Aoh en Amen, son of Bolia, and by the holy father prophet of Amen Ra, king of the Gods, minister of the temple of Rameses II., in the temple of Amen en sip ka shon ta, son of Back en Khonsou after that their mother, who is over the hall of mourning, had declared before the king what was the condition of the mummy, and that they had suffered no damage in their removal from the tomb where they had been, and that they had been transported to the grave of the lady An... of the grand abode, where rests in peace the king, Amen-hotep." It appears from the above there had been more than one removal of the royal remains, owing to what cause is not explained, but may be gathered from the evidence of some sacrilegious rascals, who were, no doubt, examined under the bastinado, or whatever ancestor of that development under natural selection may then have been in favor, apropos of a robbery of a royal mummy. The investigation produced the confession as follows:—"We found the coffins of the king and his wife, Noubkha, as also the funeral coffins in which they were; we found the sacred mummy of the king, and beside it was his sword, as well as a considerable number of amulets and ornaments of gold on his neck; his head was covered with gold and silver within and without, and decorated with every kind of precious stones. We took the gold that was upon the mummy, as also the amulets, and the ornaments on his neck, and the gold plates we found on the coffins. We took also everything that we found on his royal mummy; then we burned their coffins, and we took away their furniture, which consisted of vessels of gold, of silver, and of bronze, and we divided the spoil into eight parts." Rameses must have been a tall man, the mummy is still five feet ten and a quarter inches long, and when shrinkage is allowed for, he cannot have been less in life than six feet two inches. I consulted a surgeon as to the allowance that must be made for the shrinking of the cartilages between all the joints of the neck, the vertebræ, and the limbs, and he said that it could not be put at less than four or five inches. The mummy was enveloped in pink linen, and appeared in a perfect state of preservation.—The Christadelphian.

THE RESURRECTION.

"If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands." Job xiv. 14, 15.

The question asked by the patriarch Job, is second in interest to no question ever asked. The word if, is only used to make sense; man does die. We are in a dying world, have been so for 6,000 years. Facts are stubborn things; these facts are demonstrated daily and hourly until they become as familiar as an enemy can become. To write upon the resurrection of the dead, or the re-living again of God's dead men, or dead ones, requires faith, yea, unflinching integrity in the Scriptures of truth as the pure words of God, without which he should be like a ship upon the ocean without a compass or a helm.

We propose in discussing the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, or the answering of Job's question, If a man die shall he live again? to place on the stand five of the best and most reliable witnesses that have ever testified in any case since the fall of man. Much depends on a man's character as to the truth or validity of his testimony. We begin with the author of our text. What God says of him is above and beyond what is said of any other man named in the Bible, save the Lord Jesus the Christ, the Son of God. Listen to what God says of his servant Job. He commences by stating a fact. There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job, and that man was perfect and upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil. Perfect and upright, one that feareth God and eschoweth evil. No higher traits of character could be given to any of Adam's race, unredeemed by the precious blood of the Son of God. This language is repeated in the eighth verse, also Chapter ii. 3, the same language is used: a perfect and an upright man. God makes Job about as good as he can be; yes, and Job does corroborate what God says of him; he endures the trial to the bitter end manfully and most nobly. His enemies are men of ability, men of standing, well educated, and are well prepared for the discussion they had undertaken. But God sees not as man sees. He saw the unflinching integrity of his servant Job, and rendered a verdict accordingly, as the sequel shows. The two first chapters of the book of Job are full of deep and profound interest, and would pay us well to commit them to memory. Job's true character is set forth, by his Maker, in the highest and purest manner and form that language can employ. It also sets forth the character of the Devil. He is denounced in the Bible as a liar and the father of lies, yet he can speak the truth whenever it will answer his purpose better than a lie. Skin for skin, all that a man hath will he give for his life; here Satan spoke the truth. What will we not give for our life? But in the next breath he lies just like Satan—"But put forth thine hand and touch his bone and his flesh and he will curse thee to thy face." Job did not do anything of the kind. All that he hath is in thine hands but save his life. So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord and smote Job with sore boils, from the sole of his foot to his crown. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes. So burning and irritating were these boils, the only relief he could get was to scrape with the rough edge of a piece of broken earthen ware. For a moment consider or contrast Job's condition—the greatest of all the men of the East, a perfect and upright man—tortured in our dread hour from his exalted position down among the ashes. From God's wife unto him. Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God and die. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women. What, shall we receive good at the hand of God and not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips. We forbear any comment only to say that Job gives the fullest proof of a genuine man of God: he fully maintains the noble character that God gave him at the beginning: so through the long heated controversy with his three friends Job comes off victorious, and receives twice as much as he had lost. Truly this shows, in a wonderful manner, God's goodness, love and mercy to the children of men. It also shows conclusively that what God says of his servant Job is strictly true, "A perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and eschoweth evil."

He has most fully established a character for truth and veracity, that entitles him to the highest credit. We will let him answer his own question—if a man die shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come. Thou shalt call and I will answer thee. Thou wilt have a desire to the works of thy hands. "Thou shalt call and I will answer thee." Where from? Modern theology and nine-tenths of the Christian world will say, From heaven, but Job does not say so, but says "If I wait (for the resurrection) the grave is my house; I have made my bed in the darkness, where it is as dark as darkness itself."

Job a learner, he pursues his investigation till he gets the truth, as we read it in Ch. xix. 23, to the end. "Oh that my words were now written! oh, that they were printed in a book! that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever." Here Job refers to a custom in use in many parts of the world, especially in the East, when they wished to preserve the memory of the great, they would chisel out the name or hieroglyph in the marble and pour in melted lead, which does not deteriorate or decay. The tooth of time will wear away the marble while the lead remains intact. In the use of this figure, or ancient custom, Job gives full expression to his strong faith and sure knowledge that the dead would live again. We give his own words. "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."

This completes Job's testimony so far as we need go this time. It is full and complete and forever settles the question of the re-living again of God's dead ones. The question has, from the beginning, and still is being pressed upon our minds, Who is Job? We answer unhesitatingly neither more or less than the Melchisedec, Heb. vii. The thought is not original with us; yet we most fully endorse the view. The marginal reading in Heb. vii. 6, is the correct reading "without a pedigree!"

We have said but a tithe of what might be said in truth respecting so eminent, so holy, and so good a man of God as the patriarch Job. He has testified most positively to the truth of the question he asked at the outset. Our faith is strong and sure, we shall see him among the pure and the holy at the coming of Christ, in the morning of the resurrection of the just. Amen.

Our next witness is the patriarch David, the sweet singer of Israel, the man after God's own heart: in Ps. xvi. he speaks not of himself, but of his greater Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. Nevertheless they are the utterance of the Holy Spirit, they were uttered as a prophecy, but have been literally and exactly fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ. Ps. xvi. 8. I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved: therefore my heart is glad and my glory rejoiceth. My flesh shall also rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave me in the grave, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy One to see corruption. Thou wilt show me the path of life. In thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore.

David was a prophet. He wrote and spoke under the influence of the Spirit of Inspiration. So far as the death, burial and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ are concerned, they are accomplished facts.

It must not be expected of us that we give in detail all the traits of character, good and bad, of each witness. David had his faults, but they were of the hand and not of the heart, yet he possessed the noble, magnificent spirit of a man of God. His writings are worthy of our most careful study, and of our most deep and profound consideration. He not only bears positive testimony to the affirmative of Job's question; but to the grand and sublime scheme of redemption, and restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began.

We must leave David and the plain, clear and positive testimony he gives, and call our third witness, the prophet Isaiah. There is nothing charged against him in the record. He speaks out plain, positive and clear; no guessing or supposing, but with a positive assurance of certainty he exclaims, Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out her dead. Come, my people, enter thou into thy chamber, and shut thy door about thee; hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain. Nothing we could say would add anything to the words of the prophet: words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

Our next one to testify is the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. John xi. 23. Jesus saith unto her, thy brother shall rise again. Martha saith unto him, I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. Jesus saith unto her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this? She saith unto him, yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ the Son of God, that should come into the world.

In the beauty of Christ's teaching above all others he demonstrated what he taught as in the case before us. Where have ye laid him. Jesus groaning in himself cometh to the grave. It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. Jesus saith, take away the stone. Martha the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord by this time he stinketh, for he has been dead four days. Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldst believe thou shouldest see the glory of God? They take away the stone. He utters a prayer of thanksgiving to God, his Heavenly Father; and when he had spoken he said with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth bound hand and foot with grave clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him and let him go. This demonstration of the power of God invested in the Son who was one with the Father, was fully maintained in God's raising up from the dead his dear Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, after he had laid in the grave three days and three nights. We would like to comment upon the glory and power of God in raising up dead men who had fallen under the power and dominion of the last enemy death. But we must forbear, and hasten to give the testimony of the apostle Paul.

There is no room for skepticism or doubt as to anything Paul may testify to. He has given the most positive proof that what he has written is the naked truth. We therefore quote his words as the utterances of the Spirit of God. 1 Cor. xv. 12 reads, Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you there is no resurrection of the dead? And if there be no resurrection from the dead, then is Christ not risen, then is our preaching vain, your faith is also vain, and ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept. We would like to quote Paul to the end of his argument. It is clear and conclusive and is a full endorsement of what the prophets and Christ has said. It is the only door of hope to an endless life. We may contrast the fabled doctrines of Rome and the Protestant world with the teaching of God's word, but how soon do they dwindle into insignificance. There is but little said in the Bible about the resurrection of the wicked dead, their punishment will be dreadful in the extreme, especially our intelligent men and women who have had the light of Divine Revelation. To be blotted out of existence, to be as though they had not been, just think of the dreadfulness. My pen is inadequate to the task. Flee, oh flee, while you have the offer of eternal life though Jesus Christ, and a resurrection out from among the dead ones.

A few reflections. There is not the least ground for hope or belief of eternal life for any of Adam's race only through Christ and a resurrection from the dead. The qualifications for such a blessed hope are, first, a firm belief in the things concerning the Kingdom of God and name of Jesus the Christ. To make such a belief valid, we must be baptized in water in the name of the Holy Ones for the remission of our sins, from which we are to arise to walk in newness of life.

How crooked, how zigzag and wayward is the walk of many who have been immersed into the dear Savior. By their fruits shall ye know them.

NEWELL BOND.

The Spirit of Man (Prov. xx. 27) is the Candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts."

"His candle shined upon my head" Job xxix. 3; Psa. xviii. 28. "The light of the righteous rejoiceth; but the lamp (candle) of the wicked shall be put out." Job, xxii. 9.

"Whoso curseth his father or mother; his lamp shall be put out in obscure (utter) darkness" Prov. xx. 20; Jude 13.

"Fret not, because of evil men; for there shall be no reward to the evil man; the candle of the wicked shall be put out." Prov. xxvi. 19-20; Psa. xi. 6.

"This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." The believer "saved," the light hater "condemned." John iii. 16-21.

"The Lord knoweth how to deliver the Godly, and to reserve the unjust to the day of judgment to be punished." 2 Pet. ii. 9.

Thus "the wheat" is wanted, and garnered for its worth; but "the tares shall be burned." Matt. xiii. 30-40.

"Then ye shall discern between the righteous and the wicked." Mal. iii. 18.

Is there intelligence or reverence for truth, in denying such marked distinctions?

MILLERTON, KAN.

Editor Restitution:

We the undersigned met at the home of H. W. Barnhill in Millerton, on Sunday Jan. 18, 1886, for the purpose of organizing a body of believers according to the Scriptures. After appointing Brother Isaac Miller as chairman, and Hugh W. Barnhill secretary, and hearing from all present, we find all to be in favor of organizing without a creed, simply under the name of "Church of God at Millerton." We elected Brother Isaac Miller as Elder, by full consent, also H. W. Barnhill as Deacon. We arranged to meet every first day at the schoolhouse, known as the Sunny Slope house, one-half mile south of Millerton. We also arranged to have Bro. W. B. Fisk come one a month to preach the word. Moved, the minutes of this meeting be sent to THE RESTITUTION for publication. Minutes approved. Isaac Miller, Joseph Oglesby, Benj. Anderson, Rebecca Anderson, Hugh W. Barnhill, Rebecca A. Barnhill, Jacob Reed, Harriet Reed.

The weather being extremely cold, the brethren and sisters were not near all out, but we hope to have a goodly number on our list serving God to the best of their ability, believing as we do that the time is short for us to work.

Now brethren we extend an invitation to all of the like precious faith to call and worship with us, especially those that can preach the word. We ask the prayers of all God's people that we may continue faithful to the end and gain eternal life.

H. W. BARNHILL, Sec.

NOTICE.—Chicago, Ill.—The Blessed Hope Mission, cor. of Bishop Court and Madison Street entrance to Bishop Court. Services every Sunday forenoon (D. V.) at the usual hour, and the auspices of the Restitutionists. All invited.

A WIFE'S ADIEU.

[To H. M. Hoyt, late Principal of Davis School, Westfield, Mass.]

Another look at my beloved dead,
The marble face, and grandly moulded head.

Oh, whom here forbid my eyes to rest
On three dear acts, and on that breathless breast?

Tell me no nay, for I must look again;
Here let me ponder, sleep, the best of men.

I must imprint a fond and farewell kiss,
On such a pure and manly brow as this.

How can I turn my doting eyes away
From this Divinely chiseled face of clay!

What mould the fateful hand, O death, to close
These truthful eyes in such a dread repose!

Alas, that he with joy I called my own
Should lie so motionless, cold, so alone.

Yet in that look so wondrous sweet and calm,
My anguished spirit finds and feels a balm

Those hands that mine so oft have pressed before,
Oh, shall I feel your gentle touch no more?

There lips in mould of perfect beauty cast,
Tell me, dear heaven, oh! are they closed at last?

I kiss them, but I feel no grain response,
Here what thy hand hath done, ruthless death!

How like a king, in simple vestment dressed,
My dear and dead beloved takes his rest.

My fondest kiss, he heeds not in his sleep,
I wonder at repose so strange and deep.

Cease! thy death-veiled eyes, my love perceive
Thy boy so cherished, take thy tender leave:

And at thy sister's gentle request, then,
Cease thy heart responsive beat again!

In vain, alas, the fondest blood would feel
In thy dear breast, some slightly answering thrill.

Ye flowers, enshrine my darling's noble head,
And with your rich perfume embalm the dead.

Come, children, as in quiet sleeping teacher's side,
And by the dead, in soft procession glide.

On that dear face, you drop the falling tear,
For, oh, you know a nobleman lies here.

Love, grief or care, he never heeds at all,
On his calm brow the casket lid must fall.

Earth, yield a chamber in thy faithful breast,
Where our beloved may take his dreamless rest,

Till Christ, the mighty Lord of earth and men,
Command to life his loyal dead again.

THE LIGHT SUPPRESSED.

Will you please give a place to the enclosed which was refused by the Christian at Work. Its insertion may serve to show and ultimately to verify the lesson taught by the "Great Teacher sent from God," viz: that "a house divided against itself must fall." The Orthodox clericals of the Episcopal order at Chicago, demand more light on the subject of human destiny, and appoint one of their number to obtain and afford it, and rejoice in what they get, while the equally Orthodox Christian at Work in New York, though having eyes sees not, and does not wish for any more light; though boasting of the same "Spirit of liberty which was the keynote of apostolic preaching," and that he is "unfettered by denominational bands." What an illustration of the difference between preaching and practice! Verily the truth is very unwelcome to the clerical hierarchy, so much so indeed; that their scribes will not let it come to the light if they can help it. "Blind leaders of the blind," they must needs "fall into the ditch" with their dupes.

IMMORTALITY, NOT INHERENT IN MAN, BUT CONDITIONAL. "LET THERE BE LIGHT."

"In that spirit of liberty which was the key-note of apostolic preaching, and unfettered by denominational bands," to quote from your New Years issue, I ask the insertion in your paper of the enclosed, clipt from the secular press of Chicago, exhibiting the progress of thought and the drift of investigation in respect to a subject of the very first importance to mankind, the true nature and constitution and the future destiny of our race.

Dr. Jewell is only one of many of the Orthodox Clergy of England and the United States, whose minds have been stirred to a new and fresh enquiring into the supposed Bible Authority of the current doctrine of the natural Immortality of all men—the immortal soul theory of Socrates and Plato—which, apart from its utter want of all Scriptural warrant subverts, if true, the grand Bible doctrine of future life only by the resurrection from the dead. This is the great secret of human destiny taught by Moses the prophets and Christ and the apostles.

Immortality only through Christ, who is "the Resurrection and the life," is the only effectual antidote to the pernicious Pagan dogma of an immortal soul in all men, and consequently of the eternal torment of the wicked in a burning hell; which so flatly contradicts the Bible which tells us expressly that "God is Love" and that "his mercy"—not his vengeance—endureth for ever"—and that in their judgment-day, the wicked will be punished "according to their deeds" and as these are finite and terminable, the penalty must be of a like character and cannot be eternal misery.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Meanwhile let us wisely "Prove all things," that we may "hold fast that which is good."

DEANERY OF CHICAGO DIOCESE.

The northeastern deanery of the diocese of Chicago met at Grace Episcopal church on Monday. Before the transaction of business, the Rev. E. S. Jewell, Ph. D., of Evanston, read an able and, as indicating the drift of thought among Episcopalians, a very remarkable paper on "Conditional Immortality." He took the ground that there was no such thing as inherent immortality in any human being; that immortality was a gift of God, lost at the fall, and restored to the race, conditionally, in Jesus Christ. Men could never by works put God under an obligation to give them immortality, it was by grace only, and yet men were to seek for glory, honor, and immortality, and win eternal life. The totally wicked dies as the beast dieth, though that final extinction of being might not be until after the judgment. It may be said that Dr. Jewell is an advanced churchman, and ranks with what is called the Catholic school in the Episcopal church. The doctrine which he forces from moral, metaphysical, and Scriptural grounds, has a large number of adherents among the Episcopal clergy. The paper was especially prepared at the request of the clergy, and a resolution was passed thanking the doctor for the able statement of the doctrine which he had made.

THE BIBLE HOPE VERSUS THAT OF TRADITION.

"Even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body." "For we are saved by hope"—for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for" "But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." (Rom. viii. 24). This passage reveals to us very clearly two important truths—(1st) That salvation consists of and is identical with the redemption of the body. (2nd) That Christians, in the present life, can only be saved by hope, or have a hope of being saved when the body shall be redeemed at the resurrection of the just. We know that our bodies are not yet redeemed because we are subject, as Paul and his fellow Christians were, to pain and death. Hence we cannot now be actually saved, as salvation and the redemption of the body are identical, and both are promised at the coming of the great Redeemer and Savior. The promise reads, That to them that look for him, He will appear the second time, unto salvation. Therefore, we should hope for and wait for, so long as we are in this groaning state, for the salvation or redemption of the body, to take place when "they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." And when these things, (signs) begin to come to pass, then "look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." (Luke xxi. 27, 28.) The obedient believer in the gospel of Christ, has passed from the broad way of death, and entered the narrow way that leads to eternal life, and has thus come into a savable state, but "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." When a man believes the gospel, repents, and is "baptised for the remission of his sins," he becomes an heir of salvation. (Heb. i. 14). He continues to be an heir, if faithful, till the coming of Christ the second time, (Heb. ix. 28), then he will inherit that great reward. The heirship is first—afterwards the inheritance.

During this age the "gospel of salvation" is to be preached, at the introduction of the "age to come," salvation and eternal life will be given. (Mark x. 30.) Now they are matters of promise and hope and not of actual possession. Paul in the text says, "But if we hope for that (salvation) which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." Again, "putting on for an helmet the hope of salvation," (1 Thess. v. 8), He adds, for God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. The same promise is found in the words of Jesus, (John xi. 25, 26). "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live (come to life.) And whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." When he comes, both living and dead believers "will live together with him."

John in his first letter (ii. 25) writes, "This is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life." In his letter to Titus, Paul writes, "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Again in chapter iii. 7, it is written, "that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." These and many other Scriptures show that eternal life is not given to believers in this age, but is promised to them in the age (time) to come. Jesus says, (Mark x.) that those who forsake all for him shall receive a hundred fold, now in this time, with persecutions and in the world (age) to come eternal life. Upon these plain and sure promises—exceedingly great and precious—so many build a hope that will not make us ashamed when it is fulfilled and be to us an anchor in the trials of life and death. It has had power to sustain millions of martyrs who have cheerfully laid down their lives for the sake of Christ and his gospel.

If the gift of eternal life is yet a matter of unfulfilled promise to all believers, living and dead, and, if some of the many that sleep in the dust of earth, shall awake to everlasting life," why do many teach that the Christian in some mystic sense, gets eternal life when he becomes a Christian? How is it possible to hope for any promised gift after we have received it. Hope is always the expectation of some future good that is desired, and when that future good is obtained, it is impossible to hope for it any longer. I recently heard a modern evangelist preach to a very full house, from the text, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." He explained the wages, death, to mean spiritual death, and gave no warning of eternal death, and neglected to present at all the powerful motive and hope of eternal life.

Sometimes they will go through a revival—excite the people with stories of going to heaven or hell at death, without using the Advent—resurrection—motive till the last discourse. If the gospel is the power of God, why not bring it to bear all the way through the meeting? How great the contrast between the modern popular gospel and that taught by Jesus and his disciples! A literal, future resurrection, such as Christ, the first fruits experienced, is by many rejected, and an unscriptural substitute adopted. The Bible doctrine of putting on immortality (that has been sought by a patient continuance in well doing) by resurrection and exchange, has been exchanged for Plato's immortal soul, which the Bible wholly ignores, and sinners are warned to save their immortal souls from going, at death, into a hell of endless torment, instead of a "second death," after their resurrection and judgment. For eternal life and death, as taught in the Bible, is substituted eternal happiness or misery. "He that hath a dream, let him tell a dream, he that hath my word, let him preach it.—What is the chaff to the wheat?"

"BE YE RECONCILED."

There came lately to the present writer's knowledge the case of a woman who when very far advanced in years entered on a blessed experience, which awakened in her heart devout praise and thankfulness to him who is the fountain of all good. She obtained peace with God, rest in God, even joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Strange as it may appear to those who have had better guidance, she had long been striving to reach that enviable experience—striving to obtain an assurance that there was mercy even for her, and that she might reckon as hers a well-built hope of final salvation. She had expected to reach that height of conviction and comfort when by prayers, and entreaties, and tears, conjoined with reading her Bible and attending on public worship God had become reconciled towards her, and he had in some way intimated to her his satisfaction with her penitential doings, and his welcome to his family—a prodigal returned at length in her right mind. On her knees she would often cry, "O my God, pity me a miserable sinner; O my God, become my Friend!" and in the blackness of the night the same cry of anguish and desire would ascend from the agitated depths of her being. So actually had she been exercised, more or less, for the greater part of her extended life; all the while eager for rest and hope,—eager for one sweet beam of Divine pity, as she sailed over the tossing billows of spiritual misery.

Occasionally she felt as if God were beginning to be gracious; as if he were turning round to her in sympathy with her state; as if she had surely done enough to win a gleam of tenderness from the Awful One whom she had offended; but suddenly the lights went out, and she found herself once more the old captive in the dungeon of despair. "Is his mercy clean gone—shall the blessed peace never be mine—am I lost, lost forever?" These and such like thoughts chased each other through her brain; so that if ever there was a child of misery, she was that perplexed one. But she revealed her sorrow to no one, and with a calm, grave countenance fulfilled the round of duties belonging to her lowly sphere. None but God knew how wretched she was: and of those who may be alarmingly sure, be pitied her with his own infinite pity, which ever goes forth to the benighted and wayworn, and misled among his offspring on the greeen earth.

Fortunately this daughter of misery, at the time exactly in her eightieth year, was persuaded to attend a few special religious meetings, where a clearer gospel was delivered than the one, if gospel it could be called, she had been accustomed to hear from her youth up. What a curse is darkness? —what impiety, what inhumanity, to obscure with a dismal theology the face of him whose name is LOVE, so that dwellers here below cannot discern his compassion for the troubled and the self-condemned!

Speaking with her at the close of one of the meetings, a good man who had long rejoiced in Christ, readily detected the mistake of her life, and the reason why no peacefulness had ever settled on her breast. He explained to her in a loving way how from first to last she has been misunderstanding God; and that his method of comforting the troubled in mind and conscience was far simpler and far kinder than she had supposed. He explained to her how she had been reversing God's plan and method entirely, and that as a consequence her endeavors to obtain peace were a failure, and could only turn out a failure. He explained to her, in other words, that she had been doing all she could to reconcile him—to kindle, so to speak, friendly, loving feelings in his heart towards her; whereas he had all along been addressing her in this wonderful and touching appeal—"be ye reconciled!" 2 Cor. v. 20). The whole verse reads: "Now we (Apostles) are embassadors for (on behalf of) Christ, as though God did beseech you (i.e., sinful men) by us; we pray you (i.e., sinful men), in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

Her extended efforts to reconcile God, were thus clearly labor lost. She had been doing what was not required. She had mishapprehended God, who actually had ever been her friend, in spite of all her sins and short-comings, and was ready at any moment to admit her into favor, and into the enjoyment of his favor, without the smallest payment, or recompense, or self-torture, on her part whatever. His thoughts had clearly not been as her thoughts; his ways had not been as her ways. In virtue of her deplorable ignorance concerning God, she had piled in vain—she had been held in the bondage of terror. By beholding God as he is revealed—revealed in Jesus as her friend; revealed as waiting to be gracious—revealed as ever welcoming her freely into the home of mercy—revealed as ready to make her instantly an heir of "eternal life;" by beholding him in this light as he represents himself, not as his character is clouded and disfigured and made harsh and terrible by those who neither apprehend the Infinite Father nor his creature man, she passed gently and joyfully into the haven of peace divine, and gave glory to him who had brought her out of darkness into his marvellous effulgence. On that evening there was joy among the angels in heaven over a sin-stained pilgrim bending over the tomb, who, guided by the divine gospel of love and life, changed her mind of God, and in that change had found deliverance from the burden of guilt, and an escape from the irons wherewith she had so long been bound. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance."—W. G. Mansfield.

REAL OR BIBLE IMMORTALITY.

Christ preached a real immortality, very different from that of Egypt and Greece. His doctrine on the subject was dogmatically affirmed. It did not rest on assumption, conjecture or figures. The proofs of it were not such as men might gather from the writings of the philosophers of Pagan countries. It was an immortality peculiar to itself, and not to be demonstrated independently of it, by the logic of the schools. He brought it to light by the gospel. Apart from the gospel He could never have made it known. This very fact distinguishes it in the most striking manner from all the conclusions upon the subject which men may have arrived at, by the inherent force of their own understanding. If his immortality be a fact, theirs is a fiction of the most pernicious and baneful type. Both cannot possibly be true. Theirs is immortality without a body. His is immortality in tangible and visible form, attainable by resurrection from the dead. Theirs is a congenital immortality—his a conditional bestowment. Theirs is held to be a present fact of human consciousness—his is a future inheritance. Theirs is for all—his only for as many as the Father has given unto him. While, looks the most real and most likely? There is something about the common view which people take of this question which fails to yield true satisfaction in the best moments of human history. Men and women find it hard work just before the coffin lid is screwed on, to persuade themselves that death has not really and truly done its work! I confess I cannot see anything particularly entrancing in the prospect of a bodiless and impalpable existence. This may be owing to some defect in my mental constitution, but there certainly appears to me to be nothing transpiring or inviting in the vague expectations which are popularly entertained with regard to a future life. In Christ's doctrine, however, I can see a definiteness and substantiality and glory, which meet all the cravings of my mental and moral being, and make it possible for me to hope and trust without violating my reason in the process. "I will raise him up at the last day." "He shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto the body of his glory." There is nothing ghostly and bodiless about that! I am offered a nature that will be just as substantial as my present one, and far more real. For where will the reality of my present organization be 100 years from now? It will be simply impossible to predicate reality of it at that distant period. It will in the natural course of things have completely disappeared from the universe. But Christ invites me to partake of a nature that will never disappear as long as eternal ages roll—a nature that will never be burdened by the least sensation of weariness, or inefficiency, or dullness, organic—a nature from which the law of sin and death has been eradicated, and whose every stem and pulsation will thrill as energy imperishable and divine. All that is connected in the Scriptures with the immortality which Christ revealed, has a reality about it which presents a thrilling contrast to the supposed forms of disembodied felicity by which it is sought to engage the hope and aspirations of man.

No man who believes that when he dies he will be conveyed to the skies, has the remotest conception of the manner in which he will employ his celestial activities and spend his time. The occupations of that heavenly existence are generally held to be mainly of a musical sort, and harps of gold are mentioned as a prime attraction. But nobody seems to be at all sure. They are quite willing to leave all such details until they get there. Their hope rests on no real promise, and therefore can hardly be expected to fasten itself on any real features of the heavenly state to which they aspire. It is very different with the hope set before us in the gospel. That hope is founded on God's covenants made with the fathers of the Israelitish nation thousands of years ago. It relates to a blessedness to be realized upon the earth, at a time when all sublunary affairs will be under the jurisdiction of his glorious Son, and when the authority everywhere will be tried and placed in trustful hands. "To him that overcometh will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron." There is something very real about that. We can understand it. It commands our perfect admiration and sympathy. There is nothing vague and shadowy and sentimental in the prospect. It is precisely what is needed. At present, power is arbitrarily distributed among men. Many rule who lack essential qualification for the task. They are proud and selfish, and seem to think the earth was made for their special benefit. Others again are well disposed but impotent to deal with the great problems which confront them. They have the will, but not the courage, nor the resources, which the exigencies of the case demand. After all, such rulers must sooner or later die, and leave their thrones to others. But God proposes to provide the earth with a race of kings who shall have been developed on principles which have never yet determined a man's accession to power. Kings selected not by virtue of their birth, nor yet because of the voice of the majority, but by reason of their submission to his will during a probationary course in which their faith and obedience has been put to many a hard and grievous test. Kings who have learned compassion and benevolence by manifold experience of evil; Kings who will not judge after the sight of their eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of their ears; Kings whose wisdom will never be baffled, whose power will never be beneath the occasion, and whose throne will never become vacant by the hand of death.

Were the nations in the days of such a government now, what an altered state of things we should see. Is it not, think you, worthy to become a divine reality? It is at any rate good to be tried, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. These are the things that belong to the Bible system of faith, and they appeal strongly to our sober sense. We can think of them and anticipate them without requiring our reason to abdicate her throne. They satisfy the profoundest instincts of our being, and the most exacting intellect can ask nothing more.—Bible Light Scout.

Find enclosed two dollars, and credit me with same to my account for THE RESTITUTION for 1885.

You may depend on me being a yearly subscriber for the paper as long as I shall live, and have the means, and the paper continues as good as now, or until the Lord shall come to reward every one as his work shall be. The time now may be short, and it behooves each and every one to have on the whole armor of God, so that we may be enabled to war successfully against all unrighteousness, while in this present life, that we may have an abundant entrance into life everlasting, at the marriage supper of the Lamb. Till then, or at least while we live, let us continue to labor and pray not for those only that believe, but for those that believe not, that we may have stars in our crown of rejoicing, to the glory of God. Yours in the hope of eternal life through the righteousness of Christ and faith in his atoning blood. JOSIAH SEAL.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as exemplified by Christ.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Feb. 4, 1885.

BROTHER JOHN FOORS, of Galesburgh, Kan., visited us on Monday. He has been holding a number of meetings at the Antioch Meeting House a few miles south of Plymouth.

DO not send us such long articles. We shall have to abbreviate some on hand by leaving out the more unimportant parts, or divide them into two or more numbers—or leave them unpublished.

REMEMBER THE RESTITUTION. Papers advocating conditional immortality, the nearing advent of our Lord, the literal fulfilment of prophecy, and the restitution of all things are dependent upon the liberality and sacrifice of the lovers of the dear Redeemer's cause. Probably not more than one or two papers—known to the world as advent papers—are sustained by subscription alone. The brethren have the promise of God's blessing for all that is done for the sake of the gospel.

THE February number of the Phrenological Journal contains the portraits and brief biographical histories of three living centenarians; one of which is Sir Moses Montefiore, the celebrated Jewish Philanthropist. Another notable article in this number is entitled—Poets and Poetry, in which the inspired life and diction of genuine poesy are ably contrasted with mere verse-making.

THE two items following are from a late number of the N. Y. Independent. The first in order shows the hopelessness of the Gentile mind when not illuminated by the gospel. To the Gentile, death ended all, so far at least as the Phœnician epitaph bears witness. The Egyptian mythology was no improvement so far as its fables of human destiny were concerned. In this mythology death made strange work in its dissolution of man's quintuple organization. Though slightly digressive we remark that the ideas of redemption and human destiny, as held by leading denominations in this nineteenth century, are exceedingly out of harmony with revealed truth. As being in point we quote two very expressive sentences:—"A theology which is not Biblical is worse than useless. It is pernicious;" and:—"The Battle of Theology within the next quarter-century will be fought within the triangular space indicated by three points, Christology, Soteriology, Eschatology."

In eschatology the doctrine that future eternal life is not our inheritance from the first parents of the race, but a supernatural bestowment from God himself through the Son of his love, will supercede the stupendous forms of error that have prevailed in all ages and among all nations. The resurrection of the dead and conditional immortality are the doctrines that will come to the front and win the hearty assent of earnestly thoughtful minds, as we believe, in the near future. The following are the selected items.

It is difficult to find any very definite ideas about a future state on any very ancient Phœnician tombstone inscription, or on a Greek or Latin one of the classic or later period. Even the formula χρηστε χαιρε, so common on Greek tombstones, seems often to have lost all reference to a departure to the shades, and to mean nothing more than simple "farewell." In a Cesnola bilingual inscription, Greek and Latin, the phrase is rendered by Η[ΙΟ]. S[EPVLTA]. EST, or "here lies buried." Other epitaphs show a sense of loss, but not much hope. Thus: "Having always lived a reverent life, happy Artemidorus, through thy prudence, farewell though among the perished." And again: "Since indeed Fate, as the proper end, has brought thee beneath the lap of earth, holy Sopatros, dead, farewell, though among the perished." So another one, which is doubtless the epitaph of some ancient Delmenico: "The holy man Bacchis, to simplex debt, ever shown excellent in culinary arts, the earth holds, dead."

Dr. Samuel Birch, in the "Proceedings" of the (London) Society of Biblical Archæology, for December, 1884, has several interesting notes on the dead of ancient Egypt, and the belief held by the ancient Egyptians respecting the future state. Most important of these notes was that on the Egyptian belief concerning the shade or shadow of the departed. The shade was supposed to be the light envelope of the soul. It wandered over the earth, visited the tomb and descended into it. It was visible, but not tangible. Some shades were called "the damned." The elements of the dead were the ghost, the soul, the body, the shade, and the mummy. The punishment of the shades (that were punished) was by sacking in a saloon, by burning in the pits of hell, by being strangled or cut, or by being separated from the souls of the dead. These were the early ideas quoted. The paper of Dr. Birch was fully furnished with quotations from the existing texts.

Selections.

Is the Nile Expedition Under Lord Wolseley the Subject of Divine Prophecy?

There can be no intelligent misgiving that the Soudan geographically constitutes a part of ancient Ethiopia, so that the nomadic descendants of Ishmael, who are now coverted into the fanatical creatures of the Mahdi, are properly Ethiopians.

There is a prophecy in Ezekiel which naturally makes the student of Scripture regard with much interest the present expedition of our soldiers up the Nile, "the river of Ethiopia," for the relief of General Gordon. The prophecy is cited in the day of the messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Ethiopians afraid, and great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt: for, lo, it cometh."

The greatest interest in connection with these words to the student of Divine prophecy centers in the three first, viz, "In that day." Nothing seems to be more ominous in the prophetic Scriptures than these oft-repeated words. They rivet the attention at once, and prelude in general some prospective unfolding of "The Great and Terrible Day of the Lord."

We have the phrase in the Old Testament prophetic Scriptures thus: "The Lord alone shall be exalted in that day....In that day the Lord shall punish the host of the high ones that are on high, and the kings of the earth upon the earth....In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah: We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks, etc....In that day shall the (spiritually) deaf hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the (spiritually) blind shall see out of obscurity, and out of darkness....They shall know in that day that I am He (Christ Jesus) that doth speak; behold! it is (Christ Jesus)....My words....shall be accomplished in that day before thee (Israel): but I will deliver thee in that day, saith the Lord....In that day, will I cause the horn (kingly power) of the house of Israel to bud forth, and I will give thee (the prophet, as a personification of his predictions) the opening of the mouth in the midst of them, and they shall know that I (Christ Jesus) am the Lord, etc.

A very much larger number of quotations might be adduced from the Old Testament prophets, which, we believe, conclusively prove that in the majority of instances in which the phrase "in that day" occurs, the forecasts are still prospective, and comprehend, if not a sole and exhaustive, yet a final reference to the "day of the Lord," which shall as surely come as the unexpected judgments on the antediluvian world and the cities of the plain!

And as the Holy Scriptures must be regarded as interexplanatory, luminous with their own light, it may be as well to recur to this important phrase, as used by our adorable Lord and Savior, and the New Testament Scriptures, subsequently to His ministry.

"Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name? etc....Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven, etc....It shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom than for that city....I will come again....at that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, etc....I will see you again....and in that day ye shall ask me nothing.....Of that day and hour knoweth no man, etc., (the present tense being used: the Scriptures having to be 'sealed' till the time of the end.)....I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom....Take heed to yourselves lest....that day come upon you unawares."

Such are the words of Christ, our great Teacher, in respect to "that day" of Holy Scripture, which can only refer to his second personal advent to our world. St. Paul makes frequent use of the phrase. He says: "When He shall come to be glorified in His saints,...in that day....The Lord grant unto him (Onesiphorus) that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day....Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing....But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief....That day shall not come except there come a falling away first (the predicted great) apostasy of the outward professing churches of Christ), and that man of sin (the latter-day personal Antichrist) be revealed, the son of perdition, etc. I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."

These sentences can only refer to the second coming of Christ. And now we will return to our starting-point.

"In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Ethiopians afraid, and great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt; for, lo, it cometh" (Ez. xxx. 9). The latter clause of this passage has thus been paraphrased or expounded, "The day of Ethiopia's pain shall come shortly, as Egypt's day came." This comment was advanced some time before the recent Egyptian troubles came upon the scene! And how exactly has the day of Ethiopia's pain come after that of Egypt! Egypt's day of pain came with the interior troubles that culminated in the deposition of the late Khedive. It was continued by Arabi's rebellion, the bombardment of Alexandria, the defeat of the Egyptians under Sir Garnet Wolseley, the subsequent retribution on the Egyptian conspirators, the plague of cholera, and now virtual national bankruptcy. It is to go on, after, perhaps, a lull in its acute phases, until Egypt's final overthrow under the predicted, and rapidly nearing latter-day personal Antichrist.

And now, in consonance with the prediction, we behold "messengers" going forth (literally) "in ships" with the avowed purpose of rescuing certain Englishmen, but really with the concurrent and ulterior political intention of striking awe into the hearts of the fanatical hordes of the Mahdi—"to make the careless Ethiopians afraid"—with a view of putting a stop to the rebellion, and save Egypt and the rest of the Mahommedan world the horrors of a general "rise" and resulting anarchy.

It is not doing violence to either Scripture prediction or the pages of history to submit that the recent naval expedition to Suakin is part, though, perhaps, only the prefatory and inchoative fulfillment of this remarkable prophecy. In the first instance our soldiers were but "messengers" despatching their "messages" to Osman Digna to the effect that if the route be left open for the relief of the garrisons, the approach of the English would not be hostile to the Arabs, i. e., the "Ethiopians." But the Arab besiegers heeded not, and so our men made the "careless Ethiopians afraid"—how significantly as the events are too recent to need recapitulation to prove. And now that expedition is supplemented by the present Nile expedition, with an identical object in view, as though events, by this duplicate fulfilment were pressing upon even the most indifferent person the notice of this Divine prophecy.

The style of warfare now adopted is unique in the history of military science. It had its counterpart, however, in the recent Red River Expedition, carried to a satisfactory issue by the same commander, now entrusted with the task of raising the siege at Khartoum, and relieving General Gordon.

The eyes of God's children are to be open as to the signs of the times, but not those of the world. The unconverted world, if it were so with them, would attempt to defeat the verification of Divine prophecy at every turn; while the true children of God hail such verification with unbounded joy. They love to see their Father "at the helm" of affairs!

I cannot be doubted that Lord Wolseley's orders are pregnant with "messages" that he will conquer by diplomacy, as a "messenger," if events favor and opportunities present themselves. There will be "messages" to the friendly tribes, to the hostile Arabs, to the Egyptian garrisons, to General Gordon, etc. And so, in the first instance, the Nile Expedition is, as every one can see, a huge embassage of "Messengers."

What can be a more literal specific verification of our prophecy?

But the "messenger" aspect of the Expedition will fail. The diplomatist will merge in the General and the "careless Ethiopians" will be made afraid.

Although the river Nile is not mentioned in connection with the prophecy as the scene of such a diplomatic-military enterprise, yet we read in comments on this passage, written before the least shadow of a shade of an idea of the present Expedition could be entertained, the following remarkable words: "The cataracts interposing between them (the Ethiopians) and Egypt should not save them." The subject of the difficulties presented by these very cataracts has formed a very important element in the counsels respecting this Expedition! It is evident, therefore, that the commentator regarded this very river Nile, and not the Red Sea, as the theatre of the fulfillment of our remarkable prediction.

And lo! and behold! its fulfilment has come!

"In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships." We are glad to see our Heavenly Father at the head of both political, military, and naval affairs. The "messengers go forth" from him. He has his eyes open for the good of his children, and everything is working together for their especial good, until the kingdom be taken from the wicked and given to the saints of the Most High;" and they shall possess it for ever, even for evermore! "Messengers" in "skiffs" (vessels of bulrushes," light canoes, formed of papyrus, daubed over with pitch, answering to any vessels that ply on water) (Is. xviii 2; etc., shall go up the Nile as far as navigable."

Are not the "signs of the times" before us, indeed.

"In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Ethiopians afraid."

It is very evident that these "messengers" are hostile to the "careless Ethiopians," seeing that their determined purpose is "is to make them afraid."

They could not have been friendly Egyptians in the approach of a common enemy, such as the Babylonians; for did the Egyptians ever perform such a service to the Ethiopians? To warn and re-assure them, and not to fill them with terror and fear, would have been their object.

And had Nebuchadnezzar, or any other conqueror of Egypt, inaugurated such a flotilla of adventurers, it would figure as a presursory fulfilment of the prediction, which is repeated in our latter-day era: to the verification of the belief that Old Testament prophecy is not definitively and exhaustively fulfilled as yet.

However, friendly Egyptians could not figure as fulfilling this Divine prophecy, for the simple reason that the prediction presupposes enemies rather than friends.

That the present fanatical hordes of the Mahdi's "Ethiopians" are a "careless" set of people may be gathered from the fact that they are fanatical.

Fanaticism is the very atmosphere of "carelessness," it is an immolation of natural instincts, common sense, and the higher element of reason, that constitute the intellectual nature of man; and hence the "carelessness" accorning from it.

That "want of care," of "carelessness," in the Mahdi's "Ethiopians" has been repeatedly manifested during the rebellion in the daring recklessness in which they have rushed to certain death on the points of English bayonets, true heroism being wanting, since such courage arose not from principle but from fanaticism!

Fanaticism teaches that its possessor is safe, both in this life and that to come, whatever occurs; and hence the "carelessness," or want of care, of these Ethiopian Soudanese! In this respect the prophecy and ratifying events tally. But let us proceed further with this prediction, which is so very important to the present generation. "In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Ethiopians afraid and great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt; for, lo, it cometh."

Can greater pain, consistent with the times—the Great Tribulation proper or not yet being ushered in—come upon any people than that now happening and threatening the Egyptian Soudan? What with the horrors of civil war, national bankruptcy, and foreign invasion, either of which separately is certainly "great pain"—the prophecy can confidently be considered to be in a state of ratification in what is now transpiring in the far-off land of the Nile.

"As in the day of Egypt: for lo! it cometh." "As" was Egypt's trouble so shall be that of Ethiopia. This trouble arose, as is well known, through Finance, Rebellion, and Foreign Invasion.

"For lo! it cometh." It is scarcely come upon Egypt, but it descends on Ethiopia! "Behold the trouble of Egypt, and lo! it is upon Ethiopia."

So we see that the present condition of things in the far East answers to our prediction, even to the very incidents transpiring and enumerated respectively.

Let us turn to the chapter (Ez. xxx.) from which our prophecy is mainly taken. It commences with, "Howl ye, woe worth the day! For the day is near, even the day of the Lord is near, a cloudy day: it shall be the time of the heathen. And the sword shall come upon Egypt, and great pain shall be in Ethiopia....They also that uphold Egypt shall fall."

"In that day" of our prediction evidently refers to the above "day of the Lord," so that when the events of the prediction are transpiring (which we endeavored to prove are now transpiring) the initiatory stages of the "Day of the Lord"—of the Great Tribulation, will have commenced.

Perhaps from those introductory stages to the c. of the Great Tribulation will be [illegible] seven years. And if the beginning of those troubles (for they must gradually come on) took place, say, in [illegible], then the fourteen years to the full accomplishment will carry us to [illegible] as being the end of this age. That the Napoleonic-Judaic covenant will probably commence in the year 1888 or run out in seven years, the latter three and a half of which being the predicted period of the Great Tribulation proper.

It is supposed by some intelligent expositors that the time of the "battle" will be the taking vengeance on them....the judgment on Egypt being the beginning of a world-wide judgment on [illegible] heathen (Gentile) enemies of the [illegible]; so, what is the order, then, to [illegible] judgment? First Egypt, secondly, Ethiopia; thirdly, the people that [illegible] Egypt—viz., the English people!

Who else are upholding Egypt at the present day, when these things are taking place? And we see, is it treasure, not a jot or tittle, "not one dash," of the "sure word of prophecy" shall ever fail? Then we are forced to conclude that this is a serious moment for England, which, with Egypt and Ethiopia, has already entered the outer circle of the vortex of the Great Tribulation.

And with this view agree other prophecies. Let us adduce but one: "As at the report concerning Egypt so they shall be sorely pained at the report of Tyre. Pass ye over to Tarshish: howl ye inhabitants of the isle." Here are, then, "howling" and "pain" for "Tyre (the modern Tyre, England) as well as for, and in connection with, the "pain" and "howling" of Egypt and Ethiopia. It is most clear that ancient Tyre and Tarshish were not sufficiently important to exhaust the full meaning of the Divine prophecy in connection with themselves: and that some modern counterparts are meant. The British dominions are indubitably those modern counterparts.

We need scarcely re-affirm here, what is so frequently stated, by the most able exponents of prophetic truth, that one of the three Frog-like Spirits under the seventh vial in Revelation xvi. 12, 13, 14, which are to carry on their nefarious operations, constituting the disturbing, intriguing agencies which shall go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the war of the great day of God Almighty, is Mohammedan fanaticism, and its going forth is to be concurrent with the "drying up of the mystic Euphrates," or dissolution of the Turkish Empire, which even to secularist politicians is now clearly seen to be progressing towards its final accomplishment.

May God in His great goodness open the eyes of all his servants to the truth, that they may be "watching and praying always," to His honor and glory.—The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

The Life of Godliness.

The ascetic life of abstinence, of fasting, austerity, singularity, is...the lower and earthlier form of religion. The life of godliness is the glory of Christ. It is a thing far more striking to the vulgar imagination to be religious after the type and pattern of John the Baptist—to fast—to mortify every inclination—to be found at no feast—to wrap ourselves in solitariness, and abstain from all social joys; yes, and far easier so to live, and far easier so to win a character of religiousness. A silent man is easily reputed wise. A man who suffers none to see him in the common jostle and undress of life, easily gathers around him a mysterious veil of unknown sanctity, and men honor him for a saint. The unknown is always wonderful.

But the life of him whom men called a gluttonous man and a winebibber, and friend of publicans and sinners, was a far harder and a far heavenlier religion. To shroud ourselves in no false mist of holiness; to dare to show ourselves as we are, making no solemn affectation of reserve or difference for others; to be found at the marriage feast; to accept the invitation of the rich Pharisee Simon, and the scorned publican, Zacchæus; to mix with the crowd of men, using [illegible] as affected singularity, content to be [illegible] bright or good for human nature's [illegible] ly food; and yet for a man amidst [illegible] to remain a consecrated spirit, [illegible]ls and his solitariness known [illegible] to his Father—a being set [illegible]ot of this world, alone in the [illegible]s deeps with God; to put the cup [illegible] this world's gladness to his lips [illegible]l yet be unintoxicated; to gaze steadily on all its grandeur, and yet be undazzled, plain and simple in personal desire; to feel its brightness and yet defy its thrall; this is the difficult, and rare, and glorious life of God in the soul of man. This, this was the peculiar glory of the life of Christ.

Our Dangerous Classes.

In his sermon of Sunday evening, January 25, Rev. John L. Scott, of the East Boston Presbyterian Church, said:

The attempt to destroy Westminster was an outrage, not simply against the English Government, but against government everywhere. It was an attack upon the Capitol at Washington, and whatever it may represent.

It is folly to claim for it patriotism, or that it was redress for real or fancied wrongs. Those assassins have no country, and want none. Neither is it just to brand any church as being responsible for their crime. They have no church, and hate government there as they do in the state. In England they profess to be Catholics: in Germany, Lutherans; in Russia, Greeks: but everywhere they are nothing. So it was in France—the revolution began with the execution of the King and ended in the Pantheon.

Who are the dangerous classes in this country? Not men identified with churches, but those who have abandoned all faith and hate moral restraint. The old man who lands at our wharf, with his chest and hamper, has come here to work; he is willing to break stones upon the streets, and on Sunday he goes to his church. There is no danger from him, or thousands like him; but he has a son, born here, perhaps. That son starts a saloon, enters into the politics of the city, becomes a recognized factor at the polls, and makes himself felt in more ways than the public knows. He retains his father's religion in name and nothing else, and then he is the representative of an element dangerous to any government. Again, there is another class, if possible, still worse—noisy infidels, atheists, itinerant scoffers—men who would destroy the sanctity of the Sabbath, reverence for the Deity; free-thinkers, free-doers, liberals in virtue and right. These two constitute the dangerous elements in this country. They riot in Cincinnati, parade as Socialists in Chicago, and in England, under the mask of Irish wrongs, murder women, children, and innocent men.

LONDON, Jan. 30.—A despatch from Sydney, New South Wales, says that the express train between Sydney and Wagga Wagga, while running at a high rate of speed was thrown into a creek by the weakness of a bridge. Forty of the passengers were killed. Heavy rains have prevailed throughout New South Wales and much damage has been caused by floods.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—The United States Consul at Malaga reports to the Department of State, in regard to the recent earthquakes in Spain, that fifty villages have been destroyed and 2,000 lives have been lost. He also says that not less than 30,000 persons have quitted the city of Malaga, and that the rest of the population sleep in the open air. The death rate from disease has increased 300 per cent. At Jovena a small river which ran through the town has entirely disappeared. At Albunuelas the earth opened, swallowing the church and other buildings, so that nothing remains in sight but the weather cock of the church spire. Two hundred bodies have already been taken from the ruins. At Velez-Malaga the prison, churches, convents, and City Hall have all been levelled to the ground.

The present Spanish earthquakes have not been without some of those accompaniments which almost invariably attend earthquakes of any severity. Serious landslides are often the sequel of such shocks; streams disappear, springs cease flowing, rivers are dried up, and their course is so obstructed that they form lakes. One village in Granada has been moved bodily some sixty feet in a northward direction, a deep semi-circular crevasse appearing on its former site. The course of the little river near which the village stood has been blocked up, and a lake is being formed. Many of the sulphur springs with which the region abounds suddenly ceased flowing, but reappeared a day or two after in a state of unusual heat—indicative, no doubt, of the character of the force at work below. At Periana a landslide on a mountain in the neighborhood destroyed a church and 700 houses.

After three days and nights of almost incessant rain, following on much previous bad weather, the Tiber has risen above its banks and invaded the streets of the city at various points. The Pantheon, with a portion of the piazza around it, is flooded, the water having risen above the bases of the columns of the portico. The Ripetta is under water from the hemicycle facing the Ponte Sant Giacomo to the rear of the Palazzo Borghese. The street, which under various names runs from the Corso to the bridge of St. Angelo, is impassable in front of the Palazzo Petinoli and again in front of the Apollo Theater, rendering any performances there this evening impossible. At the bridge of St. Angelo the water has risen within one meter and a half of the summit of the center arch. The lower portion of the Ghetto is entirely flooded on one side of the river, and a considerable portion of the Via delle Lungara on the other. The whole of the works of the Tiber embankment from the Ponte Sisto to the Ponte Quattro Capi, and beyond, are completely under water.

Excursion to Washington.

On the fourth of March, every fourth year, multitudes of people assemble at the National Capitol to take part in and to witness the ceremonial which invests with imperial authority the uncrowned monarch of the great republic.

The preparations for the inauguration of the next President are being made upon a scale which promises a display of unprecedented grandeur and magnificence. Legions of organized political clubs, civic societies and trade guilds, combined with a host of volunteer and regular military corps, will form a pageant of brilliant pomp and splendor.

Washington, in the winter season, is one of the gayest capitols in Christendom, and the festivites incident to the inauguration of the ohief magistrate will render it doubly attractive. Its broad and well paved avenues and beautiful squares, adorned with monuments and statues; its splendid private residences, art galleries and museums; its imposing public buildings, chief of which is the Capitol, standing matchless in grace and symmetry among the finest specimens of architecture in the world, are all objects of unfailing enjoyment to the visitor. The vicinity, too, of Washington, abounds in places of historic interest. Mount Vernon, the resting place of the first President, is reached by a short steamboat ride upon the bosom of the majestic Potomac; the National Cemetry at Arlington, where thousands of heroes sleep, and the National Soldiers' Home are also within easy access.

There can be no question as to the pleasure to be derived from a visit to Washington, and the only question is, how to get there at a reasonable cost. To meet this query the "Pennsylvania Lines" will sell excursion tickets at extremely low rates. They have placed in service elegant Eastlake Day Coaches and Pullman's Palace Sleeping Cars, which will form solid through trains from Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, Toledo and Cleveland to Washington City. The Pennsylvania Lines are superior to any on the continent in construction, equipment and efficient service. "Security, Certainty, and Celerity" is their motto, and they have become model standards for all other roads in the country. Their lines traverse a section unsurpassed in rich and varied scenery: the cating houses furnish first-class meals at convenient hours; the track and rolling stock are guarded with all the approved appliances known to science to insure the safety of passengers; and finally, you are landed in a magnificent station, situated in the business centre of Washington City, En passant, this station has become invested with a mournful interest to all patriotic Americans. In it was enacted the tragedy which culminated in the death of the lamented Garfield. A marble column, erected in the waiting room, shows where he fell, and a golden star, set in the tiled floor, marks the spot first crimsoned with the blood of the illustrous slain.

MEDITATION OF CHRIST.

"My meditation of him shall be sweet; I will be glad in the Lord."

I journey through a desert drear and wild,
Yet in my heart by such sweet thoughts beguiled,
Of Him on whom I lean, my Strength, my Stay—
I can forget the sorrows of the way.

Thoughts of His love—the root of every grace,
Which finds in this poor heart a dwelling-place;
The sunshine of my soul, than day more bright,
And my calm pillow of repose by night.

Thoughts of His sojourn in this vale of tears;
The tale of love unfolded in those years
Of sinless suffering and patient grace,
I love, again, and yet again to trace.

Thoughts of His death; upon the cross I gaze,
And there behold its sad, yet healing rays;
Beacon of hope, which lifted up on high,
Blesses with heavenly light the tear-dimmed eye.

Thoughts of His coming; for that joyful day
In patient hope I watch, and wait, and pray;
The day draws nigh, the midnight shadows flee;
Oh! what a sunrise will that advent be!

Thus while I journey on, my Lord to meet,
My thoughts and meditations are so sweet
Of Him on whom I lean—my Strength, my Stay,
I can forget the sorrows of the way.

THE STORY OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.—Luke xvi.

When first the attention of students of the Scriptures is turned to the grand doctrine of "life only in Christ," and to the other truths of which that is more or less the key, the story of "the Rich Man and Lazarus" looms up in magnificent proportions, and threatening attitude, and seems to present an impassable barrier to further progress; and although as we progress and find the many paths that pass it on all sides, and do succeed in getting beyond, yet ever and anon when the attention is called, we look back at it as a great and dreadful cloud bank, a gigantic bugbear, rising in towering isolation, and seeming to forbid and defy the steps of the wayfaring explorer. And the enemies of the truth know this fact well, and the finger of wrathful warning is kept well pointed to it in mysterious awfulness, as they remind us in sepulchral tones that it will be too late to amend our "horrible doctrine" when we in living barbecue in the pit, will shout for their assistance in the reserved seats.

For my part I think that many expositions of the story instead of throwing more light on the subject, have meddled it even more than it was before, in fact the very simplicity of the subject seems to have caused the confusion, and no one seems to have looked for an exposition that shows on the face of it. Sea and land have been compassed for far-fetched parallelisms, the most popular at present with us is, that Lazarus, in some sort of a way, represents the Gentiles and the Rich Man the Jews, and that the Gentiles figuratively eat at the Jew's gate full of heathenish sores, and so on. I opine that the best refutation of this theory is the statement of it, as we are all aware that the Gentiles never begged anything of any consequence, especially of the Jews, but what they wanted of them they took, and as to temple privileges—well, the Jews themselves, of course, considered them as "dogs or worse, but in the estimation of the living God and his Son "in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him."

The fact is that the famous story when viewed as a satire is easily understood, without explanation to those who are familiar with that form of literature, but for the benefit of those who are not familiar with the nature of parable and satire, perhaps it would be well to attempt a few remarks on the subject.

A parable generally speaking is a parallelism between the thing to be explained and the explanation. I say this is generally so perhaps, but not by any means always so, for human language is so various and so versatile that sometimes the lesson intended to be drawn from the illustration is an antithesis of it, and very force is lent by contrast. As simple and familiar uses of parable in this way, I would mention such as the following. "If ye being evil know how to give good gifts, how much more your Heavenly Father" etc. Then there are such parables as the unjust judge, the unjust steward, etc., where the intelligent reader will perceive that good and wholesome lessons of virtue, righteousness and equity are drawn from stories of human frailty, trickery, and injustice; but this is not all, human speech goes farther than even this in its uses, and commonly, very commonly, takes the form of irony or satire, in which the meaning of the speaker or writer cannot possibly be gathered from the actual sense of the words he uses, but must be measured by the circumstances under which they were spoken, and even sometimes by the tone in which they are said. Thus for instance, one of the keenest of modern satirists is Robert Burns the Scottish poet, all the pious hypocrisy of his generation found vent in his masterly pen, yet the burning force of his language is almost all lost on one who does not appreciate the "spirit of his time." The grotesque absurdities of his "Kirk's alarm," "Holy Fair," "Address to the Deil," etc., that fill the Scotch mind with perfect inexpressibleness are gazed at by the English novice in wistfulness as he asks for an explanation, but while the explanation progresses the wit dies, for trying to analyze any bon-mot kills it. Thus also in a matter of translation. The great masterpiece of the Spanish author Cervantes, namely, "Don Quixote," has been translated into every civilized language, yet none can relish it like the Spaniard, and most of us would consider it very dry reading; yet he is said by this work to have "smited chivalry out of Spain. Gulliver's travels was a satire written by one of England's greatest wits, and was considered a marvel in its day, but the circumstances that gave it birth, and the times have so changed that it does service now as a child's story book along side of Mother Goose rhymes. These facts are given to illustrate how parables sometimes "sleep in the ear of posterity," as a certain writer has expressed it.

Satire and irony have been common in all ages from the time of the petulant exclamation of the patient Job, "no doubt ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you," by which, as every one knows, he meant something very different from what he said. Other instances of the same nature are found scattered all over the Bible, the best known probably being 1 Kings xxiii. 10, and 1 Kings xviii. 27, this last being the mocking appeal of Elijah to the prophets of Baal, that we are all familiar with. This use of language, for additional force, has been acknowledged in every age and tongue to be legitimate, and in accordance with truth, in fact it is the most powerful manner of using language, and where argument and common sense would be no where, and profound elaboration quite out of place—in fact, pearls to swine—the sharp sting of a little irony finds the weak point in the armor of the adversary, and completely paralizes any attempt at defence.

Most readers are familiar, no doubt with this use of language, by our Lord Jesus in Matt. ix. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," and again, "I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." But his masterpiece in satire was undoubtedly the story of the Rich Man and Lazarus, and it was, like the above quoted passages, a rejoinder to the Pharisees who "were deriding him." Luke xvi. 14. In this story we have a grotesque representation of future rewards and punishments (as we may gather from the words of Josephus) with apparently some side hints at the doctrine of the Essenes, a Pharisee sect of religious mendicants, who took great stock in voluntary poverty. It is not necessary to go over the celebrated story, its extravagance is allowed even by its warmest (least say hottest) advocates. The poor man is elevated to a private box at the everlasting entertainment of witnessing the torture of his old acquaintance and benefactor, and in the most approved Pharisee passing-by-on-the-other-side spirit, he witnesses the entertainment unmoved, with no word for him who formerly supported him. Most readers will recognize what a nut this is. We might mention the close proximity of the damned to the saved (if one can call it saved to have such a hideously narrow salvation as that) and the general grotesqueness and artificiality of the situations. Moreover, there is no God in the story; his name, of course, being too much reverred to be used in this connection by his Son—readers must be very careful to note this—and Father Abraham is substituted as the ruler of the "world of spirits." Keen minds will relish this as another "dig" that must have fallen heavily on "Abraham's children," as they were so fond of calling themselves. Every appeal is made to Father Abraham, and his decision is final, but the full point is not put to the story until the climax is dexterously worked up to the closing ends, which are put into the mouth of Father Abraham himself, "If they believe not Moses and the prophets they will not believe even if one rose from the dead."

Pages of modern literature might be quoted in which the same tactics are employed as is here illustrated, namely, occupying your adversary's position and "throwing," him from his own standpoint, but enough has probably been said, for "I speak as unto wise men."

Besides, the entire isolation of the story, its grotesqueness (which is the stamp of ridicule) the fact that it deals with a theory of future life entirely inconsistent with "Moses and the prophets," (as we all very well know who have it thrown at us so often) and that it does deal with a theory grotesquely consistent with that of the Pharisees, at once explains the story to one sufficiently unprejudiced.

A MORE SURE WORD OF PROPHECY. 2 Peter i. 19, Com. Ver.

The prophetic word more confirmed, equals more firm.—Diaglott. The immediate subject of the apostle is the power and coming, or presence, of the Lord. Hence his reference to the vision on the holy mountain. They were eye witnesses of his majesty—the majesty that will attend him when he comes into his kingdom. In this vision the following facts were brought to Light First, he will come in glory and in power. Second, the prophets will be with him in his kingdom; Moses, who prophecied to and concerning the holy house of Jacob, the 12 tribes, and Elias who prophesied to the 10 tribes or house of Israel. Third, when he comes in his kingdom creation will be put under him. "This is my Son, the beloved; hear ye him."

But this scene upon the mount sheds no light upon the time question, the time when the kingdom of God comes. Hence the exhortation of the apostle to take heed unto the prophetic lamp. The prophetic word more firm, is as a lamp that shines in a filthy place. Upon this lamp the eye must be fixed until the day dawns and bringing light it may shine through into your hearts. First, then, we are to expect the dawn, then the day to follow. The day in question is the day of Christ. This period called the dawn is the transient period from the present dispensation to the dispensation of the kingdom. It is called in Daniel the time of the end. Until the time of the end the prophetic vision is sealed up. The day dawn in question is the opening of the vision, the unsealing of the book. The opening of the vision brings, as Peter said, "light." The light or dawn of the coming day shines through into the heart (mind). Thus the prophetic word is more firm, because when the vision is opened the light shines. Did the reader ever camp out in the open air when on a journey with comrades, and was he ever aroused with the cry from some one of the crowd, "up, for the day dawns"? If not, your servant has been called up more than once when it was yet a long time till day; more than once have I been called up thus when we would prepare and eat breakfast and then sit down to await the dawn of the day and perhaps fall asleep again and not awake until the sun had flooded the world with light. And there is danger that those who supposed that the day had dawned years ago, in waiting, will fall asleep and never see the real dawn.

Waiting begets impatience; looking for developments is a trial, and yet the eye must be fixed on the prophetic lamp. Let us look at the matter in a common sense light. If the vision was sealed until a designated time, it was sealed by divine authority. This being true it could only be opened by the same authority that sealed it up. Until the book is opened we must still be looking for the dawn. Until it is opened no one can be sure that we have reached the time of the end. We must bear in mind that all written prophecy is not of its own loosing, and that prophecy came not at any time by the will of men. The sealed up vision of prophecy must be loosed or opened by the same agency that bound it. Go thy way Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed until the time of the end. Prophecy came not by the will of man; holy men from God spoke as they were directed by the Holy Spirit. If the reader desires to know how the words referred to above were sealed up, let him consult Rev. x. The fact is, the words referred to in Dan. xii. were not written. If not written, they were effectually sealed. But says one, words were written by Daniel. This is true, but other words were withheld from him; for proof see the following: "Then heard I but I understood not. Then said I, oh, my Lord, what shall be the end of these wonders?" The answer is, "Go thy way Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed to the time of the end."

We are forced then to look to the time of the end to find these words, or the answer to Daniel's question, "What shall be the end of these wonders?" This we can only learn when the vision is opened, and these words which belong to the time of the end when we get them will loose those written words of the vision. Yet we should not sit as judges and condemn those who have made premature reports concerning the end. Their zeal doubtless led them to believe what they proclaimed. But these premature reports have a bad effect and tend to bring the advent into contempt. But it is bad also to say, "thy Lord delays his coming." One thing I, for one, am sure of, the period called the time of the end is not as long as many have supposed. The reader must bear in mind that falsehood moves faster than truth, because it has more advocates, hence the world is flooded with incorrect interpretation of prophecy. Books and tracts have multiplied until their name is legion. As the preacher said, "in making many books there is no end." If one had to glean the facts of prophecy from all these books, what a task it would be. The mass of these book makers have stumbled into one common pit. This they have done by their efforts to find in the past the fulfilment of many prophetic events that are future. Many events that belong to the time of the end, by a mystical interpretation are placed in the past.

Don't be offended if I name some of these things. The opening of the book that was sealed, the sounding of the trumpets, the testimony of the two witnesses, the first, then the seven last plagues, the 42 months of the beast's power, the prophetic message by the messenger to the churches. Now if space is allotted for these lines in THE RESTITUTION, I propose, if God wills it, to give proof that all of the above events are future. Falsehood moves faster than truth. it has more advocates and less time to move in than truth. Truth will be vindicated, because all time to come will be here. Let the reader keep his eye on the prophetic lamp until the day does dawn and the light shines in his heart.

CONTENTMENT.

Contentment spoke—"Go rule thy will,
Bid thy wild passions all be still,
Know God, and bring thy heart to know
The joys which from religion flow:
Then every grace shall prove its guest,
And I'll be there to crown the rest."

FUTURITY.

"The earth, as it moves in its orbit from year to year, maintains its distance of ninety-five millions of miles from the sun; and the sun, except when seen through a hazy atmosphere, at its rising or its setting, seems to be of the same magnitude—to human view an object always small as compared with our own world. But suppose the earth should leave its orbit, and make its way in a direct line toward the sun. How soon would the sun seem to enlarge its dimensions! How vast and bright would it become! How soon would it fill the whole field of vision and all on the earth dwindle to nothing!

So human life now appears to me. In earlier years eternity appears distant and small in importance. But at the period of life which I have now reached, it seems to me as if the earth had left the orbit of its annual movements, and was making a rapid and direct flight to the sun. The objects of eternity, towards which I am moving, rapidly enlarge themselves. They have become overpoweringly bright and grand. They fill the whole field of vision, and the earth, with all which is the common object of human ambition and pursuit, is vanishing away!"—Albert Barnes.

THE BRIDE.

Who is the bride? The entire and glorified church is the bride, the Lamb's wife. To the bride it is "granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen, is the righteousness of saints"—theirs, not by earning, or purchase, or self-elaboration, but by gift. "Not having mine own righteousness," is the testimony of these whole church triumphant.

Can human pen now describe what will then be the church's beauty and blessedness, when she shall stand forth, clear as the sun, fair as the moon, clad in the robe the Lord giveth her?—How mean was the cloak of golden tissue that Dionysius sold for a hundred talents, in comparison with this mantle, so divinely resplendent! When one of the seven angels saith, 'Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife,' who does not feel like swooning with John, and like exclaiming with Augustine: O heavenly Jerusalem! Our common mother, the holy city of God, thou beautiful spouse of Christ, my soul hath loved thee exceedingly, and all my faculties are ravished with thy charms. Oh what graces, what glory, what noble state appear in every part of thee!"

"He lifts me to the golden doors!
The flashes come and go!
All heaven bursts her starry doors,
And strews her lights below,
And deepens on and ope the gates
Roll back, and far within
For me the heavenly bridegroom waits,
To make me pure of sin.
Through ages of eternity,—
In glory deep and wide—
A light upon the shining sea—
The Bridegroom with his bride."

"And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb."—A. O. Thompkin.

THE KINGDOM.

When Jesus was on earth as a man of toil and sorrow, the kingdom was his chief theme, when teaching the people; and he instructed his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come." When he was about to endure the cruel death of the cross, he did not cease to talk of the kingdom. After he rose from the dead he was on earth forty days, and often "spake of the things concerning the kingdom of God." When he was gone to heaven, and had sent the Holy Spirit, his apostles preached the same truths, exhorting Christians to "continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God."

This kingdom, though near, has not yet come. It will come when Jesus comes again. When the kingdom is here, he will be here too,—for he speaks in our text, of being with his people in it. Before he went away he distinctly said, "I will come again." You know Jesus was seen, a long time o from the Mount of Olives, into heaven, two shining ones appeared, and told those who were looking up, that he who had just passed from their sight, would so come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven. The apostle tells us that "Christ will appear the second time." He has already appeared as a servant, and to give his life a ransom for many,—he will appear the second time, as a King, and to give eternal life to those that have served him. He came at first as an infant of days, and he ended his earthly course, covered with the deepest shame; but he will come again in power and great glory.—"Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him."

How unlike the Babe of Bethlehem!
How unlike the Man that groaned on Calvary!
Yet he it is,—that Man of sorrows,
O how changed!"

And when he thus comes in his kingdom, with all his holy angels, and all the saints are gathered to him; it will be a festive or joyous occasion, as the poet has it,

"O that will be a happy time,
When Jesus comes again!"

The Immutable Pledge.

"Because I live, ye shall live also,"—John xiv. 19.

God sometimes selects the most stable and enduring objects in the material world to illustrate his unchanging faithfulness and love to his Church. "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so doth the Lord compass his people." But here, the Redeemer fetches an argument from his own everlasting nature. He stakes, so to speak, his own existence on that of his saints. "Because I live, ye shall live also."

Believer, read in this "word of Jesus" thy glorious title-deed. Thy Saviour lives—and his life is the guarantee of thine own. Our true Joseph is alive. "He is our Brother, He talks kindly to us!" That life of his, is all that is between us and everlasting ruin. But with Christ for our life, how inviolable our security! The great Fountain of being must first be dried up, before the streamlet can. The great Sun must first be quenched, ere one glimmering satellite which he lights up with his splendor can. Satan must first pluck the crown from that glorified Head, before he can touch one Jewel in the crown of his people. They cannot shake one pillar without shaking first the throne. "If we perish," says Luther, "Christ perisheth with us."

Reader is thy life now "hid with Christ in God?" Dost thou know the blessedness of a vital and living union with a living, life-giving Savior? Canst thou say with humble and joyous confidence, amid the fitfulness of thine own ever-changing frames and feelings, Nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me? "Jesus liveth!" They are the happiest words a lost soul and a lost world can hear! Job, four thousand years ago, rejoiced in them. "I know," says he "that I have a living Kinsman." John, in his Patmos exile, rejoiced in them. "I am he that liveth" (or the living One,) was the simple but sublime utterance with which he was addressed by that same "Kinsman" when he appeared arrayed in the lustres of his glorified humanity. "This is the record" (as if there was a whole gospel comprised in the statement), "that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."

St. Paul, in the 8th chapter to the Romans, that finest portraiture of Christian character and privilege ever drawn, begins with "no condemnation." and ends with "no separation." Why "no separation?" Because the life of the believer is incorporated with that of his adorable Head and Savior. The colossal Heart of redeemed humanity beats upon this throne, sending its mighty pulsations through every member of his body; so that, before the believer's spiritual life can be destroyed, Omnipotence must become feebleness, and Immutability become mutable!

But, blessed Jesus, "Thy word is very sure, therefore Thy servant loveth it."

"I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand."—Words of Jesus.

Our Silver and Gold Kept for Jesus.

"Keep my silver and my gold
Not a mite would I withhold."
"The silver and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of Hosts."

There need be no quibbling over the assertion that consecration is not real and complete while we are looking upon a single shilling as our own to do what we like with. Also, the principle is the same, whether we are spending pence or pounds; it is our Lord's money, and must not be spent without reference to him.

When we have asked him to take, and continually trust him to keep our money, "shopping" becomes a different thing. We look up to our Lord for guidance to lay out his money prudently and rightly, and as he would have us lay it out.

The gift or garment, is selected consciously under his eye, and with conscious reference to him as our own dear Master, for whose sake we shall give it, and whose own silver or gold we shall pay for it, and then it is all right.—Havergal.

OBITUARY.

THOMPSON—At her home a few miles west from Plymouth, Ind., Jan. 28, 1885, Mrs. Eleanor Thompson, aged 69 years, one month, and 19 days.

Sr. Thompson—whose maiden name was Fuller—was born in Clark Co., Ohio, Dec. 9, 1815, was married to James Thompson Feb. 16, 1832, and, with her husband, became a resident of Marshall Co., Ind. in May 1839.

As a Christian her life was most exemplary. Under all circumstances she delighted to fill her place in the house of God. In those qualities of the heart, so precious in the Divine estimation, she was a model. Those praised her most who knew her best. Her record is on high, and her last repose is that sweet sleep in Jesus from which the waking will be into immortal and heavenly glories. Funeral services were conducted by the Editor.

ALGIRE.—In Syracuse, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1885, Almeda, M. wife of C. P. Algire, aged 69 years, four months, and seven days.

She was a firm believer in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the anointed, having been baptised into this all-saving name, some years ago, from which faith she never wavered.

Although by this bereavement I have lost a most amiable companion, I sorrow not as others who have no hope; for I believe that Jesus died and rose again, and them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. Blessed hope, soon may it come.

She was a friend to all that knew her, and many who paid their last respects at her funeral, were brought to tears of sorrow.

I was sorry, dear Brother Chaplin, that you could not be here to tell the people what the hope of the gospel is, for they are in total ignorance of it.

C. P. ALGIRE.

[The Editor received a telegram from Brother Algire to attend the funeral, but was sorry to respond that circumstances hindered his compliance with the wishes of our bereaved brother. Owing to the cold weather, the snow obstructions, and the changes to different Rail Roads, it seemed most doubtful about arriving at Syracuse at the time set for the funeral. Brother Algire has our sympathetic prayers in his sad bereavement. There is something so overwhelmingly sorrowful in the loss of a dear Christian companion that God's own language to Ezekiel only seems to meet the case. It is indeed the stroke that takes away the DESIRE OF THE EYES. But the restoration of our loved ones, in the resurrection glory, will be "our crown of rejoicing" beyond the deserts and the tombs. Glad day, we wait thy glorious dawning.—ED.]

BURRICK.—Sr. Lucy A. Burrick, the beloved wife of Bro. Fr. Berrick, M. D., Pastor of the Church of Christ of Buchanan, Mich., departed this life on the 23rd inst.

Our sister commenced to fail nearly two years ago, but through all her protracted illness she was sustained by the never failing presence of her best Friend.

Her father and mother are left to mourn her, the last of their five children. Our sister will be missed by the church, and the community at large. She was ever among the first who remembered the poor, the destitute, and the broken-hearted, who have often felt the warm sunshine of her presence. Her hand and her heart were fully in the work of doing good to poor fallen humanity,—thus did she follow in the footsteps of him she loved. Had she lived until next month, she had been 42 years of age. She has been with us for "a little while," and we trust it is but for "a little while" and we will see her again. Words of comfort by the writer from these words—"A little while." John xvi. 18. W. G. HICKS.

"Gone! and the world to go on as before!
Gone with a smile from the dear homestead door?
Dear faithful heart, to come back never-more!
Oh, sad never-more!

Gone! and the reason will still come and go,
Wreathing her grave with blossoms and snow—
Snow on the bosom that sheltered love so—
Cruel and pitiless snow!

Home to not home, for the dear one's not there!
Dark is her room, and empty her chair!
Now will she rest from her labor and care,
Till that morning is fair.

Sleep, dear one, sleep, with your hands on your breast,
Poor weary hands! they needed their rest!
Dearly we loved you, but God loved you best
He giveth them rest."

WILSON.—In Prospect, New Haven County, Conn., October 13, 1884, Warren Wilson, aged 36 years, three months and eleven days, of convulsions.

His health had been failing eighteen months. During the three last days and nights of his life his sufferings were very great. He bore them in patience. At 6 o'clock at night he quietly fell asleep in Jesus. Over fifty-six years we had lived together in hearts united that death could only part.

The hope of the gospel is my support, when I hear Jesus say I am the Resurrection and the Life, will knowing his promises are changeless, and sure as Eternity's Throne. In a little while those that love him will see him; and sorrow will be, turned into joy. When we heard that gospel that was first preached to Abraham, we believed and obeyed. Brother Hayes immersed us into the one saving name. Br. Wilson was bold to talk of the age to come, return of the Jews, and literal fulfilment of the Bible. He grew in grace and in the knowledge of the truth; he was a Christian, and died in the faith of the gospel.

MRS. D. F. WILSON.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New Year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your accounts, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but act right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER

When sending your remittance that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty five to forty cents to collect each one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

THE INVITED GUEST.

I have the call, my Master
Did'st bid me give to thee.
"That thou dik'st at His table Come feast thee royally."
Then wherefore sulks in anger
At the royally precious draught,
That would quench thy thirst forever,
Were once its waters quaffed?

Would prince of earth feel honored
If wedding feast is spread,
Should'st thou refuse His bidding,
And thou him scorn instead?
And if, to each invited,
Were proffered gifts of love;
A heritable throne, and riches
All the vast and place above;

Long life, and peace, and comfort,
With all that man holds dear,
With landscapes rich and fruitful,
Where naught grows dull and sere?
More wilt thou strange would deem it
Should not thine ill-guided heart
Contented rest and repair.
To stay, to receive and live.

Yet rather gifts proffered,
Were these the invitation,
With glorious, gorgeous sights,
Where suns, like stars of day,
And light that follows morning
Were ever [illegible]
And more of [illegible]
With [illegible]

[illegible]
And [illegible]
Have [illegible]
Then I say me, my heart were ailening
Indeed! Indeed he are!
And sad here of Heavenly,
I could but call for thee.

The work my Master left me,
While he doth absent stay,
How can I slight or leave it,
To other hands I pray?
The earth beside the swell,
Fast beats the glowing steel;
Some throw the magic shuttle,
And others turn the wheel.

The ploughman of the painter,
In patient labor wait,
The envoy does the bidding
Of State or Potentate;
The eager-hired soldier,
Of the early battle knee,
Bids friends and neighbors follow
Where the star of glory shines.

Each servant at his calling
For some dear Master's eye,
Awaits the meed of duty,
In golden bye and bye;
And never once you blame them,
That each set task they do,
With patient hand and beadful,
And loyal heart and true.

Then wherefore turn in scorning
From my glad call away,
To waste in earthly pleasures,
Thy one brief hour of day?
I see thy sin and danger,
O come, be reconciled;
And find the peace and favor
Of thy Father's loving child!

Contrasts.

"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: . . . neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii. 14.

With ambitious desires man enters life in nature, anticipating and expecting success. Each night as the day's experience comes before him in meditation he realized "all is not gold that glitters." This acknowledgment is now indelibly written upon the tablet of my heart. All pearls gathered are not as diadems portrayed them. None of earth lastly that the ideal longing has ever met with the fulness of satisfaction. A sense of "what might have been" remains a phantom of discontent. Each seed to maturing, so carefully watched, its growth pleasant to the eye, full development anxiously awaited. Alas! it equaled not the expectation. Are we not all certain that our life is a fruitless struggle and of our own selves, we can do nothing well. Yea! all things perish, the "things seen are temporal." This is from the original "In dying thou shalt surely die." Who of themselves can say I am satisfied. it is finished rest my heart in Peace; can any be other than of the first experience; all beauty fading from Eden's Promise! in expectancy, realizing the forbidden fruit of good and evil, rejoining for—"As in Adam all die." In my youth I looked at others, caught somewhat of their enthusiasm, followed their experience, meeting as well as they, here and there failure and seeming success, hoping, longing and many times attaining the desired end, was I satisfied, how could I be, when the desired end of every movement onward lacked the principle, the inner power to commune with, for real satisfaction in anything I reasoned that I must start with plastic conception, though in embryo, of the thing desired. I loved my life, all labor, thought and force was for its benefit and is the perpetual motive power of creation and yet the subject is answered fully even by the God man when he says "I of my own self can do nothing."—"The whole creation groaneth," because it has not in itself the power of sustaining what it desires, expects and longs for.

All light illumining this natural darkness, is not of earth, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man. Nicodemus by reasoning could not feel its power. Paul though a Hebrew of the Hebrews was lost to its influence while thinking on Moses and the Law. "Ye must be born (begotten first) of the Spirit." "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son; that whosoever, believeth on him, should not perish, but have everlasting life." I have been found of this life. Simply by believing without seeing. God has manifested himself in my flesh, a new creation begun for me. I can discern Spiritual things, find that which I always longed for (Life) given me to commence to live with, at first a child I loved the sincere milk of the word, have been gradually growing in grace and knowledge, am now able to eat meat. In Christ ambition loses no foothold, anticipation finds full satisfaction for its search. Inasmuch as underlying every earthly advance I have a Spirit information that all things seen are temporal—transitory passing away. This Divine life in me forms a unity of the earth earthy, and the quickening Spirit. In Acts 2 is a poetic power of Christ in me I am made alive. By grace I am saved by faith, and that not of myself, it is the gift of God. The [illegible]

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a message this sends, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him, the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and remission of sins, a preacher to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for admission.

THE DESTINY OF MAN.—PART I.

"AN EXAMINATION OF DR. T. W."

Brother C. C. Walker of Prahran, Australia, forwards a copy of the Melbourne Review, for July, 1882, and writes, "I send you by this mail a copy of the Melbourne Review containing a article on 'The Future destiny of man' by a Church of England clergyman H. N. Wellington, whose name, I am almost sure, appears in a back number of the Christadelphian. I have written to his society at the same time sending a copy of the Review and pointing out to him his position. It would not however, surprise me to find that he is acquainted with the Christadelphians and their literature; indeed, part of p. 17 might have been culled from the Declaration itself. The reference to the Archbishop's logic, I have also noticed, in a back Christadelphian. It is cheering to see even a fragment of the truth set forth by the leaders of the people. But how dark the night! What a strange mixture of apostacy, blasphemy, a general fog there is throughout the magazine. What a scouring must await the press in the age to come. I told Mr. Wellington of brethren Ashcroft and Chamberlin, who offered him every assistance in the way of books. The difficulties are great, but we cannot tell who will courageously face them. At any rate I could not let the chance pass."

MR. WELLINGTON'S ARTICLE.

The dogma of the universal salvation of the human family as taught by [illegible] the ultimate restoration of all [illegible] Christians, and [illegible] next. [illegible] in [illegible] now [illegible] and [illegible] was form- [illegible] the number of its adherents [illegible]y increasing; and this view of [illegible]n's future destiny has been adopted by those who....have discarded the pagan belief of eternal torments for the "wicked" in Tartarus or Gehenna, whilst still clinging to the equally pagan doctrine of the natural or inherent immortality of man: and thus are necessarily and logically driven to the adoption of the belief in universal salvation.

Every Christian man who accepts the New Testament Scriptures as his rule and standard of faith and practice, and who refuses to believe in the eternal suffering of the lost as incredible and unscriptural, but who, at the same time, maintains that man by nature is immortal, that he can never die or perish, has obviously no option but to adopt the belief in the ultimate salvation of all men. His argument is this:—1. That man, being by creation and nature immortal, he can never die or be destroyed, but must live on for ever in a future state of existence. 2. That God, being infinitely just and good, cannot, and will not, consign any man to an endless life, or immortality, of pain and misery as a righteous and equitable penalty for finite sin and disobedience committed by him during his few short years of life on earth. 3. That therefore all men, in all times and in all countries, must of necessity be made the subject of God's redeeming love in their restoration to his divine image, and of everlasting salvation, either in this life or in the life beyond the grave. And, certainly, if it can be shown that man is immortal by nature, so constituted by his creation, we, who [illegible] the terrible and God-dishonoring doctrine of eternal agony for the lost in hell or Gehenna, are bound—nay, compelled—to accept the inevitable conclusion, that all men will, and must, be saved at the last, and that "Tennyson's splendid hope" is not a poetic dream, but a sublime fact.

My object in this paper will be to endeavor to show that the doctrine of the inherent and unalienable immortality of man is a false and antiscriptural doctrine, and can form no part of the Christian's creed. I do not deny that every man is capable of immortality, and that, as a matter of fact, under certain spiritual conditions some men—many men—do certainly attain to immortality (i. e., the divine right thereto—Ed.; but I shall try to show, upon such evidence as we possess, that man is not inherently immortal: that no man is created an immortal being, or an "immortal soul;" and that to live for ever either in a state of happiness or misery, is no necessary part of his nature and constitution, and therefore that the Innocent's "splendid hope" is a mere poetic fiction, having no foundation in reason or revelation.

The theory of man's inherent, or natural, immortality has no doubt been generally, although by no means universally, held as an incontrovertible truth by Christian men in all ages of the Church, but admitting this fact, the question suggests themselves—Whence its origin? on this popular belief? On what evidence has it been founded? How, when, and with whom did it originate? It is useless for writers and preachers on this subject to assert, with equal confidence and recklessness, that "all mankind heathen and Christian alike believe in the natural immortality of the soul of man;" that "there is a common sentiment of all mankind in favor of the constitutional immortality of man, and that "there has existed in men in all ages a natural craving or yearning for a future life and immortality;" and, therefore, man must be immortal. But these statements are mere assertions, and no facts; they are pure assumptions, and accepted by Christian men without investigation and without proof. They are not true, either as regards the ancient or modern heathen, or as regards professing Christians in all ages, but are contrary to the facts of history, to experience, and to the teaching of the Christian Scriptures.

Let me take the ancient heathen first. No doubt, certain philosophers of Egypt, Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome taught the doctrine of the immortality of man; but it was the common opinion in those countries is by no means the case. On the contrary, only a small school of the disciples of these philosophers believed in it, and even of the latter, although they taught it in public, doubted it, or privately, and even publicly, repudiated it..... The most famous and most influential of all the ancient philosophers, and who taught the doctrine of the immortality of the soul of man with the least reserve and the greatest success, was undoubtedly Plato, who lived B. C. 400; and to him the Christian Church is almost entirely indebted for the adoption of this pagan doctrine as an article of her creed; nearly all the Greek and Latin Fathers, and the most prominent of the early Christian writers, being ardent Platonists, who grafted the esoteric philosophy of their master into the Christian system. But Plato's doctrine of immortality was by no means accepted by all his brother philosophers. No one prized the Platonic argument more than Cicero, and yet he says, "I have read Plato's book (the Phædo) over again and again; but, I know not how it comes to pass so long as I am reading I agree with it, but no sooner is the book out of my hands than I begin to doubt whether man is immortal." Socrates concluded his defence before his judges with this remark: "I am going out of the world, and you are to continue in it; but which of us has the better part is a secret to every one but God." The same philosopher asks, as quoted by Plato in his "Phædo." "Can this soul of ours, being such, and of such a nature, when separated from the body be immediately dispersed and destroyed, as most men assert?" which clearly shows that in the time of Socrates "most men" did not believe in the natural immortality of the soul. Aristotle is said, upon the authority of Plutarch, to have held the dogma of the immortality of the soul, and yet, in his "Nichomachean Ethics," Aristotle uses the following language: "There seems to occur to the dead man something both good and evil, just as a living man though he has no perception of it, such as honor or disgrace, or the fortunes or misfortunes of friends." And again, "Death is most dreadful, for it is the end, and beyond it there seems to be for the dead man nothing more, either good or bad." Seneca, writing to a bereaved friend, says "Death is the relief and end of all pain, beyond which our evils do not pass. It restores us to the same tranquility in which we were before our birth." And in another letter he says: "I was pleasing myself by inquiring, yet believing in the immortality of the soul, I could easily fall in with the opinions of great men promising, rather than proving, a most desirable thing. I gave myself up to the splendid illusion, when suddenly I was interrupted by the receipt of your letter, and lost so fine a dream." Pliny says, "The vanity of man, and his insatiable longing after existence, have led him to dream of a life after death. A being full of contradictions, he is the most wretched of creatures, since the other creatures have no wants transcending the bounds of their nature. Man is full of desires and wants that reach to infinity, and can never be satisfied. His nature is a lie, uniting the greatest poverty with the greatest pride. Among these two great evils, the best thing God has bestowed on a man is the power of taking his own life."

These quotations are sufficient to show clearly, from their own evidence, that however much in their lifetime they may have contributed to the promulgation of the dogma of natural immortality in man, and desired to impress it on the popular mind from motives of policy or expediency, five of the most eminent heathen philosophers, Aristotle, Cicero, Socrates, Seneca, and Pliny, died in unbelief—died firmly believing that there was no future life for man; that he is not by nature endowed with immortality; and we have no historic evidence whatever, that in any age of the world, or in any country, this doctrine has been generally accepted or believed in by mankind prior to the Christian era. It was the dream, or the "splendid illusion" of a few philosophers, who, even when they professed to believe it themselves, failed to impress it upon the minds of the heathen; and it was only through its incorporation with the Christian system by the early Fathers of the Church, who were the disciples of Plato, that its acceptance became at all general amongst Christians, although the dogma has never been universally received or accepted down to our own time. It is, therefore, a purely pagan doctrine, which has insinuated itself into the Christian theology through the instrumentality of eminent Christian men into the early days of the Church, and especially of Tertullian and Augustine, who were Platonists, and whose theology has to a great extent moulded that of Christendom.

And if there be no historic evidence to show that the heathen before the Christian era held any such dogma as that of the natural immortality of man, which was only half believed by a handful of philosophers, it is certain that there exists no proof that the heathen nations of the present day either believe that doctrine (until they are taught it by Christian instructors), or have any "longing" or "yearning" for a future life and immortality. We are assured by travellers of repute that there are tribes and nations scattered about in various parts of the world who have no idea whatever even of a God, still less of a future state, and who are quite contented to live and die without the "splendid hope" of immortality. At the present day the Buddists constitute one-third of the whole population of the earth, and they are to a man materialists pure and simple, disbelievers in immortality, and reject all ideas of a future state. The Hottentots and Bushmen in Africa, the inhabitants of the islands in the Japanese seas, of the Indian Archipelago, of Polynesia, of Patagonia, of Australia, and many other heathen tribes and peoples, are at this day just as ignorant, in their savage state, of the doctrine of immortality and a future state, and have as little care or "yearning" for these blessings as the pagan populations had in the time of Plato and Socrates, of Seneca and Pliny. It is, therefore a mere assumption, utterly unsupported by fact and experience, that "there is a common sentiment of all mankind in favor of the natural immortality of man," and that all men possess an instinctive "craving" or "yearning" for immortality, at least as regards the heathen generally, who have almost as little perception or thought of the immortality of the soul and a future existence, and who live and die just as happily without this belief, as the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air.—Christadelphian.

A Visit to the Palestine Colonies.

A correspondent thus writes to the Jewish Chronicle:—

"I have now completed my first tour in Palestine, having visited Jaffa, Ramleh, Jerusalem and neighborhood; Bethlehem, Bethsaay, Jericho, Dead Sea, River Jordan; central Palestine, including Nablous, Samaria, Sasur, Dothan, Jenin, Beisan, Sjeim, Nain, Mount Tabor, Nazareth, and across the plains of Esdraelon to Haifa. From the latter town I passed down the sea coast by Athlit, Tantura, and over the plains of Sharon to Samaria; thence to Cæsarea Palestina, and returned by the plain again to Haifa.

"At Jaffa I visited the colony of Rishon-le-Zion. Rain prevented me inspecting the other colonies in this district. I spent about three hours at Rishon-le-Zion, and found the colonists numbered 23 families, and 120 persons all told. The colony owns 3,360 dunums of land, the cost of which was 42,000 francs, 23 houses have been erected at a cost of 40,000 francs: 14 stables, 11 of stone and 3 of wood, complete their list of buildings at date. One well, 42 metres deep, is completed, and a second well is in progress, 23 metres having been so far dug out.

"The land is fairly fertile. About 2,000 dunums are under cultivation with wheat, barley, kitchen vegetables, etc.; vineries are being planted, and the remainder of the land was ploughed almost for seed being embodied in the ensuing summer.

"The colony also possesses 24 horses, 2 cows, 4 sheep and 6 mules. Of the total expenditure in the colony, the colonists themselves have subscribed 33,000 francs for the land, the cost of the two wells and six of the buildings or dwellings. The remainder has been borrowed chiefly through the good offices of M. Ermanger, of Paris.

"The colony of Petach Tikva possesses 14,787 dunums of good, fertile land, the cost thereof being 83,100 francs. While the land is fertile, there are some marshy plots in it, from which much evaporation takes place, spreading fever and sickness at certain portions of the year. The situation of this colony would be unhealthy until these marshes are dried up in cultivation and plantation. The land is divided into two parts, at a distance of one hour one from the other. The first portion is situated at the village of Emlabes, and the second—the lesser part—at the village of Yahoud.

"One-third of the land at Yahoud is sown with wheat and barley; the rest, with the exception of a small plot still uncultivated, is sown with sweet melons, kitchen vegetables generally, and summer produce. There are six stables, a synagogue, one well, one pool, one bath-house, and seven new dwellings, with some decayed dwellings, the remains of the former unsuccessful colony. The colonists also possess 10 horses, 14 mules, 8 oxen, and 5 cows. The colony comprises 67 families, numbering 107 souls, of whom 37 perform the agricultural work of the colony.

"I paid a visit to Samarin, staying over two nights in camp on the colonists' ground with their kind permission. I found this colony situated on one of the South-Western hills of the range of Carmel, in a very healthy bracing situation, very fertile land, well supplied with three main springs of continual flowing water. This colony was started about eighteen months ago, the land comprising 6,000 dunums, being bought from the French Consul in Haifa for 46,000 francs. A good part of the land has been cleared of useless growth, and is now covered with wheat, barley, beans, kitchen produce, a number of olive, orange, grape and other fruit trees; a good wagon road has been made through the estate, and two wells have been made for collection of part of the water supply. The colonists number about 300 persons: the male working portion reside on the estate in temporary erections; their families remain in Haifa, pending the erection of permanent dwelling houses.

"The colonists wished me to say that they were now doing very well, having nothing to complain of, and are very hopeful that within five years their labors will be rewarded with success, and by that time they will be free from debt. They also informed me that the colony at Rosh Pinah, which I was unable to visit from Nazareth, on account of stormy weather, are now doing well, the aid extended to them by M. Ermanger has raised them from their previous precarious condition, and that they now believe that they are also on the road to an early attainment of success."

The Atmosphere.

The atmosphere rises above us with its cathedral dome arching toward the heaven, of which it is the most familiar synonym and symbol.—It floats around us like that grand object which the apostle saw in his vision: a "sea of glass like unto crystal." So massive is it, that when it begins to stir it tosses about great ships like playthings, and sweeps cities and forests like snowflakes to destruction before it. And yet it is so mobile that we have lived years in it before we can be persuade it exists at all, and the great majority of mankind never realize the truth that they are bathed in an ocean of air. Its weight is so enormous that iron shivers before it like glass, yet snap-balls sail through it with impunity, and then the tiniest insect waves it with its wings. We touch it not, but it touches us: its warm south wind brings back color to the face of the invalid; its cool west winds refresh the fevered brow, and make the blood mantle our cheeks; even its north blasts brace into new vigor the hardened children of our rugged clime. The eye is indebted to it for all the magnificence of sunrise, the full brightness of mid day, the chastened radiance of the gloaming, and the clouds that cradle near the setting sun. But for it the rainbow would want its triumphal arch, and the winds would not send their fleecy messengers on errands round the heavens. The cold ether would not shed its snow-feathers on the earth, nor would drops of dew gather on the flowers.—The kindly rain would never fall—hail, storm, nor fog diversify the face of the sky. Our naked globe would turn its tanned, unshadowed forehead to the sun, and one dreary monotonous blaze of light and heat dazzle and burn up all things.

Were there no atmosphere, says the "Quarterly Review," the evening sun would in a moment set, and, without warning, plunge the earth in darkness. But the air keeps in her hand a sheaf of his rays, and lets them slip through her fingers, so that the shadows of evening gather by degrees, and the flowers have time to bow their heads, and each creature space to find a place of rest and nestle to repose. In the morning, the garish sun would, at one bound, burst from the bosom of night, and blaze above the horizon; but the air watches for its coming, and sends at first but one little ray to announce his approach, and then another, and-by-and-by a handful, and so gently draws aside the curtain of the night and slowly lets the light fall on the face of the sleeping earth, till her eyelids open, and, like a man, she goes forth again to her labor till the evening.

UNTO THE PURE ALL THINGS ARE PURE. Titus i. 15.

The doctrine set forth in the text is the natural fruit of a pure heart. There is a sweet resting place in Jesus, who is the truth, the way, and the life. This state is attended with an unwavering confidence in the promise of God, that whatever circumstances surround them it is intended for their present benefit and future glory; working out for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at things which are seen, for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal. Therefore such are told by the divine word that "all things work together for good to them that love God." Rom. viii. 28.

With this pure spirit we are commanded always to rejoice. If in wealth and brought low or in poverty and have been exalted dungeon or [illegible] by the foul tongue of slander and severely persecuted, he is told to "rejoice for great is his reward." Matt. v. 11, 12. His thoughts are pure and consequently as from the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, his words are pure, he shrinks from the appearance of evil, he never asks the question what harm is there in this or that conversation or in this or that work, but the criterion by which he decides is what good is there? can I glorify my Heavenly Father? does his word approve of it? will my saying this or that or doing this or that enlighten some wanderer from God to return? will it raise up the bowed down or bind up the broken hearted or give to any a desire to seek a pure heart? It is said that the philosopher turned all matter that he touched into gold. This is fiction, but a pure heart enables its possessor to profit by all the events of life and to have the promise of seeing the Father's face. Matt. v. 8.

If this be true, how necessary that we obtain this treasure of grace. All may have it, for Paul says, "His servants ye are to whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, whether of sin unto death or obedience unto righteousness." Rom. vi. 16. Such as the pure in heart will be glad when they see the Master come and say, "Lo, this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." Isa. xxv. 9. But how painful to record the condition of the impure ones! Paul says unto them that are "defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure, their minds and consciences are defiled, while they profess to know God, but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient and to every good work reprobate." Titus i. 15, 16.

Dear wandering ones, your Creator does not want you to stay in the dark room of unbelief. He has provided light for you and a pure heart comes with it. Christ is the one that lighteth every man that comes into the world. Will you accept him now? Oh, do not turn him away! He has waited upon you a long time to give you this light. Beware lest he swear you shall never enter his rest.

I close by repeating the following verses:

Sometimes by preaching sinners are
They're doomed to death eternally;
To serve the Lord they then agree,
But oh, their wicked company
Entice them on to ruin.

Sometimes by visions of the night
God does their guilty souls affright;
They tremble at the awful sight,
But often with the morning light
Pursue their way to ruin.

Sometimes when nothing else will do,
Affliction does their danger show,
And brings the haughty sinners low:
Then they'll repent and pray and sow.
But turn again to ruin.

When every means is tried in vain,
God's Spirit strives no longer with them,
But full of guilt and fear and shame,
Death strikes the blow—the sinner slain,
Falls ripe for endless ruin.

Oh, sinner, turn, long time you've stood
Opposed to truth and your own good;
You may be saved through Jesus' blood—
Lay down your arms, submit to God,
And thus be saved from ruin.

Oh, sinner, neighbor, friend or foe,
The terrors of the Lord we know;
Come, tell me friend, what will you do?
We'll never consent to let you go
To everlasting ruin.

Editor Restitution:

I send a communication for your excellent paper, if you deem it worthy. I wrote just as I looked at myself once and at myself now. Oh, how blessed the salvation from sin appears! I am longing, hoping and anticipating soon to see Jesus. May God bless you and all workers in the vineyard with patience, experience and hope. I will try and send you a little money soon. I wish to say here, to others may be informed as to sending money in letters, that it is very risky, although I have again and again and always met with success until last October. I enclosed a column of reading matter cut from a Massachusetts paper, a scientific lecture by Prof. Townsend on the near approach of Jesus on principles in astrology, etc., developing; it was a grand article and I knew you would be glad to republish it. I enclosed a two dollar bill with it, but immediately on mailing it I had a presentment that you would never receive it. I did think I would not mention it, but for others who may risk I make it known to you. May God bless you and yours. Yours brother in Christ.

THEIR SILVER AND THEIR GOLD.

No doubt we are in the perils of the last days; the apostle James say, "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl, for your miseries that come upon you, your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth eaten. Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days." James v. 1-3. See also 7-8-9. verses.

The prophets of God have also told us of these days; Zephaniah i. 11, says, Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh, for all the merchant people are cut down; all they that bear silver are cut off. Verses 17-18 say: And I will bring distress upon men, that they shall walk as blind men, because they have sinned against the Lord: and their blood shall be poured out as dust, and their flesh as the dung. Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath; but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; for he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land. See Ezekial vii. 17-18-19. All hands shall be feeble, and all knees shall be weak as water. They shall also gird themselves with sackcloth, and horror shall cover them, and shame shall be upon all faces, and baldness upon all their heads. They shall cast their silver in the streets, and their gold shall be removed: their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord: they shall not satisfy their souls neither fill their bowels; because it is the stumbling block of their iniquity.

Joel says, Let the weak say, I am strong. The working class have been considered the weak; but from all parts of the country we can hear of the working men arming themselves, ready for war, they are going to assert their rights.

Amos says, viii. 4-5-6 verses. Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying, when will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat....that we may buy the poor for silver. See also verses 10-11. Then will come the famine; not for bread nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord. The rich men that are hoarding up their gold and silver, in abundance will cherish it until it is too late to redeem themselves. They will cast their money into the streets but still it will not save them.

Dear brethren, we can certainly see that we are in the last days; there is no time for hobby riding, or speculation, we want to lift up our voices and warn the people; if we don't God will require their blood at the watchman's hands. I find in my travels a great falling away from the truth; the love of many is waxing cold. I have never in my short time of serving the Master saw a time when there was more need of earnestness in the cause of truth.

We want to say as Paul did; Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. To-day if you will hear his voice harden not your hearts. We want a present gospel preached to the people. I wish the brethren were more in earnest. Those who have the means should help those who go out to proclaim the truth. The preachers can't do it all. The cause wants help; sinners are dying in need of the truth, and shall we withhold it from them? If we have the truth, let us stand up for it. Stand, says Paul, and having your loins girded with truth. Yours in hope. J. S. HATCH.

The Washington monument has already been turned to a scientific use. Professor Simon Newcomb has been using the top of the monument for measuring the velocity of light, and believes that he has attained more accurate data for estimating the distance and magnitude of the sun. The velocity of light is measured with a degree of accuracy never before obtained. Professor Newcomb tells a reporter of the Philadelphia Times that he thinks the error in his calculations can not exceed one four-hundred-millionth part of a second. It is quite possible that these and other uses of the unsightly pile on the Potomac may render it beautiful for usefulness, and therefore a fit monument of Washington

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Feb. 11, 1885.

ONE of the worst snow storms of the present winter has been raging for two or three days past. It has extended over Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Northern Illinois, as well as Northern Indiana. It has caused a great deal of delay in rail road travel, and mails are very irregular.

OUR readers are already aware that Khartoum has been captured by the Mahdi's forces, and that the situation of the British troops, composing the advance column sent to aid General Gordon, has become exceedingly precarious. Extraordinary activity prevails in England for sending reinforcements to Egypt without delay to avert new disasters.

THE Jewish people, though suffering miseries almost beyond endurance under Eastern despotisms, do not degrade themselves to the level of brutal savagery in retaliating upon their oppressors, persecutors and despoilers by destroying public buildings and murdering children and innocent persons with dynamite explosions. They have a civilization, religion and national nobility that elevate them above engaging in the work of fiendish assassination. A Jew so bereft of humanity and true patriotism as to become a murderer of the innocent, would be branded as a "Son of Belial." The foundations of a stable, independent government can never be laid by a horde of assassins. Before being qualified to govern a people men must know how to govern themselves. The principles of righteousness will never be triumphant in this world till the heavens rule on earth.

THE CHRISTIAN'S OFFICE.

The terms employed to portray the official functions of "the called in Christ," are the loftiest, mightiest and most honorable, known. In ancient Israel the king and priest took distinguished precedence over the nation. Thence, the full significance of these terms, descends from the Old to the New Testament. "Unto him that loved us—and made us kings and priests unto God and his Father," Rev. i. 5, 6; and "we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 10; xx. 4–6; xxii. 5.

They are constituted "a royal priesthood, and inherit the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world," Matt. xxv. 34; 1 Peter ii. 9, all to become reality at the second coming and in the kingdom! Dan. vii. 18, 27; Ps. cxlix.

Note. The priest, in type, was washed, anointed and anointed. In antitype he is baptised and anointed with the Holy Ghost—Gal. iii. 27, and taken on "the name and righteousness of God by faith of Jesus Christ (which is) unto all and upon all who believe." Rom. iii. 22. Again, without the priest, there was no (legal) sacrifice or remission; no sacrifice without the altar, and no altar but by divine appointment, for the temple worship.

Now without crowding a single item we may see that the transition from the Mosaic to the Christian order of priesthood, altar and sacrifice, was easy. Several of the elementary types are blended in Christ, our great High Priest; and reverence should constrain us to accept the record with its divine confirmation. Thus, our "altar sacrifice of the Lamb of God—his flesh and blood" (in symbol) centre to us in the Lord's Supper service.

Israel had access to God and acceptance in worship through and by their priesthood, altar and sacrifice.

Thus Christians—though only "two or three," find "Jesus—the way, the truth and life." Hence he says: "No one cometh to the Father but by me." John xiv. 6. This then opens our way to God. Nay more, this invests the Lord's Supper with profound importance. Nay, it seems essential in our approach to God! "For through him we both (Jew and Gentile) have access by one Spirit unto the Father." Eph. ii. 18.

However, the entire system of the temple worship belonged to Israel as a nation—"a kingdom." Of course the present Christian order of worship is provisional and preparatory to the round coming and kingdom of Christ! Amen.

"The world knoweth us not; because it knew him not."

All priestly pretension of royalty and splendor now—Papal or Protestant—is presumptuous. "The cross," is our present badge of distinction. But in the kingdom to come our promised crown, inheritance and immortality will become an eternal reality!

Brother Kramer's discourse yesterday suggested this brief. If we have not strength to report, but the Lord's Supper was invested with a dispensational interest that few Christians seem ever to apprehend. It is, so far, the out-growth of the ancient worship and way to God's blessing "till he comes." J. B. COOK.

The Appointed Heir of All Things.
Heb. i. 2.

This preference above all others is because of the relationship that he sustains to him who made the appointment. He, by inheritance, obtains a more excellent name than they—that is the angels. To which of the angels did he ever say, sit at my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool? To which of the angels did he ever say, thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee? He makes his angels spirits, and his public servants a flame of fire; but to the Son, thy throne, O God, is forever. We thus find the more excellent name which he inherits—it is God. In the appointment the throne and the kingdom are vested in this name—God. Thy throne, O God, is forever.

This name Jesus inherits because he is the only begotten Son of God hence kingdom of God. Thou art the anointed, the Son of the living God. But the throne and the kingdom is not all that is vested in him by appointment, for the Lord appoints men priests that are frail. But the word of the oath which was since the Logos, appoints the Son who has been perfected forever. Heb. ix. 26. The word of the oath vests the throne and priesthood in him; the one rests upon the same basis that the other does, that is the word of the oath. And as the oath vests the throne in the name—God—so also the priesthood is vested in the one name, God. This relationship to the Father is not by appointment. The one name comes not by appointment, nor by adoption, but by inheritance. By the appointment the all things were vested in the one name, God. The names given to him such as the following, Jesus, Messiah, word of God, Lamb of God, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, denote office, but the one name that he inherits, God, denotes deity.

This one name is called upon others, see Acts xv. 17; written upon them, see Rev. xiv. 1. It is called upon them in the act of adoption. It is written upon them in the act of sealing. But Jesus inherits it. But some one may say that his great name is given to him. God hath given him a name that is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, etc. But this great name is written upon him, King of kings and Lord of Lords. It is written in the appointment concerning the throne, all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him. But it is written upon him who by inheritance obtains the one more excellent name, God. But if the "all things" was vested in him by appointment, how may others become sharers with him in the all things?" Answer, by entering into covenant or joint relationship with him. This may be termed the marriage covenant. When this is completed the two become one; jointly vested in the all things.

We now enter into the open door of this covenant and if we are approved in the end we then in fact are the heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ. But heirship to us is based upon this relationship to him who is the appointed heir of all things. Thus we see the grace of the Lord Jesus, that although he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor that we through his poverty might become rich. As long as the door of the marriage covenant is open others may enter, and, in the issue, become sharers with him in the "all things." When this door is closed he will place the church by his own side, a glorious church not having spot or blemish. As he promised the little flock he will receive her unto himself. But I must close lest I become tedious. This was written on Christmas, 1884. How many more Christmas days before the church makes herself ready for the marriage.

J. O. KINSEY.

Report of Conference.

According to previous appointment, The Church of God in the Abrahamic Faith met at the Winchester School House, to enjoy their first quarterly conference, and although the weather was very cold and stormy, we had, as we expected to have, a good meeting. The church at Fisher three miles from there, true to their recent vows of love to God and loyalty to his cause, were nearly all present, several from Waterman, and other parts were present. Bro. Smith of Otsego opened the meeting with prayer, and prayer was a prominent feature of the whole meeting. Between the different discourses the congregation would retire and build up the tabernacle of David, and "this Lord God will give him the throne of his father David." If you think that the purpose of the gospel is to convert the world, just start and convert Glasgow, and let us see what was never seen before—a whole city converted to Christ.

That the world will not be converted before Christ comes, is manifest from his own words "When the Son of Man cometh, will he find faith on the earth?" Why he will find nothing else, if the world is to be converted before he comes! "As it was in the days of Noah so shall it be when the Son of Man cometh." What was the condition of the world in the days of Noah?

Let me take you in imagination to the scene of the Ascension when he was about to leave them. "He led them out as far as Bethany, and while he was blessing them he was parted from them." Earth suspended its law of gravitation to let him rise; heaven stooped to welcome him to his throne, and a cloud received him out of sight. Two angels said, this same Jesus who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go." He went away personally, and so shall he return: He went away visibly, he shall return visibly; and in that day his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives. Zech. xiv. 4. All who believe in him will be caught up to meet him: the idea of the word translated "meet," is that of meeting with a view of returning.

Our orthodox friends say that this will be a day of judgment, a day when the books will be opened, and the dead small and great receive a recompense for the deeds done in the flesh. But the word "judged" means to rule. Samuel "judged" Israel 40 years, but he was not always judging, or trying prisoners—he "ruled" Israel, and God has appointed a day in which he will "rule" the world. The burning will come, but subsequent to the millennial advent; there will be a period of blessing for a thousand years; then a rebellion, culminating in the destruction of the armies of Gog and Magog. The purpose of his coming will not be to destroy the world, but to reign over it, and let it be understood that not only redeemed men, but the whole creation shall share in the general joy. The whole creation is groaning and waiting to be delivered from the bondage of corruption, but if he were coming to burn up the world, creation would hardly be represented as waiting and longing for his coming. But from the whole creation goes forth the prayer "Thy Kingdom come," and we who are waiting and watching for his coming join in the universal prayer and say, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."—*Burlington B. ## Selections

"THE PURPOSE OF HIS COMING."

The title of this Association is "The Conditional Immortality Association," and it might be asked, what connection exists between that title and our subject matter this evening. The connection is clear yet simple; life, the gift of Christ, cannot be manifested except through resurrection or translation, and that no one will the Lord grant again Paul) then believers die, and safe gathered, wait in restful sleep. Sleep implies the continuity of personal being, for that which does not exist cannot sleep. Sleep is a state of inactivity, but we shall be satisfied when we awake in his likeness. If the theory were true, that when a man dies he passes at once into all the activities of heavenly life there would be no necessity for a resurrection: we could hardly say that he would be wakened up bye and bye. The Scripture affirms that the condition of the dead is that of sleep, and the awakening will be when Christ comes, when "this mortal shall put on immortality" and a world of glorious beings be born in a day. It will be an instantaneous transition, one moment tenants of the grave, and the next caught up "to meet the Lord in the air."

All Christians believe that Christ will come, but the popular idea is that Christ will not come till after the millennium; and that the world will be converted by the preaching of the Gospel, before he comes. But where is the commission given to the Church to convert the world? We have never been able to find it.

But the conversion of the world will not be accomplished by existing instrumentalities. At the present rate of conversion it will take 144 000 years to convert the world to Christ. A religious census was taken some time ago and it was found that only one out of every hundred attended any place of worship; while 30 years ago it was found that 50 out of every hundred attended some place of worship; so there is a falling off instead of an increase. That is a strange way of converting the world when Christianity is not actually holding its own against modern indifference and scepticism. When the result of that census was published, the Ministers said, "This will never do, we must get up something to make the people attend, to attract them to the house of God." So they got professional singers to sing solos; and gave musical services, and used these and other tactics to swell their attendance. But what would be thought of a Gospel which needed such means to make it attractive? Just imagine a case. Paul and Peter are going to preach, and Paul says to Peter, "We don't seem to be doing much good, let Dorcas or Phœbe get up and sing a solo!" Would such a Gospel have survived the first century? If it had come down to us at all would it not have come down to us covered with contempt? If the object of the gospel was the conversion of the world, then the infidel's taunt is true that Christianity is a failure; and no wonder that the sceptical writers of to-day, represent Christianity sitting in the crypt of her own crumbling temple and trying in vain to support its falling columns. The object of the gospel in the present dispensation, you will find in Acts xv. 13 18. "And after they had held their peace, James answered, saying, Men and brethren, hearken unto me: Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written, after this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." This accords with the words of the prophet Amos ix. 11.

This gathering out of the people for the name of the Lord may finish today, or to-morrow; it is a secret known alone to God; and when it is complete the dead in Christ come to life, and the rest return and build up the tabernacle of David, and "this Lord God will give him the throne of his father David." If you think that the purpose of the gospel is to convert the world, just start and convert Glasgow, and let us see what was never seen before—a whole city converted to Christ.

That the world will not be converted before Christ comes, is manifest from his own words "When the Son of Man cometh, will he find faith on the earth?" Why he will find nothing else, if the world is to be converted before he comes! "As it was in the days of Noah so shall it be when the Son of Man cometh." ### BIBLICAL RESEARCH.

The brilliant discovery of the biblical Pithom and the Greek Heroopolis, at Tell el-Maskhutah, by M. Naville, of the Egypt Exploration Fund, to whose care he was led by monumental indications, and the unerring judgment of a true Egyptologist, is now seconded by a remarkable finding of the Greek site, Naucratis, on the part of Mr Flinders Petrie, at Tell en-Nebireh, a spot mentioned at the general meeting, in October last, as, to a high degree, promising of important results. It lies shortly northeast of the railway station of Tell el-Barud, west of Tanis, south of Sais and Rosetta, and close upon the edge of the Delta. The recovery of this vast site has long been greatly desired, not only because it figured as the sole emporium of the Greeks in Egypt under the reign of Amasis (Amasi-Nem-ses) B. C. 571, a period of great commercial prosperity in Egypt, but because it was the locality of that "very spacious and celebrated temple in Egypt, called Hellenium," which was the common property of many great cities contributing to its erection and establishment, and which appointed officers for the regulation of their traffic. The identification is due to one of the Greek inscriptions of the Ptolemaic age, belonging to the spot, giving the name in the first line, and revealing the fact that Athens also had a temple there. The tell or mound is almost wholly composed of Greek pottery of all ages, thus marking a settlement extending from the reign of Psammetichus I., B. C. 664, to the Roman times. The Fund is pledged to investigate alike Egyptian, Biblical, and Greek problems, and the first trophies of this winter season's work lie in the direction of classical archæology. After sufficiently exploring Naucratis, Mr. Petrie will renew his work at San, toward the thorough examination of which a certain part of the society's funds are specially reserved; M. Naville, meanwhile, steadily pursuing his researches in the Land of Goshen. The Fund is also going to the Fayûm and, as a recent circular states, "reading the question of the ruins of Hawara, the position of the labyrinth, and the site of the lake Moeris, and will excavate the pyramid of Hawara, and the adjacent mounds, which are believed to cover the remains of the labyrinth, and the palace of the twelve kings." Besides the exploration

"Only A Beggar."

A maiden with a thoughtful brow,
Sat in her home, where wealth and pride
Had poured in free, exhilarant store,
Their choicest gifts on every side.

As [illegible] the golden strings
[illegible] the "Book of Books" [illegible]
The story of the Nazarene,
[illegible] not where to lay his head.

"My Master!" she whispered low,
[illegible] by [illegible] mighty, Pharisee!
Would I had seen him in those old days,
What I [illegible] for Thee!

[illegible] to be My servant, Christ!
[illegible] to spread the name of My repose,
[illegible] the world, way more than [illegible]

[illegible] the maiden stood in [illegible]
[illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] heart,
[illegible] [illegible] a little more,
Church [illegible] world and work.

The pitiful [illegible] in words and tone,
Heaped [illegible] the sunken cheeks,
The [illegible] was cold and thin.
[illegible] had all cold, and thin.

[illegible] gasped the crowded street,
[illegible] him the door,
[illegible] [illegible] more."

A lady she was—proud of birth and wealth,
[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible],
Kindly [illegible] [illegible]," she [illegible]
"Unclean!" and spurned him [illegible] the street."

An' little thought that maiden fair
That Christ had been to her that day,
And she not knowing what she did,
Had spurned the Blessed Lord away.

THE DAYS IN WHICH WE LIVE.

An Introductory to "Elenish."

We live in momentous times, when truth of all kinds is unfolding more rapidly than in any previous age of the world's history. More discoveries seem to be made, and more events transpire now-a-days, in a decade, than in a century of the olden time. The human mind was never so vigorously at work as it is now in every direction, in Science, Art, Literature, Politics, and Religion. These are the days foretold by an ancient seer—"the time of the end"—when 'many shall run to and fro, and knowledge be increased' (Dan. xii. 4). Whether this refers to [illegible] or to something else, it is evident that never was there so [illegible], nor facilities for it, [illegible] nor has there ever [illegible] known-[illegible] graph, the printing [illegible] newspaper, and of the [illegible] many persons have of late been going to and fro exploring the various terra incognitas, or unknown regions of the earth; and great spaces that were blank upon our maps not many years ago, are beginning to get filled in. Men seem bent to know all about the world they live in, and the globe is being explored, first in one part, and then in another, by many enterprising travelers, who brave the greatest dangers for the sake of enlarging the bounds of human knowledge and geographical discovery. It seems strange, that man has been on earth these thousands of years, and is not acquainted even yet with all the surface of his habitation. Yet such is the fact. However, so many are the researches now being made, and so great and ramified the extention of European commerce and colonization, that it bids fair to lead, ere long, to a completion and perfection of geographical science, and a filling up of all the blanks in our atlases at no very distant day. The discoveries of Ross, Parry, Franklin, Kane, and others, in the Polar regions; of Mungo Park, Bruce, Lander, Denham, Barth, Speke, Burton, Du Chaillu, and, above all, the indomitable Livingstone, in Africa; and of Palgrave, Anderson, Vambery, and others, in Asia, have vastly contributed to this end, mostly in the present generation.

Not whilst there is a charm in perusing almost any book of travel and discovery in new regions, trod for the first time by the foot of civilized man, there is also an equal, if not even a greater pleasure in having those old and glorious countries opened up afresh, and, as it were, re-discovered, which were once so famous—the seats of the mighty kingdoms of old, the cradle of the human race, and the stage on which were enacted all the wondrous deeds of ancient story, both of sacred and profane history. In these countries, which were the best-known to mankind, there is now much need of exploration, though this may sound very strange. The reason is this. Those regions, which were once so fair and flourishing, are now comparatively in a desolate and depopulated condition; and the seats of empire, commerce, and learning which were once situated there, have been transferred chiefly to the more Western climes of Europe and America, whilst a night of semi-barbarism has long since settled down upon these ancient lands, and they are all as yet in this state of collapse and decay.

But since this century opened, and especially within the present generation, a change has begun to come over them. Slowly, but surely, they seem to be awakened from their stupor and death-sleep of ages. Many diligent explorers have been of late years engaged in the work of re-discovering to us those glorious old regions of the Orient which were the scenes of earliest history—namely, Western Asia and North-western Africa; Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Arabia, Persia, Assyria, and Asia Minor, which are emphatically 'The Lands of the Bible.' These lands are among the first on the face of the globe, and are now attracting the notice of Christendom more than ever since the era of the Crusades—that epoch of the fiery outburst of European fervor, chivalry, and [illegible] action, whose object was to wrest the 'Holy Places' out of the hands of the infidels,' and finally failed because 'the set time to favor Zion' had not yet come.

Several scientific gentlemen, whose minds are also enlightened to a considerable degree by Scripture, have turned their observations to the illustration and confirmation of Holy Writ. There has been quite a succession of travellers and explorers in the East. Of these, the labors of various eminent officers of the British army, as well as some of other nations, acting as surveyors, together with the journeys of missionaries and private persons, of whom there have been a host—have made us better acquainted with the topography of these Eastern lands than we have been at any period since their decline. Thus Colonel Layard opened the 'Overland Route' to India; Colonel Chesney surveyed the Valley of the Euphrates, Lieutenant Wellsted and his companions surveyed the shores of Arabia, and the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf; Lieutenant Lynch, of the American navy, the Jordan and the Dead Sea; as have several others also; Belzoni, Lepsius, Seyfarth, Wilkinson, and other eminent Egyptologists, have explored the Valley of the Nile, and the monuments and the tombs of Egypt; Layard, Botta, and Major Rawlinson have made the tablets and ruined palaces of Nineveh and Babylon [illegible] with a mighty voice in confirming the statements of Scripture in reference to the pomp, pride, and power of its first of earth's great states, the old Assyrian and Chaldean empire. Of missionaries, writers and travellers, may be mentioned Drs Hareley, Robinson, and Thompson, Messrs. Bonar, and Lord Lindsay, of America; Dean Stanley, Wilson, Kerr, Porter, Dr. Stanley, Irby and Mangles, and a host of others since the days when Volney and Lamartine led the way, when it was more perilous than it is now. Niebuhr and Burckhardt penetrated into the deserts of Arabia, and Palgrave has lately brought a fresh interest to bear on Northern and Central Arabia. The sites of places long lost are being continually recovered, and scarcely a season passes that does not bring some new points of discovery or further information about the old. All these are indicative of a keener interest in the East, and are conducive to a livelier and sharper relish for Biblical and prophetic study than the dull and heavy tomes of previous generations could furnish. Those who are not privileged to gaze with their own eyes on these scenes can yet profit at home by the labors of others who have seen and noted, and have sketched with pen, pencil, and camera those famous sites. Thus we reap the labors of those who have gone forth and gathered, whilst we can stay at home and read, and ponder on the strange recital.

The result of all this is a great impetus to Biblical study, and a constantly increasing light upon its various details. Never since apostolic times has so much Biblical information been elicited as in the last few years, since the principle of literal interpretation began to be more acted upon, and to obtain a preference above the old spiritualizing and perverting method of our fathers, and even yet, we grieve to say, of most of our contemporaries. And the light will continue to shine more and more the closer we stick to this true principle, and the more faithfully we adhere to the plain and natural sense of Scripture.

Some think the famous text in Dan. xii., which we have quoted, refers to the diligent study of the Bible itself, and especially of the department of prophecy. As they understand it—'Many shall run to and fro' over the page of inspiration and of prophecy: and as a result of their pouring over it, and researches therein, 'knowledge shall be increased,' as well upon the meaning of Daniel's as of other prophecies.

Whether this be the meaning or not, it is being strikingly fulfilled in this respect also; for never, since the first ages of the church, was there so much attention paid to the prophetic word, as it is receiving now, or so much light been shed upon it as of late years. It is beginning to attract attention even amongst men in high stations; for peers and noblemen have written treatises on it—as, the Earl of Carlisle and the Duke of Manchester, Captains Hudson and Baker, Major Philips, and Lieutenant General Goodwyn—and many clergymen of the English Church, and especially of its Low portion, are going more and more into its study, whilst the more corrupt part of that Church has been gravitating nearer and nearer to Ritualism, Romanism, and to deeper apostasy from divine truth.

Never before was prophecy fulfilling, or about to be fulfilled, on so vast and sublime a scale as is our own times, upon whom the end of the age has come. To its beacon light it behoves all who are wise to take good heed, that they may be able to correctly discern the 'signs of the times;' for they have an important bearing on our welfare both as a nation and as individuals. The sure word of prophecy shines brighter and clearer day by day; for from the silent recesses of deserts and rocks—witnesses are springing forth out of the dust and oblivion of ages, to give their testimony clear and loud as trumpet tones to the truth of God's Word. It is refreshing to see the unfoldings that are now taking place, and which put to silence the ignorance of 'foolish men,' who are ever and anon raising their 'oppositions of science, falsely so called,' for all true science is confirmatory of the Scriptures. To us it is a significant token that we are living in the 'last days,' when the book shall be opened that was to be sealed till the 'time of the end'—(Dan. xii. 4, 9)—till that momentous era should come round in the revolving cycles of ages, when 'the vision shall speak and not lie'—(Hab. ii. 3). What else can all the vast and rapid developments of recent times foreshadow, if it is not that we are approaching the advent of the mightiest changes and revolutions that earth has ever seen?

Yes, the day of the redemption of the glorious old Earth, and its raising up to far more than its former glory, is drawing rapidly near. Movements are already in progress, and others soon will be, that will lead to this result. The march of events, eastward, must exercise a material influence on this nation, as well as others. One of these 'signs' is already beginning to manifest itself in the check that will be given, for a time, to our recent unprecedented national growth and prosperity. Another sign will be the raising up of the East to more than its ancient glory and renown. That will shortly cease to be a true saying. The tide having reached its utmost western limit, will soon begin to ebb, and roll its waves of glory back to their original starting-point in the far distant Orient. It is shortly destined to be delivered from Moslem misrule, and receive the reviving breath of a new commercial, social, and religious life. Especially will this be the case as regards one of the most central regions—Judea. A most glorious destiny is in reversion of it, as will shortly be seen.

The efforts of the 'Palestine Exploration Society,' so ably conducted by Captain Wilson and his staff, of the Royal Engineers, furnish a striking illustration of the text in Ps. cii. 13, 14. 'Thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof'—that is, of Zion. The opening of the Suez Canal is a sign of the reviving of Egypt and the East, and may in itself be a thing presaging events big with importance.

This political resurrection to greatness, of these once renowned and sacred countries, will be chiefly due to their re-peopling with a better and more enterprising population than most of their present races are; and especially by the re-settlement there of their ancient nationalities. To these lands the streams of emigration will presently be turned, and this revulsion must have an important effect on us. Foremost of these returning exiles, stand the Jews and the Twelve Tribes of Israel, who have so long been outcasts from their beloved 'Fatherland,' and doomed to dispersion among all nations. A mighty and permanent change in their character and fortunes is about to transpire, and they will soon be restored both to their ancient home and to Divine favor, and become 'the chief of the nations,' and their country 'the glory of all lands.' Their industry and enterprise will soon transform the wastes of Judah and Syria into blooming verdure. 'Almighty shaking of the heavens and the earth' will also co-operate with the labors of man in reclaiming the now barren wastes, by 'cleaving the land with rivers,' causing numberless fountains and streams to gush forth till 'the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose;' whilst the genial rains shall descend, and the seasons become regular and delightful. Then, blest with the smile of heaven, it will become 'the perfection of beauty,' and lovely as was the Garden of Eden. In fact, it will be Eden restored—the second Paradise!—a heavenly country'—though situated on earth, where angels shall again hold converse with men, and where immortal beings will dwell as their special inheritance. It will become the abode of a Divine Ruler, whom God will send forth to bless all nations, after delivering them from oppression and superstition. He will give a new religion and code of laws to the world, that will put a quietus on its strife about politics and theology forever; and make wars to cease to the ends of the earth' by conquering a peace. A new temple for the worship of universal man will be erected, to which 'people and tribes of every tongue' shall assemble, and where 'the brotherhood of nations' will be a realized fact. A vast city will be built adorned with gold and precious gems, as the befitting metropolis of the whole earth, and the abode of the Divine Ruler and Pontiff of this then universal kingdom and Theocracy. These structures will be the most ample and magnificent that ever existed on earth. 'Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good-will towards men' will then and there be realized, and all nations therein be blessed and saved. The days of miracles and mighty signs in heaven and earth will return, and all species of infidelity and ignorance disappear before the manifestations of 'the terrors of the Lord,' by their demonstrating the existence and active government of an Almighty, wise, and benevolent God.

With the details of these attributes and wonders pertaining to this great central land and people—the 'sure word of prophecy' is full of the most glowing descriptions. The things above hinted at are not idle fancies, but will soon become sober realities—matters of fact and history.

'The time is at hand,' when these things shall transpire. The light of prophecy is unfolding fast, and blessed indeed are those across whose devious pathway its holy gleam is thrown, for the advantage it gives them over the rest of their fellow-mortals in great, and of inestimable value. Being forewarned they are forearmed, and if also morally prepared for that great and awful crisis in human affairs which is so rapidly approaching, their position is indeed a happy one. Therefore let all who would stand among the Scripturally 'wise,' all who have any regard for God's Word, and a sincere desire to understand it, and all who have any concern about their own and their country's future welfare, avail themselves of all the means of obtaining true light thereon which they possibly can get.—George Dean Wilson.

The Spread of Islam in Africa.

Dr. Barth, after living for five years among the Islamized countries on the southern border of the Sahara, predicted that Mohammedanism was destined to spread far southward, unless Christianity stepped in to dispute the ground with it. Recent French and German explorers in the region of the Upper Niger and the Benue Rivers say that Barth foresaw what is actually occurring, for the religion of Mohammedism is making rapid progress among the African races north of the equator. Tribes that have heretofore had no common ties or sympathies are now knit together by the bond of Islam. Some tribes have become inspired with the fanaticism of their Mohammedan neighbors who converted them, and south of Darfur they were at last accounts fighting under the green flag of the Mahdi, against the little army of Lupton Bey.

The European influences that are getting a foothold in West Africa, so far from retarding the advance of this religious movement, appear in a measure to be aiding its progress. For every missionary in the Congo region, probably a hundred Houssas are employed there by the International Association. The Houssas, who are all Mohammedans, are among the most skilful and industrious of African peoples. Their fertile country is just south of the Sahara, and their cotton cloths and leather goods are sold all over the Western Soudan. Many of them have been drawn to the Congo by offers of employment in the service of the Association, and it was recently reported that the Association intended to muster 3,000 Houssa soldiers among its Congo stations to fill the roll and show the natives how men of their own color can work and thrive. Thus European enterprise seems to be accelerating the southward march of Mohammedan influences.

The Arab traders who have established themselves at all the most favorable points for trade from Zanzibar to Nyangwe, nearly 900 miles west, are very jealous of the missionaries, and do all they can to prejudice the natives against the white man's religion. It was their influence that induced M'tesa to withdraw his favor from the agents of the Church Missionary Society and to openly espouse Mohammedanism. The missionaries would have been expelled from Uganda had not M'tesa's envoys to England returned with such wonderful stories of the white man's country that the politic despot thought it wise to keep on friendly terms with his guests. He now interposes no obstacle to the mission work, though he still professes to be a Mohammedan.

Northwest of Uganda the Deinka, Nouer, Dembo, and Mandala tribes, whom Petherick and Schweinfurth found to possess no other religious notions than their ancestral fetichism, are now the professed followers of Islam. Late in 1882, imbued with the fanatical spirit of the Mahdi, they revolted against the Egyptian control which Lupton Bey was placed in the Bahr el Ghazal province to maintain. Early last year he was collecting a force of Egyptian and Niam-Niam soldiers with which he expected to crush the revolt.

Northeast of Uganda the large territory inhabited by the Gallas and Somalis is so completely permeated with Mohammedanism that no Christian explorer enters it except at the peril of his life. More than half the travelers who have visited these countries of late years have been killed, and the others have been unable to get far within the border, though they say Mohammedans can cross these countries unmolested. The powerful Mussulman society known as the Senoussians has turned the Gallas and Somalis to Islam. This fraternity, the most successful of all the Mohammedan propagandists, has its monasteries and wields a potent influence from Morocco to Mozambique. It is believed to have encouraged the pres-enterusade in the Soudan and to have instigated the murder of many of the French, German, and Italians explorers who have perished in the Sahara and the contiguous countries on the south, and in Galla and Somaliland within the last twelve years. Henri Duveyrier, who recently gave an account of the brotherhood, says it has made ferocious bigots of thousands of blacks, who formerly welcomed intercourse with the whites, and were peaceable and simple-minded natives.

The growth of Mohammedanism is now attracting the particular attention of geographers, and anthropologists, and of all who are interested in the moral and commercial development of Africa. In some districts it is, without doubt, endangering the peaceful advance of commerce. There is reason to fear that, unless it is checked, the fanaticism that it begets may some day seriously affect the white enterprises in Central Africa.—N. Y. Sun.

Help.

The world is full of labor,
It toils in weariness;
You cannot bear its burden,
But you can make it less.

A little child is trying
To lift a heavy load;
Go help the helpless toiler
Along the weary road!

A poor old friendless woman
Is tottering on alone!
Her trembling strength has failed her,
Go offer her your own;

Though little be the action,
He hears the Lord shall greet
And his shall be the whisper!
"Ye did it unto me."

—Charles F. Richardson.

The Child's Question.

A touching story is told of a little girl in San Francisco, who was recently run over by a street car. When the poor child was picked up it was found that one of her limbs was nearly severed from her body, besides other serious injuries. She was carried to a hospital, and the crushed limb was taken off. The little girl bore the operation remarkably well. As there appeared to be little chance for her recovery, the surgeons concluded to let the other limb, also badly damaged, remain. The mother was with the child immediately, and did for her all a mother could do. The little one was under the influence of anodynes most of the time, and of course slept a great deal. The day following the accident, as she was dropping off, she exclaimed; "I'm going to sleep." Then noticing the temporary absence of her mother, she added, "but who'll wake me?" The sleep into which the little sufferer was sinking, was the sleep of death, and the touching question was the last utterance of her pallid lips.

"Going to sleep." Ah, yes, we are all going to sleep! We know not how near we are to the borders of the shadow land where mortals sink into their last slumber. We expect nothing else than that our little lives will be rounded out with a sleep. Every night we drift out into a realm of mystery and dreams, and know not whether we shall return to the dawn of an earthly day, or not. But how quietly and confidingly we lay our heads upon the bosom of Providence, close our eyes, and drop the oars of our little life-boat, to drift, we know not whither, to wake, we know not when or where.

'Going to sleep.' but not forever. Fear not, little child, to fall asleep in the twilight hour of life. You shall wake again! You shall not forever sleep the hour of rising! At the set time, when the great bell of eternity shall strike the morning hour, the blessed Lord Jesus will come and say, "Come, children, it is time to arise! The morning has come!" "All that are in their graves shall hear my voice and shall come forth."

"Going to sleep." and yet, not All. Paul, looking down the stormy ages to the morning hour of eternal day, says: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." Then shall the sleeping saints awake, and all together they shall be caught up to meet their glorious Lord in the air. What matter then, whether we wake or sleep, only so we are in the Lord.

Thank God for the assurance of everlasting life! We can go down into the narrow house of the dead with the victorious faith, seeing that we know some One will wake us in due time, and that we "shall be satisfied when we awake with His likeness." A better life awaits us. Its dawn greets our gazing eyes. There shall be no night there. No toils, no pains, no tears. All hail, sweet homeland of the soul!—Evangelical Messenger.

ADELAIDE, OULE Co., Ill.
Jan. 21, 1885.

Dear Children.

While on my voyage from England to America, we had a very rough passage, having been on the ocean then six weeks, the Captain said to me we are nearing land now, I asked him how he know, he said, see this poor little land bird, it has been seeking a long time for some place to rest, and being over exhausted for want of food, it died when it touched the ship's mast. This thought having crossed my mind perhaps it may not prove unprofitable to write about a little bird which was of peculiar interest to the Great Jehovah.

Among the countless variety of beautiful birds with their splendid plumage, could you imagine that God would choose the little timid, harmless dove? it is somewhat different from other birds, for its instinctive nature seems to possess no cunning, it is a defenceless little creature, incapable of protecting itself, or its young, its tongue is entire, or undivided, and when absent from its mate it sits solitary, and coos or mourns, it is a remarkable fruitful bird, some of them must be exquisitely beautiful, as one whose name signifies "Beloved" says, "her wings are covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold; he also desired to have "the wings of a dove."

According to the law given by Moses the dove was reckoned among the clean, but the eagle, and tall, swift ostrich, with her handsome feathers was among the unclean, and none but the clean could be offered to the Lord, to make an atonement for sin. The first place the dove is mentioned in the Scriptures is, when he whose name signifies "Comfort or rest," sent her forth from the Ark, in order to get intelligence whether the waters of the deluge were gone off from the earth. He, first sent a raven which was unclean, its nature could never be satisfied, and probably he who sent her forth, thought if there was a morsel of food, she would be sure to gather it, it never returned to the Ark, but went to and fro continually without rest, or food. But not so with the dove. When it was sent forth it sought forth every where for a twig where the sole of its foot may rest, but finding none, it came back to the Ark, and the tender hand of comfort, or rest, drew her in. From the window he was watching her return, and the tidings she conveyed was that the waters were on the face of the whole earth. After seven days again she is sent forth, and in the evening she came flying to the window of the Ark "and lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off," this gave assurance that the waters were abated. What consolation this evergreen leaf plucked from a new world afforded him who had sent her forth, what a sweet emblem of peace; a leaf from a tree full of sap, and golden oil for light. Precious little dove, it did not go to and fro, as the unclean, restless raven, neither did it remain on the tender branch of the olive, as though it were weary of its home, but joyfully returned with something like a letter in its mouth, which gave comfort to him who stretched forth his hand and caused her to come in. The Mother of Jesus brought two doves which Jehovah commanded should be the poor woman's sin offering. Although she was poor she was of the royal parentage a princess of the house of David, or "Beloved." The High Priest was to take one of the birds and pinch its head off with his nails, so its death was caused by the pinching nails of the High Priest. This dear children, shadowed forth the way our Lord should be put to death, for it was the High Priest who said, "Take ye Him and crucify him," or pinch his flesh with nails until he dies. The knife was to pierce the other dove, but it was not to be divided asunder, Lev. i. 16, margin. When Jesus was thirty years old, he came to one whose name signifies "The grace or gift of God." desiring to be baptized in the river which signifies "judgment," or he that rejects judgment. When he saw Jesus coming to him for that purpose, he said, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me; and Jesus said, suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness; then he suffered him. "And when Jesus was baptized, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and resting upon him, precious Jesus. He was the Eternal Spirit's mate, the Father's heavenly Dove, the only one born of woman that the Holy Spirit could for ever abide with, but even this heavenly testimony was not sufficient, His dear Father's voice was heard to say, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." How unlike Adam of whom the raven was a figure, the Father's Dove with an undivided tongue spoke a joyful message of peace to a world deluged in sin. He was harmless, no guile, or deceit was found in his mouth, only the olive branch of sweet peace plucked from his Father's green house of eternal truth. Children beloved, among his blessed words of life, there is a message for you. "Be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

Your affectionate Teacher,
E. COPPMAN.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New Year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but not right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER

When sending your remittance that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty-five to forty cents to collect each one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

O Faithless Heart!

O earnest heart, that would be true,
O man, O life that would'st be pure,
The peace of Christ is made for you
But patiently you must endure.

Yes you must see the storms and storms,
And feel the smarting stings of life;
And tired, weary, sore perforce
Thy duties through each bitter strife

The calm alone, cannot be thine,
Nor able be fair always for those;
Thy debts cannot be pleasure's wine,
Nor thornless flowers around thee be.

O tired S[illegible], go from each home,
He knows thy pains, feels [illegible]
A [illegible] shall [illegible]
Shall fade before Eternal Morn.

A dispatch from St. Petersburgh, Russia, says: "The founder of the sect of New Israel at Kishenef has been murdered by orthodox Jews. The sect is under government protection, having accepted Christ as the Messiah."

An enormous snow-slide occurred lately in the mountainous province of Corinthia, in Austria, which buried in an instant the portion of Klagenfurt which lies under the Alpine foot-hills. On the upper slope it was found that many habitations were utterly swept away. Twenty-five corpses were found, many of them stripped of their clothing and horribly mangled. Terrible accounts of the loss of life continue to come in.

Russia threatens to beat the United States as an oil producer. As yet it has but 115 wells in the Caucasian region, against 20,000 American wells, but the average product of a Russian well is sixteen times as great as of an American well. The oil beds of the Caucasus are said to be absolutely inexhaustible, and are disposed in horizontal layers. In 1877 their production of oil was 30,000 tons, and in 1882 1,000,000 tons.

The saltpeter beds of Nevada are far better situated for the development of their deposits than the nitre region of South America, which is a desert entirely devoid of water and all vegetable life, and where the development can be accomplished only by surmounting many difficulties; the provisions of the miners have to be transported from long distances; the water supply for all purposes is condensed from the ocean water and carried to the nitre fields, while fuel has to be procured from the mountains in the South of Chili. In Nevada, we are told, the saltpeter deposits are in the vicinity of a rich farming country, with an abundant supply of water and wood close at hand, and the nitre can be furnished at prices considerably cheaper than that by which the South American article can be obtained.

The people of California are rejoicing in the prospect of the development of the valuable quarries of Alaska. San Francisco alone imports annually about $4,000,000 worth of marble, one-quarter of which comes from Carrara in Italy. The price, however, is so high that they have been looking forward eagerly to the formation of a company for the purpose of opening up the trade nearer home. The United States Coast Survey party of 1867 reported that marble had been discovered in inexhaustible quantities in Alaska, and two years later samples sent to Washington were examined and found to be of a very fine quality. A ledge has been located by a company just formed, and operations will be commenced at once. The ledge is only ten feet from the water's edge, and, as there is never any ice in that locality, ships will be able to land at any time of the year.—San Francisco Bulletin.

The problems waiting for solution in regard to Jupiter are almost without number. Telescopists are never weary of studying on his disk. New lines of his varying belts, dots on his surface, changing tints, bright spots near his equator, rifts in his cloud atmosphere, occultations and transits of his moons and shadows are scanned by eagle-eyed observers, accurately mapped by skilled draughtsmen, and laid away to swell the huge pile of observations which, one of these days, when the Jovian alphabet has found an interpreter, will reveal the process of world-making going on in a planet so huge in bulk that his primeval fire still burns. The great red spot, visible for years on Jupiter, has come and gone. Its appearance was a mystery, its disappearance is equally unaccountable. It left behind an unsolved problem, tangible proof of the equatorial acceleration of the planet. For the bright spots near the equator made a circuit around the planet in five minutes less time than the great red spot that was 10 degrees from the equator. In precisely the same way, the spots near the sun's equator complete a revolution in less time than those nearer the poles. Here is another link connecting the central luminary more intimately with his lordly son, and including his developments within the bounds of solar mysteries. When we find out the reason why the equatorial sun spots move faster than the polar sun spots, then we shall learn why the Jovian bright spots moved faster than the great red spot. We shall probably be convinced at the same time that the regal planet is far more in the condition of the sun than his less massive and less richly endowed brethren. How many ages must roll on before the dawn of the day of certainty succeeds the long night of theory?—Providence Journal.

M. Bonbonnel, the celebrated panther slayer, writes from the hunting lodge Bouira, Algeria, under date 22d inst. out: "For two days past we have been in a second Siberia, for thirty hours we had a terrific thunderstorm, with lightning and hail, and afterward still cold, with a perpetual downfall of snow the plain as well as the mountains are perfectly white, and the clouds are still full as to second. I see no end to it. During my forty years' experience of Algeria I have seen nothing like such weather. I have seen certainly the Aures Mountains covered with snow, but never the plain here. While I write by a fire I can not get my hands and feet warm. I send this off, but do not know if my Arab will be able to cross the river."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Many villages in Italy have been overwhelmed by avalanches during the past few days, and the loss of life is terrible. Most of the accidents seem to have occurred in the province of Cuneo. At Frassino the number of killed is now put at 140; many have been killed at Valgrana; forty-two have been killed at Bareis. The village of Rabasso is almost completely buried under the snow. Scores of people have been killed there, and over 200 men, women children are wounded and homeless. Fifteen houses at Chiamosto, in Piedmont, are buried in the snow. The cries of the buried people can be distinctly heard, and 2,000 soldiers are endeavoring to rescue them. Lamonts, in southwestern France, has been partly destroyed.

Editor Restitution:

I find in talking with people that there is a large percentage, of the enlightened, well informed class, that are more or less skeptical as to the inspiration of the Bible. This skepticism varies in degree. Some will not credit the story of the fall, and some portions of the Old Testament. Others reject the Old Testament altogether; and others still cannot believe in the Divinity of Christ. But strange to say all these people believe in the immortality of the soul. In this doctrine they seem to have unbounded faith. Now if you ask an orthodox Christian from where he derives his knowledge (?) of the soul's immortality, he will answer unhesitatingly,—from the Bible, and most of them honestly believe the Bible so teaches. Again, if you ask one of the skeptical class from whence he derives his knowledge or on what he found his belief in this dogma, he will most likely be unable to point you to any other source, and many of them will tell you that this knowledge comes from the Bible.

They seem never to stop and think that in these attacks on the credibility of the Scriptures, they are sapping the foundation of the superstructure, to which they cling with such tenacity, and yet it seems to me, that if they would for once take time to soberly consider the matter, and carefully take their bearings, they would find themselves in this attitude. Oh! strange inconsistency. Oh! wonderful infatuation to reject the foundations and retain what they believe to be the superstructure.

And many of them reject not only the foundation but all the unlovely parts of the superstructure. They have erected for themselves a beautiful habitation, without foundation—a castle in the air. An Elysian field in which every thing is lovely, and the attainment of which is certain. No narrow road through self-denial lies to that fair realm. At death the soul set free, must enter there. It is thus the seductive voice of the tempter, ever whispering in the ear "Ye shall not surely die," lulls to sleep the heart and conscience of his victim, till without a resisting struggle he is swept over the Niagara of oblivion.

Some I find base their hope of future life on the yearning of the soul, for something higher, purer and better, than it finds in this world's vain hope.

"[illegible] can no man lay,
Than that [illegible]
He whose [illegible] other way.
A thief and robber."

I have a sceptical friend whose brilliant mind I much admire. He has many beautiful thoughts, which he sometimes beautifully expresses in verse. In conversation with him the other day he gave me his poetical definition of Inspiration, which by his permission I subjoin.

In so far as it relates to the inspiration of poet, painter, sculptor, sage and minstrel, I agree and admire.

My dissent from the concluding thought of the poem I have endeavored to express in the same measure. I can but regret that what I deem the better thought, had not for its advocate, the better poet.

INSPIRATION.

The living Rose of Inspiration,
That ever blooms on man's immortal mind
And brings revealings, from the home of thought;
Of brighter things, than e'er are seen on earth

The poet lights his mystic lamp,
At this chrysothean flame,
And on the magic page of song,
He leaves a deathless name.

It wins a Raffael's humble soul,
And lights his beaming eye,
And lo! the speaking canvas glows
With things that never die.

Beneath the sculptor's hand of skill,
The cold dumb marble [illegible]
Of some celestial soul of love,
Where flame of unity dwell.

By it the sage's lofty mind,
[illegible]
And of the far off [illegible]
Where flame of unity dwell.

It falls upon the mortal face,
And wakes the rhythmic strings
That trembles to the notes of love,
In which the angels sing.

"Tis this that gives to man on earth,
His hope; his hopes; his fears;
That lights his face with heavenly [illegible]
And melts his soul to tears.

'Tis this that fills his yearning soul,
With glowing thoughts sublimary;
Of scenes far brighter world than this,
Beyond the mists of time.

THE ROCK FOUNDATION.

Say, boy, my friend!
Do not the yearnings of the soul,
Alone—on which we fall,
The current flows a life to know,
"Beyond, the mists of time."

A sure foundation, God has laid,
A sure foundation of us;
And he on Rock is fixed and,
And builds on it, a race.

And tells us, on his sacred page,
This life is in his Son;
Those in faith in him, in every age,
The victory must be won.

The yearning we, his Son he gave,
That we this life might have;
And gain a triumph o'er the grave,
With him he alone can give.

The hope, to man, a heavenly bearer,
Of things, glad and good,
The promises of God He sure,
They have for ages stood.

He [illegible] the world and conquer death,
Through him, the promise sweet;
We are the weary captive free,
The poor and lowly feed.

He suffered death upon the cross,
And in the tomb lay down;
But God, the Father, raised him up,
And gave to him a crown.

All [illegible] power, to him,
In heaven and earth he gave,
That all may freely trust in him
Nor dread his power to save.

A life each God, he will bestow,
And on the earth [illegible]
And with his saints, his throne he'll share,
Eternal life they'll gain.

The throne of David he'll set up,
The tribes of Israel bring,
And Judah too, from nations round,
And he will be their King.

My faith in him, we pardon find,
If we forsake our sins,
Obeying with a willing mind,
His precepts [illegible]

He living rose, who once was dead
Alive forever more,
He holds within his mighty hand
The key from death to rise.

He bids his people all rejoice,
For he will surely come,
His death, his [illegible]
He will unbar the tomb.

The yearning soul its answer finds,
And satisfaction sweet,
In loving him who first loved us,
And paid the ransom great.

'Tis on his sacred promise sure,
And on these truths sublime;
I build a hope of life, secure,
"Beyond the mists of time."

Brother Chaplin, I feel a little hesitation in sending the above, but beg you will treat it as you think best. I believe I never before seriously essayed to write poetry, but it was my desire to answer my friend that caused me to make the attempt.

THE TRIAL OF FAITH.

A Funeral Sermon, preached by Nathaniel Starkey, at Moberly Chapel, Hollinwood Pond Road, on Sunday Nov. 16, 1884, in memory of the late Mrs. Lemmy.

"Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver: I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction" Isa. xlviii. 10.

"That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than that of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ" 1 Pet. i. 7.

When God wants a man he is sure to find him, for he makes him. When God designs to make men of us he educates us in the school of affliction. Abraham with promises but without heir, in the ascent of complaint said, "Behold to me Thou hast given no seed." Jacob, when called to part with son after son, cried "All these things are against me." Joseph, cast into prison wrongfully, said, "I have done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon." Job, in the bitterness of his spirit, cried out, "Why hast Thou set me up for a mark against Thee? The arrows of the Almighty are within me." Moses cried out to God, "The people be almost ready to stone me." Elijah said, "I am left alone and they seek my life to take it away." And so has come from age to age, to Israel as a nation, and to the believer individually, this word, saying, "Behold I have refined thee, I have chosen thee in the furnace."

One faith is here at once invited to the speaker as Jehovah the Omnipotent One, who when he takes in hand a nation or a man, it is for the purpose of grace, and says, in effect, "I have chosen thee that I may refine thee, I have appointed the furnace and appointed thee there that I may refine thee therein." Trouble there is of its kind, and many kinds, common to all men as sinners. "Man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upwards." But this refining process is when God takes in hand his own people, and, for purposes of grace to them and to others also, fits them as instruments for his work, according to that word, "Thou art My servant, I have chosen thee." (Isa. xli. 9) and again, "Even every one that is called by my name, I have created him for my glory: I have formed him, yea, I have made him." Isa. xliii. 7.

2nd. "But not as silver," is the reading of Rotherham's version, and it is better as contrasted with the refining of gold; for elsewhere we read, "The fining pot is for silver and the furnace for gold" Prov. xvii. 3, the fining pot being the lesser, and the furnace the greater test of severity. Now, God accounts his people gold, and so puts them through furnace processes. "I have chosen thee, not as silver in the fining pot, but as gold in the furnace, I have chosen thee. I have chosen the furnace, and I have chosen thee to be therein for thy good and My glory."

And what for? "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ"—which is the next portion of our text. So, then, God's people, in the trial of their faith are accounted much more precious than gold which perishes. Faith endures, faith abides, and those who walk by faith, and endure in faith, shall abide when silver and gold, together with all other perishable things, shall have perished and passed away. We may observe that the New Version reads, "the proof of your faith," but this word is hardly satisfactory, for it is the faith that under trial, being proved, stands the test, continues proof under the severest test, and comes off in triumph, that becomes accounted by God much more precious than gold which perisheth. And why? Because it makes the possessor rich, when gold, together with all this world's glitter, shall have vanished, even from memory.

This is the coin that shall be accounted the current coin of the Redeemer's kingdom, bearing the image and superscription of the King of kings and Lord of lords. Shall we, then, flinch from the minting process? When those bright coins are placed in the Sovereign's hand, as samples of some new coin for Her Majesty's approval, think ye they would if they could, regret any one of the severe processes through which they had passed to fit them for that presentation?

And such a time of presenting must come to us now soon, for our faith is to be "found unto praise and honor and glory" at his appearing, when he shall present to himself the Church, a glorious one, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but holy, without blame or blemish, clothed in fine garments of salvation and the robes of righteousness, and the triumph of their faith declared in the welcome, "Well done good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Then shall be brought forth and manifested many who have been lightly esteemed, not by the world only but their brethren too, but whom he has not been ashamed to call his brethren "poor in this world, but rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him."

Such was my honored and lamented friend and mother, your late pastor, the late minister of this church and congregation, spoken and thought lightly of by those who least well knew him and his work; but honored, reverenced, esteemed, and loved by those who best knew him and his work. Of him verily, and as truly as of any other son of Adam's race, it was true, as the language of his God and Father, "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction."

So marked was God's choice of him in that furnace, that his trouble was, in a sense, born before he came to his birth. Let me give it you in his own words, written some thirty years ago:

"About three months before my birth, my father was startled by the intelligence that two traders in whose hands he had deposited the fruit of thirty years' hard labor by land and sea, had become bankrupts, and fled the country. A crew of five dockyardmen perished in the wreck of the ship which, with all on board, was engaged in the same undertaking. Two of the young men who thus suddenly found a watery grave were brothers, nephews of my father, over whom as their father was dead he had exercised a parental guardianship. From respect to their uncle they had volunteered this hazardous service.

"I pass to hear the shock of these tidings: my mother's health gave way, and three months afterwards I was born; the feeblest of infants. Had not my father been possessed of a strong will, at once chastened and encouraged by submitting faith in God, he had quailed, when at this time life with him had passed its meridian, in the presence of such sudden and complicated trials. But the equanimity of his spirit was undisturbed, and he formed the habit of positive gratitude under all circumstances, so that at all times he literally obeyed the precept, 'In everything give thanks.' For thirty months of my existence," he adds, "I was too weak to sit up, and could only lie in my mother's lap, or on the bed, and may then frequently given up for dead, or to die."

But this weakling in nature developed into a man in grace, and his life-work as a minister of the Gospel, and a voluminous author, has yet to be known for the satisfaction of his friends, and for the confusion of his—critics, I must call them, for enemies he had none, nor could have. His ministry, commencing at Chipping Sodbury, in Wiltshire, continued at Dorset, thence at Kennington, and thence at Ware, became completed here in a settled ministry and pastorate for seventy years. What a Gideon, bearing the precious treasure of truth, as he saw it, because none knew fully but himself and his God; and if asked, "Why burden yourself with testimony to many some and unpopular views?" his one answer would have been that of Peter and John: "We ought to obey God rather than men."

And for his adherence to truth in this light, and those many books that, for half a century, have issued, from the press, as the fruit of an able and over-active pen, both the world and the Church have been vastly benefited by. On life and labor of Dr. Leask, "To speak of him as a scholar and theologian, it would be requisite I should be such as I profess not to be: but to speak of him as a heaven-taught man, I venture to declare him such, and especially in those features of truth for the which he suffered when he ought to have been honored. How far he was the good and faithful servant whom the King will delight to honor, he best knows, who measures us all according to truth and righteousness, and will manifest [illegible] who have been [illegible]

Our [illegible] make mistakes about [illegible] and others, counsels silence when we attempt to weigh and measure one another, or even ourselves, remembering one of the wisest and best of men to have said, "I know nothing against myself, yet herein am I not justified. He that judgeth me is the Lord. Wherefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall each man have his praise of God." Yes the helpers as well as the helped—Aaron and Hur together with Moses; the worthy Deacons and members who have stood by their pastor, helping him to brave the storm and face the foe; sharing with him the shame and contumely that have attended faithful and unflinching testimony to truth—these also shall have praise of God in that day when, to his approved ones, he will say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Even so come, Lord Jesus! come quickly. Amen.—Heirloom.

Man's Condition.

There have been always those who sought to make light of the hurts which man has inflicted on himself, of the sickness with which he is sick; who would fain persuade themselves and others that moralists and divines, if they have not quite invented, have enormously exaggerated them. But are these statements found in Scripture and in experience? Are there not mournful corroborations of their truth imprinted deeply upon every region of man's natural and spiritual life, and on none more deeply than on his language? It needs no more than to open a dictionary and to cast our eye thoughtfully down a few columns, and we will find abundant confirmation of his sadder and severer estimate of man's moral and spiritual condition. How else shall we explain the [illegible] catalogue of words having all to do with sin, or with misery, or with both? How came they there? We may be quite sure that they were not invented with atrocious wrong that they have such a cortel [illegible] of [illegible] ties. I open [illegible] at random, what [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] what these desperate longings after immunity which at times we see [illegible] for them? And [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "vanity, unquietness, vexation," [illegible] "transient," and [illegible] more; words, you will [illegible] for the most part, not laid up in the recesses of the language, to be [illegible] and used at rare opportunities [illegible] many of them, its [illegible] tasks.

And, indeed, as to [illegible] abundance, it is a melancholy thing to observe how much richer is every vocabulary in words that [illegible] than in those which [illegible] When St. Paul [illegible] would put these against the "works of the flesh" against "the fruits of the spirit"—there are seventeen, these only nine—and [illegible] we find in the Scripture [illegible] lists of graces as we do at 2 Tim. iii. 2; Rom. i. 29, &c.—of their opposites?—Trench.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the total restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Obedient King of kings, and the immortal saints or joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked—eternal life only through Christ; and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersions as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE "MEMORIAL NAME".

God made himself known to the Hebrews by the name "Jehovah" (Yahweh). The point for consideration is,—what is the meaning of the word "Jehovah," and what does it express of the being and nature of God, more than, or in distinction from the other names applied to the Deity in the Old Testament.

When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty who appeared in the burning bush though the medium of an angel, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission. "And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, I shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?" And God said unto Moses, "I am that I am," and he said, thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, "I am" hath sent me unto you.....This is my name to the age, (Young's Trans.) and this is my memorial to all generations." That this passage is intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah—there can be no doubt; it is in fact a key to the whole mystery. In this memorial God announces himself as the being who will ever be, as he was as he is, conveying the idea of immutability and eternity. This name was considered peculiarly awful and sacred by the Jews—they were unwilling to pronounce it. In the English version it is most generally rendered LORD and written in small capitals. It is distinctly stated in Exodus vi. 3, that to the patriarchs God was not known by the name of "Jehovah" (read the whole passage)—perhaps it was not the name, as a name, so much, but the true import of its significance, which was unknown to, and uncomprehended by the patriarchs. They had known God as the Omnipotent, the God Almighty, all powerful, but as a God eternal, immutable, and true to his promises, he was yet to be revealed. In the character expressed by the name "Jehovah." He had not hitherto been fully known, that his true attributes had not been recognized in his workings and acts, for Israel. Therefore we would naturally expect, that a memorial name given in such a crisis, would express the relation in which the great Omnipotent,—the everlasting God, is brought nearest to his people; that it would embrace those promises by which he was remembered with hope, through all the troubled times in which "Zion" or Israel was tossed with tempest and not comforted, save with the comfort of this memorial. "Jehovah" or the "I am" is properly rendered "I will be" the promised deliverer—the Coming One, Emanuel (God with us), and adds new beauty to the first promise, "The seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head," and also the promise of Abraham, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." So we see brethren, from our standpoint, how beautifully God, gradually unfolds his gracious plans and purposes in regard to the restoration of fallen man. His purposes are purposes of mercy from beginning to end; this is shown, Ex. xxxiv. in proclaiming the "name," "Jehovah" to Israel. —"The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin." Thus this great name given by God as a memorial to all generations, is set forth as a name of relation, is appealed to by us as a name of affection, and pertaining to its very structure and history a prophecy of hope; for everywhere throughout this great system of law, we find "Yahweh", or "Jehovah" appealing to his own name as significant of a special and tender relation, and as containing associations fitted to affect the hearts of the people.

The peculiar emphasis with which this is given on several occasions, together with the connection in which it is declared, and the fact that it is always associated with the attributes of God in relation to humanity, all show that this great "memorial name" was not intended to express the mere pre-existence of an absolute and self-existent God, apart from humanity. It is not a name of terror, but a name of relation, expressing peculiarly the attributes of mercy and longsuffering of a God who has taken upon himself the work of deliverance and redemption, and who pledges himself by that name, in spite of the sins of his people (which he will not leave unpunished) to carry that work through to its final triumph. In confirmation of this, hear the answer of "Jehovah" to the prayer of Moses—"I beseech thee, show me thy glory." (Ex. xxxiii. and xxxiv.)

The attributes prominently set forth in this Scripture as the special characteristics of God, under the name "Yahweh," are those of mercy in relation to humanity; it also conveys the idea that he will hold his people responsible to a standard of right and holiness, represented by the law. In the commencement of this new world dispensation as constituted by Moses,—the first step was to be taken towards the preparation for the coming of "Yahweh," the promised one. A people was to be selected and trained in a special school, the appointed end of which was—to educate them to understand and appreciate the manifestation of Divinity, to appear in the coming "Yahweh."

The very best possible expression of the love of God was to be the offering up of his only begotten Son to die; then, before the fulness of love displayed in that divine sacrifice could be comprehended by fallen man, they must themselves be trained through a system of sacrifices to a familiarity with the idea. Thus we see the sacrifice, that wonderful symbol of divine love, of a love which gives itself up even to the blood (which is the life), was instituted at the very dawn of time, and figures on every page of succeeding history.

The name of Jehovah or Yahweh is set forth as a name which has had a history; it is referred back to the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; a name replete with associations, but at the same time as one whose historical signification had become lost, and which was therefore explained—re-asserted, and then given as a solemn pledge to the fulfilment of a promised deliverance. Thus Israel's children were to know what Israel himself had not fully comprehended, "Yahweh" as a deliverer.—They were also to understand or comprehend more clearly from their experience, and from the affirmation to Moses, that name, as not only pledging deliverance to them, but as prophetic of some great future manifestation to the world, of which this memorial name would be the type. This might be further illustrated by the typical angel, whom "God sent before Israel to keep them in the way, and to bring them into the place which he had promised; concerning whom they were told not to provoke him, but obey his voice: for, (says Jehovah) my name is in him." Ex. xxiii. 20, 21. God through Moses (prophetically) speaking of the coming one, "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."

We, brethren, upon whom the ends of the ages have come, look back upon those provisionary arrangements as having (or nearly so) accomplished the purposes for which they were designed, having culminated in the raising up of that prophet like unto Moses, to whom it becomes our duty especially to give ear. "But those things which were written aforetime, were written for our learning and profit, that we through patience and comfort of the Scripture might have hope;"—we having the extra benefit (so to speak) of their experience. (Read 1 Cor. x.) David in Ps. cxxxv. testifies, "Thy name, O Lord, endureth for the age, and thy memorial to all generations." In the English version "Jehovah" is rendered "Lord;" this harmonizes with Hosea xii. 5, where he says, "The Lord is his memorial." When the He who "I shall be" was conceived in the womb of the Virgin Mary, by the power of the Holy Spirit, the time had come for the "I" to manifest himself as the future Being. The Word became a dweller in flesh and dwelt among the Jews. ("who beheld his glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.") The Father appears in the Son, so the "I" appears in the "who I shall be" as "God in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself." It is worthy of remark, that the Blessed and only Potentate did not say, I "am" He who I will be, but I will or shall be that personage. He was the "I" dwelling in unapproachable light, but the "He who I shall be" is the image of that invisible "I." It was the Father's Spirit which dwelt in him, which was before all things. It was this "I" concerning whom Jesus said, "Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee." The words that I speak, I speak not of myself, but the Father who dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." This enables us to comprehend the significancy of the memorial, and also to better understand the allusions of Jesus when he said to the Jews, "Before Abraham was, I am," and also when he said, "O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." Of the God who spoke to Moses, it could be said, he was in Abraham's time, he is in Moses' time, and he shall be in the age to come the Almighty. This doctrine is taught in the voice that came to Moses and in the memorial. "I" who was known to Abraham as God Almighty, do now exist, and "shall be who I shall be," even Abraham's seed. "I shall be who I shall be" was nothingless than a declaration that he would manifest himself in the flesh as the woman's seed, who shall bruise the serpent's head. Is it not true then, that the name "Lord" is still a constant memorial of the failure, and is borne by him who is the only begotten of the Father, "God with us," or (if I may use the expression) the connecting link between the great "I am" and poor frail humanity. The conception, birth, life, death, and resurrection of "Yahweh Christ" were events of such importance, they were signalised by the supernatural. An angel was delegated to a company of shepherds who were watching their flocks by night, "Behold! I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." "For unto you is born this day in the City of David, a Savior, which is "Christ the Lord." Here we find that the exalted title "Lord" is given to the Savior by the angel (not "a" Lord but "the" Lord), showing conclusively that the fulness of time had come for the great Antitype of the memorial, to be manifested in flesh. And to give it (if possible) still more importance, we have also the testimony in connection with the angel's message, "that suddenly a multitude of the heavenly host appeared, praising God, and saying: Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." If this event is a matter of such joy and rejoicing to the angels of God, ought it not to be appreciated by us, although "made for a little while inferior to the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor."

In view of what has been said, is not "Christ Jesus our Lord" the name through which God is now known and will be known in the future age? Is he not our memorial? To that exalted name "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess." "Let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ." "He is Lord of all." "No man calleth Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Spirit." The disciples addressed him as "Lord." Many other Scriptures might be quoted to the same effect, all suggestive of the time (still in the future) when he will take to himself his great power and reign, King of kings and Lord of lords.

As the Son—the only begotten Son, he takes the Father's name, and is invested with all power, "for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." Being the appointed heir of all things (that is all the promises centered in him,) He was well acquainted with those promises, and how those promised things were related to the purposes and plans of his Father. As the promised Seed, "He verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world," (was foreknown. R. V.) In this sense "he was before Abraham," and also "the root of David," in consideration of which, and in connection with his heavenly origin David could justly call him Lord: this is not out of harmony with his being made of the seed of David according to the flesh—in order that he might inherit David's throne and kingdom, and thus fulfill the promises concerning the same. All the promises seem to be based upon the fact of man's fallen condition, and as such he needs a Savior. It is the testimony concerning this Jesus (God-Savior) which is the theme or burden of the Scriptures; and to these Scriptures must we come if we would be made wise unto salvation. "This is eternal life that we might know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." A knowledge of God and Christ is indispensible in order that we may be made partakers of the promises and of the divine nature. Was Paul right in "considering all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, my Lord?" Would it not be a good investment (if it should become necessary) for us to be willing to suffer the loss of all things for this excellent knowledge? In the end it will be a rich exchange. So we see the knowledge of Christ Jesus embraces the "mystery" which Paul so often speaks of in his letters. His desire was that they should have the full assurance of the understanding, to the acknowledgement of the mystery of God, and the Father, and of Christ;"—"for in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." "Pray for me (says Paul) that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds." This element of the gospel no doubt embraced the things concerning the "name of Jesus Christ," or the means God hath appointed for the restoration of fallen man to his favor: for we want to show the reader the intimate connection of the name of Jesus with our salvation. "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." We see the necessity then, of us in some way, becoming related to that all-covering "name," for in putting on that saving "name," we become clothed with his righteousness. "For this is his name whereby he shall be called,—The Lord our Righteousness." Jer. xxiii. 5–6. "By believing the untraditionized gospel of the kingdom of God and of his Christ, and immersion into the name of the Lord Jesus for the remission of sins, we become united to that name—which, (when the mystery of God shall be finished) will embrace a multitude—many members, but one body. And if we be Christ's then are we Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." "They that know my name will put their trust in thee." J. O. WOODRUFF.

He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.—John iii. 36.

To believe on the Son is equivalent to obeying his commands, because we have not the promise of eternal life any where in the Bible without a strict adherence to the word of truth, and a compliance with its demands. Strict obedience to the word must be adhered to in order to obtain eternal life, at the appointed time. Let us notice a few examples that are laid down in the good book for our instruction in righteousness. Acts viii. commencing at the 32 verse. Here we see the Eunuch read to Philip concerning Christ Jesus the Savior of the world. He reads to Philip as follows: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter: and like a lamb before his shearers, so opened he not his mouth. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation, for his life is taken from the earth. And the Eunuch answered Philip, and said. I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or some other man. Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same Scripture, and preached unto him Christ.

And as they went on their way they came to a certain water, and the Eunuch said, see, here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized? and Philip said, if thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest, and he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

And he commanded the chariot to stand still and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the Eunuch, and he baptized him."

He can plainly see by the following quotations of Scripture that obedience is implied where the word belief is used, as in John iii. 36.

Also in Acts xvi. 30: here we see that the jailer says, "what must I do to be saved," and they said "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved" and in the 33rd. verse we read that the Jailer and all his house were "baptized that same hour of the night" showing plainly and without the least doubt that obedience is implied, the same as in John iii. 15. 16: which reads as follows. "That whosoever believeth in him" (Christ) showing conclusively that faith, belief and obedience are implied in these in-stances, if not mentioned.

The reason that I have for writing a few statements regarding this subject is this, so many have come to the conclusion regarding the quotations heretofore mentioned that if they believe and do not comply with the requirements as given in Mark xvi. 15-16; and Acts ii. 38; Gal. iii. 27; 1 Peter iii. 21; Acts x. 48; that they can be saved just as well as to be baptized, but I reason that where belief is spoken of, or mentioned as in the above quotations faith implies obedience. If I am not right some brother please correct me. Yours in love for the truth. Amen.

A Perfect Man.

Imagine one whose form combines all qualities of strength and beauty, of majesty and tenderness.

Whose wisdom is unerring in its balance, whose memory includes all the experiences of the senses—whose courage is calm and unconquerable, whose justice is regulated by the golden rule, whose whole nature is subject and attuned to the harmony of the Most High God—and you have a false portrait of the Lord Jesus the Anointed of the Father—full of grace and truth. "Be ye therefore perfect—even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."

This is the mark of the prize of our high calling. We cannot attain it now, but if we are Christ's—we shall ever follow on—while unceasing ages roll. Can we doubt, with the analogy of human experience—that the immortalized saints will even grow in all excellencies—in wisdom and power and love—I see no reason for disbelieving it.

When we measure the growth from infancy to the accomplished man how great the stride—and this in flesh and blood—subject to all the restrictions and failing of animal nature. What may we hope for when that spiritual body like that of Jesus, shall be ours!

Enclosed please find two dollars, to pay for the paper for 1885. I think too much of it to ever give it up, as I am situated I do not hear the gospel of the kingdom preached and I had rather read THE RESTITUTION and my dear old Bible than to go and hear such preaching as we have here. May the Lord bless, and prosper all that are engaged in its publication is my earnest prayer. As ever yours for the truth.

THE EVENTS OF THE HOUR.

It is not only the business man who sees so much to dismay his calculation within his sphere. The scientist is puzzled and amazed at the extraordinary exhibition of celestial and terrestrial disturbance, involving the shaking up of old earth, the destruction of life, the overthrow of towns, and such other indications that manifest the throes of a dissolving firmament, at least they can place no limit to the extent to which these increasing disturbances may reach. In some way the terrestrial magnetic forces are greatly disturbed, producing the many calamities witnessed in earthquakes, storms and tornadoes in recent years, but especially within two or three, all over the world. They also know that in some way the sun, that source of all energy here, is the primary cause of all these earthly phenomena. The statesman likewise is dazed as he views the hopeless influences that are swaying the nations as if by a political tornado, and impelling them into disastrous contentions that must prove terrible in their final consequences. Burdens of debt are heaped upon the people without stint, to augment the destructive forces of armies and navies. It is now the power of the anarchists that directs these agencies. Republican France and constitutional England are more involved than Autocratic Russia, in this frenzy of lust and spoliation. The social economist finds as many enigmas to unravel as he views the fabric of society. The communistic growth is to him a thing of marvel. Society seems to be on the verge of disruption. There is a revolt of the poor against the wealthy classes, the ruler against the rulers, and an indescribable, but powerful element of socialism whose mission is to demolish home, the church, and the ennobling works of man. With the abundance provided of divine providence to make the race of man happy, he sees every blessing devoted to inflicting misery and disaster upon each other and upon the world at large. This may all seem extravagant in expression, but it is the sober picture drawn for our contemplation by those to whom we look for instruction, and is confirmed to us in the daily bulletins we read. The Christian may and does take a complacent view of these great lessons of the hour, and believe they are working out the immutable plans of the divine Governor who has overruled all agencies to effect his own purposes, and when he gives the word, order will at once succeed the seeming chaos.—Putnam (Conn.) Patriot.

Love the Power.

It is a truth at once sublime and comforting that he who believingly accepts the Lord Jesus Christ, and thus comes into vital union with him, is in harmony with God, with the universe, and with himself. He dwells in love and dwells with God, and God dwells with him. He loves his neighbor, his brother-man—as himself, and so all the law is fulfilled in him. So true is it that on these two great commandments," or laws, two which are really one, being eternally united and co-existing; neither of which could by possibility exist without the other, "hang all the law and the prophets;" and science adds, on this one law of love, "hang all the laws of the physical world." It says it but feebly and faintly now, but it will say it bye-and-bye in songs as of a "great multitude, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of many thunderings, Alleluia! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" And the law of his illimitable empire is the law of love.

ESAU.

"Lest there be any profane person, as Esau, who, for one morsel of meat, sold his birthright."—Heb. xii. 16.

Esau sold his birthright for a morsel of meat. He traded off the right to the headship of the family, after Isaac's death, the right to the double portion of the paternal estate, the right to be the successor to the simple, priestly functions which the patriarchal father exercised, and the right to be in the direct line of the ancestry of our Lord Jesus Christ. He did this to gratify the impulses of his animal nature. He bartered the future for the speedily-perishing good of the present. He therefore stands as the type of the "profane"—that is, the worldly—man. He represents a large, alas, too large a class of men, who, without being guilty of flagrant sins, are immersed in the pleasures and pursuits of a fleeting world. Noble qualities, on the plane of the natural, are to be found in the character of Esau. Generous, magnanimous, bold, adventurous, free-hearted, full of animal spirits, Esau presents many features of attractiveness. So do these men who are living over again the life of Esau, amid the peculiar outward conditions of the nineteenth century. They love to be considered the practical, common-sense men of their time. "Let the future take care of itself, the present is good enough for us," are either the words of their lips or the teachings of their lives. For spiritual things they have no relish. The most real of all the possessions of the soul are as unreal to them as the phantoms projected from the disordered brain. They live as though the soul itself was but a name for the functions of the decaying body, and heaven was an exploded myth. They are selling a grander birthright than Esau possessed for a morsel of perishable meat. They are sacrificing a future of unspeakable glory for the sake of a poor, paltry momentary enjoyment. Such men, self-satisfied, well-fed, well-housed, well-clothed, well to do, full of business, full of pleasure, are the most difficult of all classes to reach with the spiritual truths of Christianity.

Don't Be Discouraged.

It is a fine remark of Faulkner, "Bear with patience in others the faults and failings as you would wish others to bear with yours." We cannot do all at once. But by constant pruning away of little faults, and cultivating humble virtues, we shall grow toward perfection. This simple rule—not to be discouraged by slow progress, but to persevere; overcoming evil habits one by one, such as sloth, negligence, or bad temper, and adding one excellence after another—"to faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness, charity"—will conduct the slowest Christian at last to high religious attainments.

Trials.

Trials are needed to test the genuineness of your conversion. While the rain falls daily, the wheat looks green on the stony ground that has not been broken up; but when the drouth comes, the burning sun scorches it, and dries it up. So it is with many converts. They run well while the crowd looks on and applauds; but when fidelity to Jesus and his truth exposes them to persecutions, they give up and turn back into the popular road. Bubbles look well while they last, but they cannot stand pressure. Multitudes abandon the way of life, because in reality they were never in it. They never passed through the straight gate—never fully renounced the world. Their repentance was superficial—their conversion spurious. —S. T. R. in Christian Guide.

Christianity, under one aspect of it, is the greatest leveler of mankind. It places all men, king and subject, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, on the same footing before the eye of the great Searcher of hearts. Under another aspect of it Christianity is the great distinguisher or discriminator between men. It sets persons) characters in the clearest light, and awards to each what he is fittest to receive. It puffs up none, while by its inward enlightenment it humbles all. To dwell in its light is the one infallible cure for all vainglory, whether of the individual or of the nation. Self-ignorance is the parent of pride, of presumption, of vainglory. Self-knowledge, and with it self-judgment, and so an unaffected humility, are the gifts of the religion of Christ, and of his religion alone.—President Robinson.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Feb. 18, 1885.

As we have learned from an exchange, the portrait of the Mahdi, published in this number of our paper, was written by one personally acquainted with him. As the occupancy of Egypt by the English is an important affair in the further development of the Eastern Question, we give this selection, and another on Khartoum, in the present issue, to be followed, perhaps, in our next, with an account of the people in the Soudan.

From Sister Carrie Williams we have received some tracts entitled, "The Genuine and the Counterfeit," and from E. White, London, England, two able lectures on "Land Reform and Emigration," which are themes of primary and immense importance in England in these days of political and popular unrest. The Rainbow truly says: "These lectures must be read to be appreciated." When less crowded by delayed matter furnished by our correspondents, we may find it best to give our readers a part or all of these lectures.

---

We learn that John G. Wilson, late Editor of the Prophetic Times and Watch Tower is dead. His views of the redemptive economy were akin to the teachings of those who entertain the "larger hope" with respect to human destiny. He was a man of acknowledged ability and virtue. The Prophetic Times, as such, is no longer on the list of periodicals. It is, however, succeeded by a similar work in a new form, of which the first number has come to hand under the name of Words of Reconciliation, Edited by L. C. Baker, author of a volume—that has excited much interest and elicited many favorable comments—entitled The Mystery of Creation and Man. From the reading of this remarkable volume, and the general make-up and contents of this first number of the new periodical, we are led to expect an instructive serial under the new name and new management.

The price of the book is $1. Address the author 1611 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa. It is a remarkable volume.

KHARTOUM.

In our present issue we have copied an account of the Mahdi from a Catholic source, which, as the Catholics have their missions at Khartoum, we may conclude is a correct portrait of the singular personage about whose designs and movements there is so great interest manifested at the present time. From the World's Crisis we reproduce the following account of Khartoum taken from the Tribune, which will be read with as much interest as the account of the Mohammedan chieftain. The following is the account of the city now becoming famous:—

"The early history of Khartoum is unknown, save that ruins in the neighborhood of the present town indicate it to have been an important outpost of the Imperial Government of the Pharaohs. The vicissitudes of centuries finally reduced it to the position of a subordinate town of Sennear, commercially tributary to Shendy, which, situated more than a hundred miles further down the Nile, had become the business centre of the entire Eastern Soudan. In 1819, however, Mahomet Ali, the great Pacha and Khedive of Egypt, determined to extend his sway as far as possible. He accordingly sent up the Nile an expedition commanded by his sons Ibrahim—afterward Khedive for a few weeks—and Ismial—not the Khedive of that name, of course. The result of this expedition was to conquer the Eastern Soudan and annex it to the Egyptian realm, and Khartoum, at first made the base of military operations, became in 1823 the seat of Government and soon outstripped Shendy in commercial importance. In 1848, Pope Gregory XVI. founded a mission there, which was long conducted by Dr. Ignaz Knoblecher. Several European consulates were also established there, that of England dating from 1849 to 1864, in which latter year it was abolished under circumstances which gave rise to much comment.

"The population of Khartoum has varied from 10,000 to 30,000, according to the policy of the Governor; official exactions frequently causing a sudden exodus of one-third of the inhabitants. The town contains, however, about 3,000 houses, mostly of mud and millet stalks, and in only a few instances arranged in streets or squares. The Governor's house is the principal building in the city. It stands on the river bank, and [illegible] Gordon says is as large as Marlborough House, London. There have also been constructed some other buildings of importance, for in 1871 Dr. Schweinfurth says he found there a large number of new brick buildings, a spacious quay on the Blue Nile, and some imposing structures on the other bank of the river. The land sides of the city are surrounded by a wall and ditch. The drainage of the place is bad, much of it lying below the level of high water in the river; consequently it is unhealthful and foul-smelling in the city. The inhabitants are Egyptians, Berbers, Arabs, Turks, Jews, Negros and Europeans."

"Khartoum lies on the south bank of the Bahr el-Azrak, or Blue Nile, a mile above (south of) the junction of that river with the Bahr-el-Abiad, or White Nile, and the city walls reach to within less than half a mile of the latter, so that the garrison of Khartoum commands both streams. On the other side of the White Nile is the terminus of the great caravan route to Dongola and the fortified camp from which General Hick's ill-fated expedition set out. Opposite Khartoum is the Island of Tuti, dividing the Blue Nile into two branches. The city is thus the most important post, strategically considered on the Upper Nile, and is the natural centre of military power in the Equatorial Provinces. In one other respect it is even more important to Egypt. It is at Khartoum that the Nilometer records the rising of the waters, and indicates to the farmers of the Delta the influence the melting snow will exercise upon the volume of the stream upon which their prosperity and very existence depends."

To the above we add a brief extract from the American Cyclopedia:—

"Khartoum carries on an extensive ivory trade, mostly in the hands of the larger merchants, which facilitates also the operations of the regular slave traders, who pour into the negro countries annually by thousands, on the roads over Kordofan and Darfoor. The merchants of Khartoum maintain a great number of settlement in districts as near as possible to the present ivory countries, and peaceful races devoted to agriculture. They have portioned the surrounding territory among themselves, and brought the natives to a condition of vassalage. They are represented by agents who command the armed men of the country, determine what products the natives shall pay as tribute, appoint and displace the local managers, carry on war or make alliances with the chiefs, and once a year remit the collected stores to Khartoum. Vessels are built of Sweet Acacia, a wood harder and heavier than oak, but from want of skill and proper tools they are exceedingly clumsy."

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKES IN SPAIN.

The terrible earthquakes which desolated many cities in Spain during the last week of the year 1884 and the first few days of the present year, were briefly described in our news columns recently. We are now enabled to supplement those accounts, brought by cable, the more detailed reports of newspaper correspondents who visited the scene of destruction and described the distressing conditions of the country.

A correspondent at Malaga writes: "At five minutes to nine in the evening of Christmas Day, the inhabitants of this city, which numbers one hundred and twenty thousand, were startled by a shock of earthquake of an unprecedented magnitude in this place, and attended by circumstances of so unusual a character that a record of the events cannot be without interest. Without the slightest warning a slight movement of the earth was felt, followed by a loud rumbling noise, such as that of a heavy freight train, and then every house and building in the town was shaken to its foundations. As soon as people became awakened to a sense of their danger, intensified by the recollection of the recent terrible calamity at Ischia, a general rush was made for the doors. At eleven o'clock another less severe shock, in the same direction, was felt, and another more severe than the second at 2.30. During the remainder of the night, until sunrise, the earth continued to tremble, as many as eight or ten shocks, of more or less force, having been observed, all in the one direction [illegible] of the same undulating character.

"It would not be easy to give an account of the fear which possessed all classes in this city during that fearful night. While the upper classes who had been celebrating Christmas in their family circles had hardly risen from the dinner-table, others were spending the evening at the theatres, which were both full, as is usual on [illegible] days, and in one brief moment, when all was [illegible] terrible an event, the pleasure was turned to terror. One universal cry of despair arose. Mothers screamed for their children, ladies and girls fainted and had hysteric fits, and those in the houses, like those in the theatres and cafes, rushed for the doors, and in a few seconds the whole population was in the streets. Indeed, so anxious were the people to get to the streets, that one man in his haste to escape from a cafe broke the glass doors with his fist and severed an artery in the arm, which caused his death.

"Once in the street, the universal question was, where to find shelter and safety for the night. All the cabs, omnibuses, private carriages, railway carriages, vans, and covered carts were put into requisition, and whole families forced therein; while hundreds of people encamped on the Alameda squares, the bed of the Guadalmedina River—fortunately dry at this season—and other open spaces. The effect produced upon a family of women, children and servants, at such a late hour of the night in being thus turned into the street, bewildered by the fear of a repetition of the shock, may be well imagined. In some cases, the most courageous went back to their houses, and sat in the halls and doorways, but no one thought of retiring to rest until day-break of the 26th. At noon on that day another slight shock was felt, and another at 7 P. M.

"So universally did the fears prevail that more serious wrecks would be repeated precisely after twenty-four hours from the first, that, notwithstanding the heavy rainfall, the Alameda and other open spaces were crowded as in the previous night; and carriages with and without horses were placed at a distance from the houses, and the better classes spent the night in them, while the poorer people found no other shelter than their cloaks and umbrellas, the carriages being only within the reach of a limited number of persons. As much as sixteen dollars was paid for one carriage without horses for the night, and but for the heavy rain the whole of the population would doubtless have spent the night in the streets.

The correspondent of the London Standard gives the following description of the scene of the disaster. His communication is dated from Granada:

"I arrived here this evening, the journey having been long and tedious owing to the disorganized state of the train service and by the crowds of people hurrying away from the Southern provinces. At Bobadilla we found several trains waiting in the station, crowded with fugitives from Malaga and Granada. At the former town they have experienced three severe shocks in the last twenty-four hours, one of them this morning. I learned from the fugitives that the effect of these renewed shocks has been terrible, and that most of the houses damaged by the previous shocks had now fallen. As neither Malaga nor Granada had the people dared to enter their houses all night.

"As the train proceeded on its way we found the important stations of Antiquera, Archidona, and Loja thronged with panic-stricken people, all anxious to take trains for the North. There was but little chance of their being able to do this, as every train which came through from the South was packed with fugitives. Pending means of getting away, considerable numbers of people had bivouacked round fires near the stations, while others had filled the trucks and railway carriages in the sidings, in hopes that these would presently be coupled on to some passing train.

"An enormous destruction of property has taken place. An immense church at Antiquera, and almost all the houses which remained standing there and at Albama, have been levelled to the ground, but the loss of life has been smaller than might have been expected, as most of the population had already forsaken the towns and had taken refuge in the fields. About one thousand in all have perished.

"Granada is a great place for churches, and numerous processions, with crosses, banners, and lighted tapers, are moving about the streets in the frosty air. The people as they pass flock to the side, kneel, and pray bare-headed. The women sob and moan, the men mutter their prayers, and amid the deep and dismal chanting of the priests, the wails of the babes, half perished with cold, rise on the air. All the churches are open, and prayers said continuously all night." In the country lying between Granada and the Alpujarra chain of hills, and also on the sea-coast districts of the provinces of Granada and Malaga, on the other side of that chain—which appears to have been the centre of the line of force of the earthquake, the misery is appalling. Hundreds villages [illegible]. The authorities are doing [illegible], and private charity is active, but [illegible] are unable to cope with the mass of distress and misery which exist.

The town of Albama, on the 24th of December, contained about twelve thousand inhabitants, but the number has shrunk greatly since from deaths and fright. Of the seventeen hundred and fifty-seven houses, not two hundred can be repaired; all the rest have either fallen or are in so shattered a condition that they must be pulled down. All the churches, the Casino or club, and the Town Hall are destroyed; and it may be said that the town is reduced to one great heap of ruins, from which rises an intolerable stench from the number of bodies still lying beneath it.

No hundred men, however resolute, could achieve such complete and thorough destruction as has been wrought at Albama. But terrible as was the aspect of the ruins of the town, that of the human beings in it was more melancholy. Hundreds of them, despite of the risk of rolling masonry, were scattered through the ruins. Some were crouching at the gates which had once been their homes, for some remains of their goods and property. In front of some of the ruins persons sat sobbing bitterly as they gazed helplessly at the masses of masonry and rubbish beneath which were lying the remains of their children. In some places women were lying prostrate in the very abandonment of grief, too utterly despondent even to lift up their heads as we passed, or to hold out their hands for the charity which the governor was dispensing to all he met. Some threw themselves on their knees before him, and implored him to order the soldiers to dig down through the ruins for their loved ones, while others, holding up their children and pointing to their pinched faces and famished looks, pathetically implored that assistance might be sent. A large house still standing, just opposite the Town Hall, had been turned into a hospital. Here, stretched upon straw palliasses, with scanty and unsufficient covering, lay thirty badly-injured women and thirty-five men. Some of them were delirious, four were at the point of death, one of these had seen his wife, his father, and six children perish before his eyes.—Chronicle Herald.

A Portrait of the Mahdi.

Imagine a man about forty years of age, of medium height, as lean, as the saying is, as shatten herring, with a mahogany complexion, coal-black beard and eyes, and three vertical cicatrices on his pallid cheeks; add to this a long cotton shirt as a garment, a narrow turban as a headdress, a pair of wooden sandals, and in the hands—dry as those of a mummy—a string of ninety beads, corresponding to an equal number of divine attributes, and you have the Mahdi. Those who have seen him say that Mohammed-Ahmed plays to perfection the part of a visionary dervish, waving his head when walking, and murmuring constant prayers, his eyes fixed on heaven. His father was a carpenter on Arfi Island, in the Nubian province of Dongola, and about 1852 came, with his four children, to Chendi, a small city on the banks of the Nile south of Berber. When still very young he was placed as an apprentice under the care of one of his uncles, a shipbuilder of Chabakah, opposite Sennaar. It seems that the future prophet was not without his failings, for one day his uncle thought well of flogging him in a regular French style. The proceeding was not appreciated, and the child ran away until he arrived in Khartoum, where he entered a school or convent of begging dervishes, who were in charge of the monument erected over the venerated remains of Cheikh Hogali, patron of the city. There his life was a remarkable one for his piety; but as to education, he never learned how to write or even how to read fluently. Later he went to a similar institution in Berber, then to one in Aradup, on the south of Kona. In the latter city he became, in 1870, the favorite disciple of an eminent fekir, Cheikh Nur-el Daim, and finally was ordained by him and went to Abbes Island, White Nile. His fame as a saintly man was every year on the increase. He lived in a kind of pit or subterranean repository for grain, called silo, which he had dug up with his own hands; and there he passed his life, fasting and praying, burning incense day and night, and repeating the name of Allah for hours at a time, until he would fall to the ground panting and exhausted. If anybody spoke to him he gave back no answer, except sentences from the sacred books of Islam. Earthly things seemed to inspire him only with disgust and pity. He had made a vow to absorb himself in the contemplation of divine perfections and to weep all his life for the sins of mankind. But his tears did not destroy his powers of vision, and he saw, [illegible] wide open to business; and the faithful coming by thousands and depositing rich offerings at the mouth of his silo, he never failed to see the gifts not to stow them away carefully for stormy days. In 1878 he had become so wealthy that he felt the necessity to declare that Allah had ordered him to leave his silo and [illegible] himself a large collection of [illegible] as a truly pretentious man, he chose among the most influential families of the country, especially that of the Baggara, the most opulent slave trading tribe of the White Nile.

Every one has still fresh in his memory the appalling extermination of Hicks Pasha's eleven thousand men, surrounded on the fifth of November, 1883—the first day of the fourteenth century of the Hegira—at Kaschil while marching on El Obeid. This horrible butchery, happening on the threshold of the century announced as the one of the last Prophet, gave a bloody consecration to Mohammed Ahmed, who, after the three days' battle went all over the battle-field, pierced with his spear the mutilated corpses of his enemies and exclaiming: "Christ I, the Prophet, who destroyed the heretics!" Compared to him Mohammed was no more, in his mind, than a small prophet. He alone was the only great and powerful Messiah announced by Mohammed himself. The Sultan of Constantinople was no more the supreme Caliph, the chief of Islamism; it was he. Mohammed-Ahmed, and he ordered his own name to be invoked in public worship in the place of Mohammed's, right after the name of Allah!

I have said enough to show what kind of a man is the Nubian Mahdi.—Alfred M. Cote. LL. D., in the Catholic World.

LITTLE EARL'S LETTER.

A postman's work, with puzzled brow,
And in his hands cross-lines over and over
A letter, with a look of care enough
As to its own precarious fate.
The mail is emptied, the letters resell,
And by a boy's rough hand engrossed,
Two words confront: "To Jesus Christ,"
And underneath, described, "In Heaven."

The postman guesses; full well he knew
No mail upon this earth there could take
And yet 'twas sent in childish faith;
And posted for the dear Lord's sake.
With careful hand, he broke the seal,
And reverently the letter read;
'Twas short, and very simple, too,
For thus was all the matter said:

"My Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ,
I've fairies lost my father dear,
Mother is very, very poor,
And life to her is sad and drear.
Yet thou hast promises in thy Word:
What none can ever ask in vain
For what they need of earthly store,
If only asked in Jesus' name.

"And so I write you in his name,
Dear Christ, you will kindly send
Some money down, for what you can spare.
And what is right for me to spend.
I want so much to go to school;
While father lived, I always went,
But he had little. Lord, to leave,
And what he left is almost spent.

"I do not know how long 'twill be
Ere this will reach the Golden Gate;
But I will try and patient be,
And for the answer gladly wait."
The trifling reached that far-off land,
Although the letter did not go,
And straight the King an angel sent
To help the little boy below.

Off to his mother he would say,
"I know the Lord would answer make
When he had read my little message,
While he [illegible] for the dear sake!"
Ah! happy boy, would you but teach
Our hearts to trust our Father's love;
And to believe what angels preached,
'Tis only done our faith to prove.

THE CLOSED DOOR.

I remember it so well; it was one morning many years ago, when I was a very little child. I had been disobedient at breakfast time, and papa had said to me gravely and sadly, "Carrie, you must get off your chair, and go and stand outside the door for five minutes."

I got down, checked back the sob that rose in my throat, and without turning to look into papa's face, I went outside the door, and it was shut against me.

The moments seemed very long and silent. I remember well how my tears droped down on the mat; I was so grieved and ashamed. The five minutes were not nearly over, but the handle of the door was partly turned, and Johnnie's curly head peeped out.

Both his arms were round my neck in a minute, and he said, "Carrie, go in, I'll be naughty instead of you;" and before I had time to say a word he had pushed me in, and shut the door.

There I stood, with my eyes on the ground, and feeling so red and so uncomfortable, not knowing whether I might go up to the table; but papa took me by the hand, and led me to the table, and kissed me and put me on my chair, and I knew I was forgiven just as much as if I had borne all the punishment; but oh! how I wished that Johnnie might come in.

When the five minutes were up he was called in, and then papa took us both—me, the poor little naughty child, and Johnnie the loving brother—and folded us both in his arms, and I sobbed it all out—the repentance, and love, and gratefulness—while we were held close to that loving heart.

And now that I look back to that little scene, it seems a very typical one. For the years went by, and I found myself outside another door, separated from the Father, sin having come between my soul and God, till I saw One who loved me come and take my place, and put me into his place at once and I was forgiven for [illegible], and I know the fullness and richness of that forgiveness, for our Father saw me clothed in that righteousness which was called "the well of him that liveth and seeth me." She obeyed, and became the happy mother of a son. He grew to the age of thirteen. Then the Lord commanded his father to mark him in the [illegible] token of an everlasting covenant, which God had made with his father and this child. About this time three beautiful angels visited the tent, but the friend of God thought they were men, and though strangers, he begged them to tarry while until they were refreshed with food. It was in the heat of the day, and their feet were dusty with the journey. With haste the friend of God got water and washed their feet; then the wife quickly kneaded cakes, and the tender meat with the rich butter and milk was set before them under the tree, and they did eat. During this time they had not seen the wife of this noble man, therefore they said, "Where is she?" he answered, "Behold in the tent." The door was behind the angel, and she was listening there, and when she heard what they said, she laughed, hardly believing what they said could be true; for they brought glad tidings of a Promised One, and told her husband she should be the worthy mother. She was then ninety years old, and her husband ninety-nine. When the Lord told him, he also fell on his face and laughed, not that he thought it impossible as his wife did, but with a feeling of joy, believing God would do what he had said.

When this precious child of promise was born, they gave him a name signifying "laughter, or joy." When the little one was weaned his father made a great feast. While the feast was spread, the first born mocked and spurned the sweet boy. Perhaps his mother had told him no such a joyous time was made when he was weaned, but not to cast, for he being the first-born, all his father's riches would one day be his. But when the mother of the babe saw him mock, she said, "Cast out the bond-maid and her son, for the son of the bond-maid shall not be heir with my son." Soon after this she left the tent, taking with her the mocking boy, a pitcher of water, and a morsel of bread. For some time she wandered in the wilderness, the name of which signifies, "the well of the oath." At last the water in her bottle was all spent, and the mocking boy was perishing with terrible thirst, he was burning with fever, and his parched lips could hardly utter the cry, O mother give me drink: only a little, mother, would keep me from dying. She could not endure to see her only child die without relief, and she laid him under a shrub a good way off, and watched him there in hopeless despair, no doubt seeking every where for a lifegiving spring. Never before did she feel such an outcast wanderer, and perhaps what the angel told her when he met her at the fountain came into her mind, that this child should be the father of a multitude none could number. Could the angel have made a mistake? And then no doubt she reflected on his name, which the angel had given him. "God shall hear," and as she saw his life ebbing fast, she lifted up her voice and wept. Poor mother! Was there none to comfort her? None to harken to her bitter cry of despair. She is indeed a stranger, and none who fears." Never did she need the tender care of the angel of the Lord as now, and, my children, he was watching her from heaven—his dwelling place and called "what aileth thee." for God hath heard the voice of the lad. Arise, lift him up, and hold him with thy hand; for I will make him a great nation." And God opened her eyes and she saw a well of water, which was the water of life to a dying boy. Now my dear children, Paul or "the worker" has not told us about these two boys in God, or we would have read this as a mere history; but the outline of each life unfolded the wonderful purpose of God. This mother represented the Jewish nation and her boy like the Jewish nation had Abraham for his father, but were cast out or rejected because they mocked their Lord, who invited them to a heavenly feast of faith, called, "the glad tidings of the everblessed gospel." Now we behold a Jew, we see just such an one of whom I am writing; they are cast out of the tent of the friend of God, wandering like fugitives up and down in the earth looking, but in vain, to their mother, which is the law, for the life-giving waters. Nationally they have been dying for over eighteen hundred years, but blessed be God! they are not yet dead. No, dear children, the seal of the everlasting covenant is put on those children born after the flesh. The angel of the covenant will soon open up to them the fountain for sin and uncleanness, and the well of living water which will cause them to thirst no more. Their father's prayer will yet be answered, "O that Ishmael may live before thee." I will tell you in my next something about the [illegible] and her lovely Promised One. Trusting God will give you a wise and understanding heart.

I remain your affectionate teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

News continues to be received of disasters to ocean vessels during the recent great gale.

The Russian Government is not only making important territorial expansion in Central Asia,—but, in order to maintain itself there, has ordered 2,000 of Krupp cannon for its forces in that region.

LONDON, February 16.—A telegram was received at the War Office to-day from General Wolseley. He sends an account of the fall of Khartoum as given by a native eye-witness to the entrance of the rebels into the town. Khartoum, this informant says, was entered by El Mahdi's forces at day-break on the morning of January 25. General Gordon was killed by a volley from rebel riflemen while on the way from his headquarters to the Austrian Consulate. The Austrian Consul was killed in his residence, and the Greek Consul is held prisoner by the Mahdi.

The Mudir of Dongola now is convinced that Khartoum has fallen and that General Gordon is dead.

The Government has given the contract for the construction of a railway from Suakim to Berber to Lucas, Aird & Co. The contractors will provide all materials, which the Government undertakers to transport to Egypt. The work will begin immediately.

General Graham departs for Suakim on the 18th. He will be left the fullest option to the time to be occupied by the expedition in reaching Berber. It is stated, however, that General Graham intends to make forced marches all the way to Berber and Suakim; If he encounters Osman Digma and defeats him, General Graham believes he can reach Berber within twenty days.

At the council of war to-day, at the War Office, it was resolved to increase the Indian contingent to be dispatched to the Soudan for General Wolseley's relief to 3,500 men, in order to raise the total effecting force which General Graham is to have for his Suakim expedition to 11,500 men. The council also reconsidered the previous decision of the War office declining colonial offers of military assistance.

There is great activity in Osman Digma's camp. Women are being armed and drilled, and every possible preparation is making for an obstinate resistance to the British advance.

TORONTO, Ontario, February 15.—Special prayers were offered in all the churches to-day for the success of the British arms in the Soudan.

HOW LONG.

DR. H. BONAR.

Do they still linger—these slow-treading ages?
How long must we still bear their cold delay?
Streak after streak the glowing East presages;
And yet it breaks not the expected day!

Each coming year, with prophet-lip hath spoken:
"Prepare ye for, prelate, earth, and the sea!"
And yet no dome of blue remains unbroken,
Nor has it yet of the descending King!

Darkness still darkens; tempest and sorrow
The Pilgrimage gleams; the ark is arched full low;
And there is a cold and a growing sorrow
Creation's deeps, and it moves a bitter moan.

Gladness and earthquake, mire and wasting thunder,
Tears bright as rain, and the lightning and smoke,
One cry of war, and wreck, and plunder;
All tell us your dwelling is not here.

These scribbled words were not made for you to blot;
These notes were not made for you to blur;
There hole-and-corner for you are made hands to stop.

Flee ashes, give back to earth Reverent gladness,
The early freshness of its unsullied flow;
Take home your cark to it, with its storms and sadness,
And let those rebuild—Take their youth to new.

Come back, thou holy love, so rudely banished
When evil came, and hate, and fear and cruelty;
Return, thou joyous Hope, so quickly vanished;
Revive, thou life that death hath quenched so long.

Rest, rocked in the whole so harshly broken,
Thy wound thou knowest on you bright heaven;
Harp out on high the energy then spoken,
That tells of earth renewed and man forgiven.

Withdraw the veil that has for aye hidden
That upper kingdom from the nether sphere;
Remove the fellowship so long forbidden;
Oh God, thyself take up thy dwelling here!

REDEMPTION'S CROWN CONFERRED ON THE LAMB OF GOD.—Rev. v. 1-10.

The grandeur and sublimity of those marvellous scenes in the revelation of Jesus Christ, as he gave them to John, are not designed to affright and scare us away, and for fear of presumption lead us to say, "Such knowledge is too great for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it," but rather make us long to enjoy "the blessedness of those that read, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein." Truly "secret things belong unto God but those that are revealed to us and our children for ever."

The structure of the Book must be borne in mind; it is a symbolic representation of events, most of which are yet future. The first three chapters appear to me to represent the present state of the church during this dispensation—"the things that are." In chap iv. John is called to ascend through that "open door" into heaven, and there the solemn yet glorious future is unfolded before him—the Church glorified under the forms of the elders and the four living ones. But as to the time, it was then and still is in the future—"the things that shall be hereafter"—(or after these). It was a revelation of the glorious future, precisely as it shall be in God's well-ordered "Plan of the ages." For want of attention to this note of time, confusion has arisen, for neither the Church nor the white-robed multitude have yet been gathered and glorified. The throne that John saw differs widely in its character to the present throne of grace, where Jesus as our great High Priest continually maketh intercession for the saints, and waits till his enemies become his footstool, —still may poor fallen guilty sinners through grace become sharers in those royal honors and blessings Christ will bestow on his redeemed Church.

We do not wish to dogmatise on what is yet future, but we dare to trust most implicitly the prophetic words of the eternal God, and look for the full realisation of the pictorial revelation he gave to his Son, and which our loving Lord showed to his beloved disciple John. Historical events may have had in them a foreshadowing of the future, just as in Israel we have striking types of Christ, his work, kingdom, and glory. But the model is not the building—nor the type its own fulfilment. To the devout mind, the slain Lamb brings our Redeemer before us in his loving gracious character and work, and shows clearly that all future blessedness has the precious blood of Christ for its foundation. That wondrous word "Redemption" is far-reaching in its issues. Not only pardon and eternal life in resurrection to the believer, but the vast future of our world through all the ages rests on the finished work of Jesus Christ. There need not be a doubt, but in the day that Adam sinned he and the race in him would have perished but for the Mediatorial work of Christ,—He was "The Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world." The benign effects of that interposition pervades the universe of God through all time and eternity. The glory of the Divine character probably never could have been displayed as it has and will be but for the Cross, and the future of blessing may (after sin is entirely put away) be found infinitely greater than it could have been had man never fallen. But let us reverently gather up the teachings of this wondrous scene in the precious chapter.

1. There is a throne, and One sat upon it. Doubtless we most regard this as the throne of the Father, on which Jesus is now seated, but evidently it is surrounded by tokens that it has become one of judgment, for out of it proceeds "lightning and thunders and voices," a blaze of glory enshrouds its Occupant, so that he is to be looked upon as a Jasper and Sardine stone. The Jasper is clear as crystal, and some have thought this to be the diamond. The Sardine is of blood red, so that the glory of the Occupant would be something like that of Christ on Tabor. The scene has features in common with the vision of Daniel—c. vii. v. 9-11. Another important feature was the rainbow, in sight like unto an emerald—green is the color of the emerald, a pledge of mercy, mixed with judgment, of the Divine remembrance of the covenant with Noah for the preservation of the earth. Surrounding the central throne were twenty-four other thrones, on which were seated twenty-four elders clothed in white raiment, and each crowned with golden crowns. In front of the throne were seen seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, and which, John tells us, are the seven Spirits of God, or the Divine Spirit in his seven-fold fulness and energy. And then round about and in the midst, as if constituting the very substance of the throne, is the Cherubic symbol or the four living ones. From the place they occupy, the song they sing, and other glorious testimony of this Book, these represent glorified humanity, and give us a glimpse of the future honor and performance that awaits the ransomed Church of Christ in the coming ages. Our proofs and reasons for this view we cannot present to you in this brief discourse,—but we proceed. In the right hand of him who sits on the throne is a book or roll covered with writing, and sealed with seven seals. We have here brought before us one of the most graphic and imposing scenes that perhaps either heaven or earth ever witnessed. The august assembly of heaven is represented by Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the redeemed from among men by the inner circle of the four living ones and the twenty-four crowned elders; the heavenly hosts by the untold myriads of angels. God himself put some questions to Job, and gave information that throws some light on these wondrous occurrences. Please turn to Job xxxviii. 4-7, here is the creation of our world, and the time when these "morning-stars sang together and all these sons of God shouted for joy;" but this is not creation, but redemption's triumph: its graphic symbol is here in the person of the slain Lamb.

But the urgent question we want to have answered is, What is that sealed roll? Clearly it is not instructions for the creation of a new world—the great Creator can suffer no defeat, but he turns all to victory. He knows no failure in his plans and purposes, and suffers no surprise; hence creation's song closes with that burst of praise in chapter iv. verse 11, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Nor yet, as it has been well said, does that roll contain the fortunes of the Church—for there it is gathered around the throne. Nor yet can we regard it as prophetic truth—truly this is the heritage of the people of God. He has not uttered his prophecies in secret, in dark places of the earth! What sublime majesty there is in those Divine utterances recorded by Isaiah xli. 21-23, and xliv. 24-28! True, some of these glorious predictions that are yet to be fulfilled, like the message of the man clothed in linen to Daniel, have been sealed up until the time of the end. But here all the grand surroundings and the subsequent song demonstrates this seven-sealed roll to be connected with what Paul calls "the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 14). The time has now come to challenge the momentous question whether the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension, of the Son of God have really accomplished the Divine purpose, and given him the right to claim and wear redemption's crown? Whether as the Lion of the Tribe of Judah he can make good his kingly title, and dispossess the alien usurpers and oppressors, and righteously claim a redeemed world? We hold, then, with many honored students of prophecy, that the sealed roll, whatever else it may include, represents the forfeited title deeds of our lapsed inheritance—The alienated sovereignty of our world.

Is it not like the loving ways of our Heavenly Father and our blessed Lord to use such illustrations as we are most familiar with to set forth his plans and purposes? Take the teaching of Christ and his beautiful parables as proof. What do we still find among men? Property has its title deeds, which give its owners legal claim. Titles of nobility have their patents, which give their possessors the right to use them. Our colleges and learned professions give their diplomas—and where these are honestly obtained, show the stamp of those who bear them. Even regularly incorporated societies and churches have their constitutions and charters of the kingdom or empire, and prove a legal claim to the name and sceptre.

But we have here to gaze on a different scene to that which the world presented to the first Adam. Sin had wrought rebellion, ruin, desolation. But Christ the second Adam, claims to have subdued and recovered the forfeited and alienated world. Redemption was one great truth God taught Israel and the world through Moses; the sacrifices and institutions given to Israel clearly set this forth: the seven years Sabbatic of rest to the land, and the fiftieth year of Jubilee, strikingly illustrate the preciousness of redemption, for then the forfeited property was to be given back to the original owner. Beside this there was a privilege to the nearest of kin to befriend his relative and redeem the alienated inheritance. When the alienation took place, two deeds were prepared—one open, the other sealed,—these specified the price paid, and other particulars, and were signed by witnesses, and these rolls went into the hands of him to whom the property was made over, so that a sealed book was a badge of an alienated inheritance; and when any one representing the original proprietor could lift and destroy the sealed book by paying the price, and filling the conditions, he was called the "Goel" or redeemer, and he thus obtained the right to dispossess those found on it, and take possession. For proof of this we refer to the transaction in the prison by the prophet Jeremiah: see Jer. xxxii. 6-12; and for further illustration, Boaz and Ruth: Ruth iv. Now, the full testimony of Scripture goes to show that ours is a lapsed inheritance,—not only the Land of Israel, but "the whole world lieth in the arms of the wicked one." Satan set up a claim in his temptation of our Lord that if he would fall down and worship him all this power and glory would he give unto him; for, said the devil, "that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it" (See Luke iv. 5, 6.) But the second Adam rejected with righteous scorn the bribe of the old tempter. The grand purpose of Christ's manifestation was to "destroy the works of the devil." Man's failure has not given the usurper any legal claim, but to the great Creator and Proprietor has reverted the lapsed world, and there, on the right hand of him who sits the regal Sovereign of the universe, on that central throne, lays the seven-sealed roll.

Mark the holiness and righteousness here set forth. "Just and true are all the ways of the King of saints." Not till every claim is met by our "Goel," will he allow these deeds to pass out of his holy right hand: and now, amid the silence of the assembled court, a mighty angel is appointed herald, and with a great voice proclaims, "Who is worthy to open the Book and to loose the seals thereof?" This we regard as God's righteous challenge on behalf of his Son to the entire universe of being. But amid the ranks of angels, and the powers and principalities of the heavens, not one reply is made—mute silence holds them dumb. Throughout earth that mighty voice sweeps along. But, amid all its heroes and champions, philosophers, and scientists, its noble liberators and benefactors, not one is found to essay the awful task. And throughout the under-world (whatever that may mean) not one responds to the awful challenge, or dare even look on that sealed book. Where is the daring usurper who claimed as his own the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them? He, too, is silent now. Satan could desolate and ruin, but he cannot redeem! During that solemn the rapt roar wept. Must it all to fall at the last moment? Surely the forfeit must be heavy, the price great that has to be paid? It is! God's penalty for sin is death. No mere creature has power to lay down his life and take it again. Christ in resurrection claims that which his death has purchased back, and in power dispossess the usurper! Let angels, men, or devils, find fault with God's plan of redemption. They bow now before the majesty of its wisdom and the almightiness of its power. None dare dispute the title or bar the claim of him who waits before the ransomed universe under the emblem of a slain Lamb: that lives again in the power of an endless life. The once despised and rejected word made flesh, stands there to meet any rival claimant,—to answer any charge that heaven, earth, or hell can prefer against him, or show cause why Redemption's crown should not by his eternal Father be conferred upon him.

The crisis is past. One of the crowned elders comforts John with the assurance that the lion of the Tribe of Judah and the Root of David has prevailed, and the Apostle turns to look upon this illustrious Personage, and there in the midst of the throne and its glorified circle stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God. Under this complex symbol we have set forth the Glorified Redeemer. The sacrificial Lamb is the emblem of him who was dead, and behold he is alive forevermore. His one sacrifice is of eternal efficacy. He was crucified in weakness, but lives by the power of God, and is acknowledged as Christ the power of God, and Christ the wisdom of God—as the seven horns and the seven eyes so graphically symbolize.

In the mighty power of the Lion Prince of Judah he now advances to the throne of God and takes, in the power of accomplished redemption, those title deeds from the right hand of the holy and righteous God, and the loving Father of our Lord and Life-giver Jesus Christ.

O brethren, what a moment that will be, when the transfer is made in reality! Sin and Satan defeated and overthrown; the character of the righteous Father vindicated and glorified by his own incarnate Son, who is the sole executor of his plans and purposes! The right, the sole undisputed Sovereign right, to wear redemption's crown, by the royal charter of the eternal Father, and by the universal suffrage of redeemed humanity, and all the Princes and Potentates of the heavens, is conferred on our kinsman Redeemer, amid that reverent prostration of the four living ones, and the crowned elders, and the mute adoration of the holy angels, and as if the redeemed leaders of the new song of redemption strike their harps, having found the answer to the manifold-offered prayer (if misunderstood as it usually is)—"Thy kingdom come"—they sing as only redeemed ones, and resurrected and glorified ones, can sing, the sublime anthem, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth."

And now redemption's anthem has been sung by the redeemed, and the rapt silence of "the sons of light" they—the angels—make with loud voice the grand proclamation in response to the previous challenge. "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." And when the whole of heaven and earth in unison peals forth the sublime doxology, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Yes the truth will be told out at last! Christ and his Father are one! Then comes from the ransomed Church, in all reverent fulness, as they now at his feet, that grand loud, ratifying AMEN.—Thomas Vasey.

PALESTINE'S HIDDEN RECORDS.

The examination of the great dolmen groups beyond Jordan by the survey party seems likely to give important Biblical results. Some seven hundred rude stone monuments in all were found in Moab, and of these about two hundred were planned, sketched, photographed, and described. The question of the dolmens of Syria, and of Asia, and Europe generally, will be found treated in Captain Conder's new work, Heth and Moab, and his conclusions have been approved by several authorities who have given long study to this obscure subject. Generally summarized, these conclusions are: first, that the monuments in question are connected with the barbarous worship of illiterate, and therefore prehistoric tribes, the dolmens being altars and the menhirs rude idols or memorial monuments; this worship survived in Palestine down to the second century, A. D., and both the dolmen and the menhir are found by Captain Conder to be described in the Talmud in connection with idolatry; secondly, it is argued from the distribution of these monuments, which have entirely disappeared in Judea, and are rare in Galilee, but found in great numbers in the pagan districts beyond Jordan, that they represent the altars and pillars of Canaanite tribes, which the Book of Deuteronomy exhorts the Hebrews to destroy; thirdly, in the times of Abraham and Jacob, the Bible itself indicates the use of similar stone memorials by the early patriarchs, the stone of Bethel and the cairn of Mizpah being the most important examples. Finally, the discovery of such monuments on Mount Nebo and on mountain tops which appear (for other reasons) to represent the ancient Bamoth Baal and Baal Peor, as well as near Abel Shittim, and again near Dan serve to give an historical connection with the Old Testament narrative, since we know that Balaam erected altars on the first three named mountains, that Israel worshipped Baal Peor at Shittim, and that Jeroboam's calf stood at Dan. It seems not impossible that the Cairn of Mizpah may yet actually exist in Gilead, marking the spot where Jacob and Laban concluded their treaty, although the stone at Bethel has been vainly sought in repeated and exhaustive explorations in the neighborhood of the city.

The Rev. Canon Tristram says: The most important of recent discoveries historically has been the insertion of a new volume into the history of the ancient world, by the revelation of the great Hittite empire, the rival of Egypt and Assyria, but of which the very existence had been forgotten. Discovery has shed new light upon several hitherto obscure allusions in the Old Testament. This exhumed empire casts more light on Old Testament history than might at first sight appear. We find that the Hittites of Southern Judah, in and round Hebron, were but a colony left there when the nation forfeited a principal part of the Hyksos invasion of Egypt. How natural now the otherwise apparently pointless and needless remark, "Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt," i. e., Sân, was the capital of the Hittite or Hykso dynasty, and we learn that the Hittites founded Hebron on their way to Egypt. We now see that Abraham's friend, the courteous Ephron, belonged to a civilized and literary nation, whose character is illustrated by one of their towns being called "Kirjath Sepher," or "Book town." We know why the traitor who betrayed Bethel fled for safety to the land of the Hittites, i. e., to the Northern Kingdom, whose frontier city was Hazeph, on the furthest border of the Land of Promise. We see that Solomon in purchasing horses from Egypt, which he supplied to the kings of the Hittites, was providing for his northern ally. We understand the panic which seized the Syrian host besieging Samaria, under the impression that the Hittite forces were marching to the relief of the besieged capital of Israel; for the Turanian Hittites were the hereditary rivals and foes of Semitic Aram, whose powerful and dangerous neighbors they continued to be, and therefore the natural allies of Israel. We see now why David, after the conquest of Syria (Aram), at once had made alliance with the Hittite King of Hamath, an alliance which lasted till Hamath was subdued by Assyria. It was only a common danger which at last united Syria and the Hittite before the fall of Carchemish.—Capt. Conder, Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

The Days that are Coming, and that have Begun.

A word for THE RESTITUTION, this mild February morning in Western New York. Sad are the messages and sad are the errands of these days. Who of the readers of this paper has buried a beloved daughter? I am one of you now. My dear Edith is gone. A telegram comes to Westfield, Mass., like a lightning flash, saying she is dead, and again I am away on a flight of nearly half a thousand miles, to look on the pale face of one I have tenderly held in my arms all through infancy and childhood. I might have said to death, "Ho not thus ruthless. Invade not this peaceful home. Leave not sweet babes motherless. Lay not this pang of bereavement on a fond and faithful husband. Grieve not kind and gentle sisters." But then there comes the memory of all that higher and better train of teaching and reflection, that bids us regard the Lord's hand, his knowledge, his superintendence, his gentleness, and the grand and higher good, which he continually foresees and prepares, bringing goodness and glory out of the present mystery and trial. So I may kiss his hand even while tears are falling.

We are then coming nearer to the great transition day. Nay, has it not already commenced? What tidings strik our ears, of startling, of passing of catastrophe! Says a Philadelphia paper, "Let us hope that 1885 has crowded all its earthquakes and avalanches and dynamite into January"—and I enclose a paragraph which is but the confirmation of enlightened expectation of many who are awake to the gravity of the grand crisis.

"A UNIVERSITY VIEW OF DYNAMITE.

Dr. Richard T. Ely, professor of political economy at the Johns Hopkins University, was asked his opinion of the causes leading to the present condition of affairs in England. Dr. Ely has spent many years in the study of Socialism, and is one of the best informed persons in America on this peculiar subject. He considers the Socialistic-Nihilistic epidemic, which is extending over the civilized world, as a disease which, like the plague of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, made its appearance, and after a terrible reign ran its course and ran itself out in the reforms that its existence had necessitated. This mental disease has affected a set of men whose past life and training have made their brains a ready receptacle for such ideas and made them imagine that all that exists socially is wrong and needs correction, and imagine that destruction to all existing social structures is the most radical means to attain the desired end. They are the scum of creation, having nothing to lose or fear in a social upheaval, but much to gain. Dr. Ely believes that the world, America included, is about entering a terrible era of internal and domestic warfare such as never was seen before, and the end of which he cannot foresee. He thinks that in this country much depends upon the law-makers to prevent such a condition of affairs occurring here, and hopes that judicious legislation and a suppression of some of the most obnoxious monopolies here will go far towards warding off such a calamity.

Thus, while cautious about positive affirmations, we still look expectant, and almost assured, that the great period predicted by prophets long dead, and by numerals in stone, on the Pyramid hill over the Nile, is announcing itself. The sea of human discontent and passion simmers. A thousand restless elements are in partly secret, and partly revealed commotion. The world seems ready for revolution. Who can tell what the year 1885 may yet bring forth. Well may we be alert, and seeking the wisdom and favor, and providence of the all-ruling and powerful Ruler of nations. Here is the time for secret and personal confidence, attachment, attention, to the God of providence and grace, and communion with Him, everywhere, and ever. Whatever we say, we may be sure it is best to have faith in the heart. Whatever is our outward profession, we may well see to it that we are having constantly to truth, a gracious self-searching with God's help, and life-renewing by his spirit.

The untold possibilities of the deadly dynamite! What city in all the world is henceforth utterly secure? and the cities,—by what we will, are centers of influence and power. What secret conferences and confederations, appear to menace the fabric of society, and threaten governments and corporations with violence and destruction! How long will it be, ere will the acquired mastery of the course of balloons, the platters of destruction may drop into the streets of European or American cities even, the blocks and bombs of dynamite, that shall rend and wreak their mansions and cathedrals, their shops and factories and houses of business, churches, banks, docks, shipping, and every species of architecture, and handiwork of men. I speak at least of what is possible, and and will some extraordinary man-power rise amid the commotion, and be "wondered at" by all the world,—idolized in a moment of frenzied excitement and exalted by the enthusiasm of the mob? I need not assert it time will reveal all, and we can prayingly wait.

I have a letter from a valued friend, who mentions the noteworthy suggestion, he had read, that the scale of measurement changes at a point about the beginning of the low passage to the ante-chamber in the Ghizeh Pyramid. This thought I had expressed a good while ago. A change in the symbolising of an inch—from a year to a week, would make a mighty difference in the time requisite to get from the grand gallery to the ante-chamber. I nearly drop the hint, without making any assertions. And there is the sweetly solemn thought—our Lord may be at the door. Coming like a thief, what if he stands ready to call his friends, to himself in a moment in the twinkling of an eye! What if, as when he had risen from the tomb, and moved about unseen by men, he should be present, though invisible among us as he did reveal himself to his disciples, easily might he do it now, to such as he choose for the manifestation. He went up silently, seen by a handful in Bethany. There we may, subterranean thunder or comet convulsion, and in like manner as he went, so should he come again. That is to say, few may see him at first,—I mean comparatively few,—and there should be nothing in the least approaching to a "wreck of matter or crash of worlds," at that moment. But, well may the wary and wise, consider. If they speak but little aloud, they may think the more.

The probability is, indeed, that the beginning of the end has fully come. It is the explosive and incendiary period, however brief, that has begun, a kind of infernal ingenuity concocts and fabricates agents that can shatter the stoutest, proudest work of man. The political atmosphere of the world is sensitive and inflammable. Carbon, Oxygen, Hydrogen and Nitrogen, not alone abound in nature, and are combined by mischievous art with nefarious intent, but they are figuratively present in society, and in the atmosphere of international relations, and in the cabals of bad men plotting revolution and threatening the whole existing order and constitution of things. Evil men, and their machinations, may be used as instruments for the accomplishment of the Divine purpose.

"Let us watch and be sober." Well we may. Troubles try us. We are sometimes a little faint in our minds possibly. We pray the Lord to make his presence known, and end our sorrows and weariness. If our Lord be near, the wish is, that he will show us his way, show us his hand, show us his favor. Ah! it is a wonderful time.

We look to God for great things. May he show us things touching the King, for he is King of kings,—and kings to the King belong. And it is fit that such a King shall have his kings,—company, cavalcade, cavalry, counselors; whatever name they have, chosen of his own heart and prepared.

O. COLEMORE.

In order that persons, who are not familiar with Washington City, may not be deceived by the misleading and unreliable statements, made by a Rail Road Company that is striving, by false pretence, to divert travel which usually seeks better equipped and better managed lines; it is desirable that the readers of this paper should be made aware of the facts in regard to the terminal facilities of the Rail Roads entering Washington City.

The Station of the Pennsylvania Rail Road is the only first class Station in the city; it is located on Pennsylvania Avenue, in the centre of the town in close proximity to all the leading hotels, and within two minutes walk of the capitol building. The Station used by the other lines reaching Washington from the West, is a second-class building, located in a hollow, on a back street, and unless strangers arriving by that line take carriages, they will encounter more or less difficulty in reaching their places of abode.

No Rail Road in America has as good facilities as the Pennsylvania for taking care of a large volume of passenger business. This was established during the Centennial Exposition in 1876, and all intelligent people know that the Pennsylvania, through her superiority in construction, equipment and management, still holds her proud position as the leading Rail Road of the world.

Announcements.

The Third quarterly meeting of the North Iowa Advent Christian Conference will be held at Greeley, Delaware Co., Iowa, commencing Friday, March 20, and continuing over Sunday. The public are invited, especially the brethren and sisters from a distance. All are assured of a home that may come,

P. W. HOUGH.

To the brethren in Kansas. I intend to labor in Nebraska and Kansas during the months of March and April. I expect to be in the town of Wilmore, Gage Co., Neb., the last week in February. I wish the brethren in Kansas who wish me to visit them to write me at Wilmore, stating the town and county where they reside, so that I can make up my route, and take in as many places as possible. C. O. RAMSEY.

"Behold, He Cometh!"

Ages ago in Eastern land
They watched for him,
Listening off for his chariot wheels,
As the day grew dim;
And wondered if he would come again
From Olivet,
With welcoming words on their lips they looked,
And he tarries yet.

Every year across Winter's snows
With wistful eyes
Eager disciples have watched for him
To come from the skies.
Every year under Summer suns
They have sung his praise
And cried for him from their yearning hearts;
But he still delays.

They have died at their watch on the hoary hills,
And we take their place;
We long as they long the sunrise rays,
For the sight of his face.
The sad earth waits like a bride deserted
To-night her rest;
But the promise is sure, and he does not come
To us in vain.

Sometimes we look at the footing we've
And in fancy trace
The shining robes and the feet of brass,
And his glorious face.
We hush our breath when the gloaming comes,
And keep ahead near
The thrilling sounds of the blessed words,
But he is not here.

Yet courage, brothers, we have his word,
And he will not fail;
Let us be patient and watch and wait
Till our prayers prevail.
He will surely come, as he said he would,
In the light of noon;
And we shall forget our tears in his face
This waiting time.

In Debt, Therefore in Bondage.

My mind has been exercised on the above point for some time, and therefore write out a few thoughts for THE RESTITUTION, upon the subject. 1. To those friends so anxious to have us preach the law, to-wit, the Seventh Day Sabbath, etc., and by that means come under bondage to the teaching of a certain Mrs. White, instead of the words of Peter, that says we should "be mindful of the words of the prophets." Reason given "that they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." See 2. Pet. i. 19-21; iii. 2. A short time ago a certain Brother, a M. D., was called upon to prescribe for the daughter of a certain man, that had become a believer of the Sabbath Law, as presented by Helen White. He being a Rich man had paid his tithe, of $1,000, yet was in debt, or under bondage. For instance the Brother M. D., was preparing his medicine for said daughter on Saturday. Said Law Keeper came out on him (the same as they did on the Savior) and pronounced him a Sabbath Breaker. The Doctor was a man well posted in the Scriptures and a strong believer in the Restitution age, and quoted him Scripture to overthrow his Law, and his answer would invariably be, well Sister White didn't see it so. Oh, what bondage. Having commenced in the Law, he was a debtor to the whole law, says Paul in Gal. v. 3; also in iii. 10. "For as many as are of the works of the Law, are under the curse," also "that no man is justified by the Law in the sight of God." Why? "For the just shall live by faith, and the Law is not of Faith," see 11-12 verses. When the man came out against the Doctor for preparing his medicine on Saturday for his daughter, the apostle's language in 1 Tim. v. 8 would be applicable. But if any provide not for his own or kindred he hath denied the Faith and is worse than an Infidel. 2. Therefore let us examine ourselves whether we be in the Faith" 2 Cor. xiii. 5. Without Faith it is impossible to please God. Heb. xi. 6. Therefore let us earnestly contend for the Faith once delivered to the saints. Jude 3. Let us beware of those who by their means, may "overthrow the Faith of some."

O, for a Faith that will not shrink, etc.

3. The above Bondage overthrows the Truth of God in relation to the Future promises, that Faith points to. Enclosed twelve questions from Bro. A. N Seymour cut out of the World's Crisis. I would like to see them in THE RESTITUTION, in connection with the above indebtedness. Hoping that by the grace of God some may be saved from the many snares, set to catch away the good. Yours in the Faith.

JOHN T. ONGLEY.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

A brother has written to me from Vermont requesting me to send my eleven questions on the Sabbath to the Crisis, for publication, as he says there is something of a revival in his place, and some of the converts are in doubt as regards the Sabbath question. So I send them for publication.

1. Where is there one command of God to keep holy the seventh-day Sabbath prior to th time of Moses? Deut. v. 2, 3.

2. Where is there one command of God to any of the Gentile nations, either in this or any preceding dispensation, to observe the seventh-day Sabbath?

3. Where is there one command of God to any believer in Jesus Christ to observe the seventh-day Sabbath subsequent to the crucifixion of the Son of God?

4. Where does the Comforter, or Holy Ghost, or Spirit of truth, which is to guide the church into all truth, command any one to keep the seventh-day Sabbath?

5. Where is there even one text, in all the Word of God, stating that the ten commandments alone constitutes God's moral, holy, or spiritual law, which you say is our rule of conduct, and constitutes man's whole duty?

6. Where is there one text, in all the Living Oracles of God, stating that all his (God's) commandments, which are nine and stand fast forever and ever, mean the ten on the tables of stone, no more or less?

7. Where is there one text in the Blessed Bible that informs us that there was any more sanctity, holiness, or spirituality attached to the seventh-day Sabbath than there was to the entire sacrificial law? See Num. xviii. 6, 7.

8. Where is there one text in the entire epistles of Paul that expressly declares that the same moral, holy, just, good or spiritual law, or schoolmaster which brought us to Christ, which Paul positively declares we are no longer under, that it was fulfilled, that we are delivered from, that being dead wherein we are held of which Christ is the end, abolished, taken away, is now obligatory?

9. Where is there one jot or tittle of testimony in the second will, or testament, or law of the Spirit or of faith, denouncing any one as a sinner who violates the fourth commandment in the decalogue during the entire gospel dispensation?

10. Where is there one text in the Bible that says the keeping of the seventh-day Sabbath is the seal of the living God, and seal of this dispensation?

11. Where does Paul, who was an able minister of the New Testament, who preached the whole counsel of God and kept back nothing that was profitable to the church of God, teach seventh-day Sabbath keeping?

12. Where does God, from whom all wisdom flows; or where does Jesus Christ, through whom all wisdom flows to the household of faith, or church of God, or churches of Christ, ever in a single instance impose seventh-day Sabbath keeping upon the followers of Christ, or Christians, during the entire dispensation of grace?

I hereby offer a reward of fifty dollars to any seventh-day Sabbath keeper who will, with God's Word in their hands, attack a "thus saith the Lord" to the affirmative of the above questions. These questions have led eight ministers to my knowledge out of the seventh-day Sabbath, and scores of private members, and kept hundreds out of that seventh-day delusion, which is a pure speculation, nothing more or less. There is not one solitary particle of evidence, in the Old Testament or the New, that enjoins that day upon the Christian world. And I positively know it; and I challenge the whole Sabbatarian brotherhood to meet the above deeply important questions. Were it possible for them to do this, I should certainly embrace and preach the seventh-day Sabbath at once.—A. N. Seymour.

TO THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH,

Dear Brethren, where ever you may be, having been feasted so bountifully from the Master's table at our assembly, by blending it with the annual meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and the reading of the Report of the same by our very much esteemed, and worthy brethren, and colleagues in the glorious cause of Christ, that like old father Jacob, when he saw the wagons, which Joseph sent to take him into a land of plenty in time of famine, I was made to cry out often, in my very inmost soul, it is enough, and but for the desire of the church here, to keep a regular Report of her annual meetings, and to give expression somewhat of my own appreciation of the Lord's doings, which is so marvelous in our eyes, I would still say it is enough; but as it is written of the ancient worthies if those were to hold their peace the rocks would cry out.

But suffice it to say, for the encouragement of all of the dear ones who have left all for the Kingdom of God, that they hold fast the beginning of their confidence of rejoicing firm unto the end, that a few names here (as it were in Sardus who, we trust, have not defiled our garments,) owing to our scattered condition, and to afford an opportunity for those of like precious faith to visit us, believing as we do that in union there is strength, we established the custom of holding annual assemblies here, in the border states, some twenty-five years ago; the first meeting was composed of two delegates from Maryland, and two in Virginia were the assembly was held. The writer was the only public speaker, not knowing at the time of any one else, referring to the number (who are to day as dear to me as the apple of my eye.) I remember saying, that we had as many as the Master started with. We had several such meetings, which through much tribulation, arising from an earnest contention for the faith once delivered to the saints, gradually increased in numbers, who had hold of the hope set before them in the gospel. These meetings were generally well attended, and respected by them that were without, but all this while our cry to God was, the harvest is great, and the laborers are few; and so fervently prayed the Lord of the harvest, to send forth more laborers into his harvest, and I believe, brethren, in answer to that prayer we come in possession of THE RESTITUTION. God bless the originators and supporters of that mighty herald of the word of the Kingdom and name of Jesus Christ; for we were often made to cry out with the holy seer of old, Lord they have killed thy prophets, dug down thy altars, and I am left alone, and they seek my life, but through it thank the Lord we found that he had reserved to himself as it were, seven thousand who were not bowing their knees to the Image of Baal, and still having an ardent desire for a more extensive alliance, like Abraham of old the friend of God, I set out in the wilderness of the people, not knowing whither I went, but I believe the Lord directed and prospered my way.

I expressed myself that way in our annual meeting, and Brother Samuel Wilson said he believed so too, that the gospel car had been running over since we gave it impetus, on our tour with them, and may God speed it on its way; and I believe his prayer is being answered—right here. Brethren I would say, let us not be backward in going out like Isaac of old, to seek a bride for our Master, for some of them were lead from their love of truth to visit us, at our annual assembly in 1883.

At which time, and place by mutual consent of the assembly, the Association, or the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, was formed, a step I believe to be approved of God, praise his holy name, for in one year, by the time of our next annual assembly of the Church of God, which convened on Sept. 5 to 7, 1884. On Saturday the sixth, was the most enjoyable day of my forty years ministry; for in the reading of letters from kindred spirits, who could not be with us in person, and by expressions given by the much loved ones, who were present, a voice arose in the house of the brethren; Winchester Va., from twenty-two states, and Canada and also from the Old World, in the interest of the Church of God, the pillar and ground of the truth, and thank the Lord I was not alone in the enjoyment of this rich blessing, for all the dear brethren and sisters composing the assembly, seemed to catch the inspiration; so that all were filled with brotherly love for each other, and praise and gratitude to God from whom all blessings flow, and to him be all the glory. Amen. This spirit characterized the meeting to its close; and now brethren, one and all, permit me to say, that we are living in the joyous anticipation, when the time comes of a still more general meeting of the household of faith, that we may have another refreshing, from the presence of the Lord. ## THE DESTINY OF MAN.—PART II.

I next propose to show briefly, by indubitable testimony, that this doctrine of immortality of man has not been universally received by professing Christians in all ages. Amobius, who lived in the third century, arguing against this doctrine, asks, "Who does not see that what is immortal and uncompounded, can feel no pain, and that which feels pain cannot be immortal? For souls are of middle nature, as Christ has discovered to us, and such that they can die if they know not God, or be delivered from death if they embrace his gifts and favors." The Council of Lateran, A. D. 1513, passed a canon which shows there was a class of Christians at that time who did not believe in inherent immortality. The following is an extract:—

"Some have dared to assert, concerning the nature of the reasonable soul, that it is mortal; we do condemn and reprobate such, seeing that the soul is immortal and we strictly prohibit all from dogmatising otherwise."

It was at this Council, held 1,500 years after Christ, that the proper immortality of the soul was first made an article of the Christian faith; up to that time it had been left as open question by the Church. Martin Luther met this doctrine with a vigorous opposition, and, in language more forcible than polite, rejected the dogma of man's inherent immortality. "I permit the Pope," he says, "to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful, such as that the soul is immortal, with all those monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman Decretals." Muller, the great German philosopher, writes—"The Christian faith in immortality is indissolubly connected with the promise of a future resurrection from the dead, and this we abundantly prove elsewhere." Bishop Tillotson says—"The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than expressly revealed in the Bible." Bishop Watson says—"That the soul is naturally immortal is contradicted by Scripture, which makes immortality a gift dependent upon the giver." Olshausen says—"The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the name, are alike unknown to the entire Bible." Archbishop Whately says—"To the Christian, indeed, all this doubt would be instantly removed if he found that the immortality of the soul was revealed in the Word of God. In fact, no such doctrine is revealed to us. The Christian's hope, as founded in the promises contained in the gospel, is the resurrection of the holy." Archdeacon Blackburn says—"All these fine-spun notions of the immortality of the soul, and all the artificial deductions from that principle, teach nothing but the art of blowing scholastic bubbles." Lord Macaulay thus writes in the Edinburgh Review—"As to the other great question—the question what becomes of a man after death—we do not see that a highly-educated European, left to his unassisted reason, is more likely to be right than a Blackfoot Indian. Not a single one of the many sciences in which we surpass the Blackfoot Indians can throw the smallest light upon the state of the soul after the animal life is extinct. In truth, all philosophers, ancient and modern, who have attempted, without the light of Revelation, to prove the immortality of man, from Plato down to Franklin, appear to us to have failed deplorably." Professor Moses Stuart says—"The light of nature can never scatter the darkness in question. This light has never yet sufficed to make even the question clear to any portion of the benighted race—whether the soul of man be immortal or not. If there be any satisfactory light, then, on the momentous question of a future state, it must be sought from the Word of God. After all the toil and pains of casuists and philosophers, it remains true that the gospel, and the gospel only, has brought life and immortality to light."

The common assertion and popular belief that all men possess an instinctive faith in the immortality of the soul, which gives to every man a natural "craving" or "yearning" for a future life, if not found amongst the heathen, which I have shown that it is not, is wanting also in professing Christians generally, although they have been taught to believe that they are all "immortal souls." It may be that some of the most thoughtful and meditative amongst them sometimes entertain the "splendid hope" of the Laureate, that they are immortal, and can never die, but their number must be very small indeed. Suppose we were to question every one of the 123,000 professing Christians who attend Flemington racecourse on the last Cup day, and to ask each one separately, as he or she came out of the grounds—"Are you conscious of any craving or yearning after immortality? Do you ever feel a longing desire for a future life, any deep-seated conviction that you will live for ever in a future state?" How many in that vast concourse could honestly answer in the affirmative? Perhaps one in a thousand. And suppose we put the further questions—"Do you ever think of eternity at all? Do you ever contemplate what will become of you when this short, troublous life is ended?" How many would acknowledge that their minds were ever exercised on this subject? Certainly only a very few. And yet we are told by writers and preachers that every man has that within him by nature which tells him with unerring certainty that he is an "immortal soul," or an "immortal spirit," and must live for ever, either in happiness or misery, in a world beyond the grave! The fact is that very few persons call, ing themselves Christians ever reflect upon the subject of a future life at all, although they have always professed to believe man to be immortal, because they have been taught this as an article of the Christian creed. They are not influenced in any way by the considera-ion that "it is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment;" and scarcely ever allow it to occupy their attention or their thoughts.

That some of the most earnest and thoughtful of men in all ages have had a strong desire or yearning for a future and immortal life, even when they did not believe the doctrine, such as Cicero and Seneca, is freely admitted, and may be accounted for by the fact—which we may learn from the Christian Scriptures—that every man is constantly capable of immortality, and this natural capacity for living again and for ever beyond the grave, of which such men are intuitively conscious, would probably create in them the desire to possess and enjoy eternal life. But even if it were true, which it is not, that this longing or strong desire for immortality were universal, or even general, amongst men, it would afford the strongest possible evidence that man is not by nature immortal; for men who long for a thing, do so solely because they do not possess it. If a man be famished, he longs for food to appease his hunger but so soon as he has satisfied his wants, he no longer desires it. We cease to desire a thing when we have obtained it; and if by nature we possess immortality, a craving or yearning for it would be an impossibility. No true Christian was ever known to long for immortality as a thing to be greatly desired, because he is conscious he has it already in reversion, as the gift of God: and if any do covet this blessing, it can only be because they do not possess it.

The point, then, at which I have arrived is this.

1st. That it is contrary to historical evidence that "all mankind, heathen and Christian alike, believe in the natural immortality of the soul of man."

2nd. That "all the philosophers, ancient and modern, who have attempted, without the light of revelation, to prove the immortality of man, from Plato to Franklin, have failed deplorably."

3rd. That neither heathens nor Christians, ancient or modern give any evidence that they had, or have, any natural or instinctive desire or longing for a future life and immortality.

4th. That we can know and learn absolutely nothing concerning man's future destiny, except what we can gather from the Christian Scriptures, in which this popular doctrine of man's immortality cannot be discovered; or, in the words of Olshausen already quoted, that "the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the name, are alike unknown to the entire Bible."

Ten years ago, in some sermons I preached and published on this subject, I used these words:—

"I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that this common and popular belief in the natural immortality of the human soul is not supported by a single text, or a single line, or word, in the whole Bible, from the first of Genesis to the last of Revelation; and moreover, that it is essentially a pagan doctrine, first introduced in the early days of Christianity into the theology of the Church by learned Christian writers and preachers, who borrowed it from the great heathen philosopher Plato, whose disciples they were, and is, therefore, the doctrine of man, and not of God; that we have overwhelming evidence in the pages of Holy Writ that the human soul is not by creation and nature immortal, that it is not the condition of man's being that he should live for ever, either in happiness or misery in heaven or hell."

This statement I now repeat; it has never been refuted, and never can be. Attempts, indeed, have been made to deduce the doctrine of the natural immortality of man from the Scriptures, but they have all "deplorably failed." The following incident will illustrate, in a remarkable and curious manner, the kind of dilemma in which learned Christian men are sometimes placed when driven to defend this doctrine from Holy Writ:—In the year 1867, a newspaper, published in the South of England, offered a reward of £100 to any person who should produce a text or passage of Scripture, proving the immortality of the soul. An old man, who had been servant or gardener, to clergymen all his life, but who had just been thrown out of employment by the death of his last master, and who could not of himself find any such text in the Bible, presumed upon his clerical connections so far, as to address the following letter to no less a personage than the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom he fully expected would be able, if any man could, to furnish him with the necessary passage, if only he would condescend to do so:—

MALDON, March 16, 1867.

ARCHBISHOP,—I believe from what I have heard that you are very kind to the poor, and willing to help the needy. Upon this consideration I take the liberty to apply to you. I do not ask for money, though I greatly need that at present. I was church clerk at Belphan, in Essex, etc., I have had a very large family to provide for, but my last master, the Rev. Dr. Robinson, dying in 1866, has thrown me out of employment, and I am now considered too old to take a situation. Under these distressing circumstances I shall feel very grateful if you will take the trouble to help me in the matter I have to apply to you about. I believe that you will if you can. There is £100 offered to anyone who can show any passage of Scripture to prove that man is immortal, or has an immortal soul. Can you tell me where to find such a passage? I assure you if I can get the £100 it will be of great service to me.

An answer will greatly oblige your humble servant,

JAMES BARNETT MANN.

In a few days the Archbishop's chaplain wrote to Mr. Mann to say that his letter had been received, and that his grace suggested 1 Cor. xv. 53—"This mortal must put on immortality"—as a likely passage to secure the reward! "I was satisfied," says Mr. Mann, that the Archbishop did the best he could for me. I need hardly point out that the text selected by the highest ecclesiastical authority in England to prove the natural immortality of man, is one which, above all others, proves his inherent mortality, and that there is no immortality for any until the resurrection, and then only for those who have died in the faith of Christ, and have been changed from the mortal to the immortal nature by the putting on by this mortal of immortality, and by this corruptible of incorruption. This passage proves conclusively that man, in the opinion of the Apostle Paul, is mortal now; but that, when invested with eternal life at the resurrection, he shall become immortal—shall put on immortality, or, in the words of the Book of Common Prayer, "shall rise to the life immortal," which he could not do if he were immortal by nature. St. Paul also tells us that "God only hath immortality;" and if God, the Creator, only hath it, how can man, the creature, possess it, unless it be given to him? He also declares that "life and immortality were brought to light through the gospel;" and if this be so, then it follows that only through the acceptance of the gospel can man become immortal, and hence he teaches us that those who, "by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, shall have eternal life;" and, clearly, if we are to seek it in order to obtain it, we cannot possibly possess it by nature.

The uniform teaching of the Christian Scriptures is that man is by nature mortal—soul and body—the "soul," or animal life, perishing with the man at his natural death; that every man who hears the gospel may become immortal, and live forever with God under certain conditions—viz., by spiritual union with the Christ through a living faith, evidenced by a Christ-like life of holy obedience to his commands and precepts; that immortality is the free gift of God in and by his Son, given to his people at the resurrection of the just; that there is no eternal life or immortality out of Christ; and that, without "Christ in him the hope of glory," man must "perish everlastingly"—must, in the words of the Christ himself, be "destroyed, both body and soul, in Gehenna," at the great day of doom, when God shall "give to every man according as his work shall be."

So long as Christians continue to adhere to the Platonic, unscriptural, and pagan doctrine of the natural, or inherent, immortality of man, whilst rejecting the equally Platonic, unscriptural, and pagan doctrine of conscious and endless suffering for the lost of our race, so long will they be universalists in creed, and disciples of Plato and Tennyson. They cannot be otherwise and retain their Christianity; and it will only be by abandoning their position as believers in the indestructibility of man as an immortal creature, or an "immortal soul," or "an immortal spirit," that they will be free to accept the only true and spiritual doctrine, that man by nature is mortal—body and soul—and only becomes immortal when he is made "a new creature in Christ" at his (baptismal) birth, through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and obedience to that gospel by which "life and immortality were brought to light."—Christadelphian.

*A man becomes immortal at his baptism only in the sense of his changed relation to futurity, and even that is contingent upon a patient continuance in well-doing, to the end.—ED. C.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, it establishes the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the covenant of the oath—at the restoration of Israel. The literal resurrection of the dead at the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked to eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for our salvation.

GOD'S KINGDOM UPON EARTH.

That God saw fit to claim a kingdom upon earth, every Bible student well knows. Also, that this kingdom he began visibly to organize, or select, from among all the kingdoms of the earth; when he called Abraham out of the land of the Chaldees into the land of Canaan (B.C. 1921) and constituted him the visible living head of that people whom he purposed to call his own.

Centuries passed after the first selection before God's purpose had sufficiently developed, to represent a kingdom.

When the time arrived Jehovah told his prophet Samuel to go and anoint Saul as king over his people. This he did because the people had become dissatisfied, and wanted to be more like other nations and have a visible king. One who should go before them to battle. Saul occupied the throne till his wickedness caused the Lord to reject him and appoint David in his stead. David proved to be more acceptable to God, because he did as nearly executed his will. Nevertheless David was but a subordinate king—appointed by God to rule over his chosen people.

Before Solomon was born, God told David that he would give him a son to sit upon his throne. And when David's years were ended, he verified that promise and appointed Solomon to rule over his people Israel. In no sense could Solomon have occupied that throne by hereditary right—had the kingdom been virtually David's, because Solomon was not his eldest [illegible] who would have justly claimed it [illegible] time, but he was David's [illegible] ill.

[illegible] the Lord [illegible] ath to say to [illegible] son of Nebat, the servant of Solomon, that he would rend his kingdom out of the hand of Solomon on account of his idolatry, and that he would give him, Jeroboam, ten of the twelve tribes. This was the last appointment Jehovah made of a visible king over his people—who after this—until their final subjugation and captivity, they were known as the kingdom of Israel and of Judah.

Saul, David, and Solomon were appointed by Jehovah to rule over his chosen people before the ten tribes revolted. By the same authority Jeroboam was appointed over the kingdom of Israel. This was the last appointment that God made of a king to rule over his people. After this he permitted the son to succeed the father on the throne until B.C. 588, when Zedekiah the last of the kings of Judah, was taken captive by the king of Babylon. Since that time the kingdom of Judah has been no more a nation, but has been in an overturned condition, as predicted through the prophet Ezek. xxi.

In all the history of God's kingdom there is not a word claiming for any of the kings a right to either make or abrogate laws, (which right belongs to all rulers and their advisors). They claimed no God-given right to occupy the throne of his kingdom. They had no right. They were appointed to occupy the throne for a time, but the kingdom was not theirs. The promise was given that the heir should come through the family of David, and he came. There was but one heir to that throne and kingdom, which fact is plainly taught by that heir in Mark xii. 6, 7, and Luke xx. 13, 14. This is the heir, not the last heir, or one of the heirs, but the Heir.

This fact the disciples well understood when they said, Lord wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? This kingdom belonged to God's firstborn, as we are told in Ps. lxxxix. where David is told, verse 21, that God's faithfulness and mercy shall be with him, and that his horn (or seed) shall be exalted. See Luke i. 69. This clearly has reference only to Christ as also the three following verses.

25th. I will set his hand in the sea and his right hand in the rivers.

26th. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the Rock of my salvation.

27th. Also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth. This cannot possibly refer to David, for in no sense was he God's firstborn. In the flesh he was the youngest son of Jesse. He was but the second king of Israel, and he is still sleeping in his sepulchre, while his Son and Lord, God's firstborn is exalted to his Father's right hand.

All through its first existence the kingdom was the Lord's, and when this kingdom is again brought to light in each verse 20–28, it is still the Lord's kingdom, and the people are his people, and his servant David (David's seed) is their prince forever.

Also in Dan. ii. 44, we read that the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed. Again in Dan. vii. 27, and the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him.

Here again the kingdom is referred to as the Lord's—and in Ezek. xxi. God asserts he he will give it him whose right it is." The whole tenor of Scripture goes to prove that the "him" here referred to is the Christ of God, the One referred to in Heb. i. as having inherited a more excellent name than the angels. That which is inherited comes by nature and is not obtained by labor.

By no legitimate construction of language can it be shown that any mortal man ever occupied the throne of God's kingdom upon earth only by his, God's, appointment. He appointed David, then he appointed Solomon, and he gave David the assurance (the sure mercies of David) that his Son should come through his, (David's) line according to the flesh. And this promise was fulfilled. But let it be understood, that this grant gave to Jesus no claim to his father's throne. This fleshly line of descent was nothing more than the visible medium, through which the deathless heir should come. Claim to an endless immortal inheritance could not rest and centrein the flesh. Christ's claim to that kingdom rests and centers in the fact that he is the Only begotten Son of God, and all the hope given to us to be made partakers of the blessings of that kingdom rests and centers in faith in him as the Son of God by begettal.

If his be a claim resting only on his fleshly descent from David, ours can be no higher. If he be but the head of a multitudinous body and his claim rest only in his fleshly descent from Abraham and David, the members of that body, if of necessity the same in all particulars, must also come from the loins of David according to the flesh. This conclusion is inevitable, and if the premise be correct, the conclusion is that faith is made void and all we Gentiles are left without the gate. Submitted in love of the truth.

THEORIES OF INSPIRATION.

A Bible Student's Reply to the Editor of the "Biblical Exegetist."

Mr. Robert Ashcroft, editor of the Biblical Exegetist, a professed Christadelphian publication to be issued monthly at Liverpool, England, has given in the initial number (January, 1885), an elaborate article on "Theories of Inspiration," very plausibly presented, but so manifestly at variance with the accepted theories of inspiration as to call forth considerable criticism among Bible students; and my own thoughts having assumed a definite form, perhaps no apology is necessary for their presentation for the consideration of the lovers of Bible truth.

Inspiration is defined by Webster to be "a supernatural divine influence on the prophets, apostles, or sacred writers, by which they were qualified to communicate moral or religious truth with authority: a miraculous influence which qualified men to receive and communicate divine truth."

Plenary Inspiration is "that kind of inspiration in which the inspired person is incapable of uttering or communicating any error with the divine message"—Inspiration in which there is no mixture of error. Verbal Inspiration is "that kind of inspiration in which the very words and forms of expression of the divine message are communicated to the inspired person."

There is little need that I should specially enter into a defence of either of these forms of inspiration. They have been ably advocated and successfully defended by devout and erudite Bible students of the present age and of the ages agone. Those able defenders of the past were shining lights in the times in which they lived and wrote, and the illuminating effects of their works are seen in the aggressive strength and power of the Holy Scriptures to-day as they are spread broadcast over the world in every known tongue, venerated as the Word of God, and accepted as infallibly pointing out the path of life. This has been one of the results of the belief in the plenary inspiration of the sacred writings. In the minds of the vast throng of earnest defenders of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, both in the ages past and present, the acceptance of the theory of Verbal Inspiration has not been deemed necessary to establish satisfactorily the grand truth that the Holy Scriptures emanated from God, are Divine in their origin, and of binding authority upon every enlightened mind.

Candor requires the admission that there are some weighty objections urged against the Verbal Inspiration theory as applicable to the whole divine volume. A defence of this theory is not our present purpose; yet, we must confess, that it is difficult to understand many portions in the Holy Scriptures on any other than the Verbal theory. But whatever objections we may entertain regarding the Verbal theory, we cannot fail to recognize the fact that the doctrine of the Plenary Inspiration of the sacred writings has withstood the assaults of time, and is to-day more generally accepted by christendom notwithstanding the pitfalls of modern free thought with which they would swallow it up; and it grows brighter and more invincible, like the well furnished and continually used armor of a valiant knight; and we may assure ourselves that it will continue, to satisfy us of the truth and reality of Revelation, until the Apocalyptic angel shall proclaim the end of time.

In opposition to both the Plenary and Verbal theories of inspiration the editor of the Biblical Exegetist sets forth a theory of the partial inspiration of the sacred writings, which will clearly appear from the quotations that I shall very freely make from the article in question. The unbiassed reader can easily determine how far his position harmonizes with reason and revelation.

After a brief definition of the Verbal and Plenary theories of inspiration the editor of the Biblical Exegetist says:—

"We have no means of determining the "modus operandi of Inspiration. (1).... There may have been diversity in the means made use of to insure the needful accuracy and completeness when the sacred writers took the pen in hand. (2) Persons in the mesmeric state are under the control of the operator, who can make them say, or write, or do whatever he may please. It is therefore not inconceivable that the prophets were similarly controlled by the Spirit at the time they wrote or dictated to their amanuenses. (3).... The inspirational power would, therefore, probably come upon the writers in silence, and it would serve as an infallible guide to them for all its purposes. (4) This of course would only apply to the original documents, (5) and, in our view, to only such parts of them as could not otherwise be produced." (6)

1. Had the Divine Author of the Holy Scriptures deemed it desirable that we should understand the modus operandi of inspiration, or any good be subserved thereby, I cannot doubt that we would have been afforded the means of fully determining such modus operandi. While, for some inscrutable purpose of Providence we are in no respect enlightened on this particular feature of inspiration, we are not warranted in doubting the fact itself; that the divinely chosen writers "spake as they were moved" by the Holy Ghost, and that their words are those of Divine authority.

2. We can readily concede the claim, and feel doubly assured by God's character and purposes, that in His infinite wisdom He used such means as to Him seemed wise and good to secure "needful accuracy and completeness" to the work of the sacred writers in giving us the Holy Scriptures. It is because we believe that the sacred writers were wholly under the control of the inspirational power of the Holy Spirit, and their writings, be they history prophecy or doctrine, were inspired of God, that we feel an undoubted assurance of the "accuracy and completeness" of the work that has come from their hands; and we may confidently accept it as a true record.

3. For the sake of argument—in the absence of proof either pro or con—in order to agree as far as possible with the editor of the Exegetist, we may admit the probability that the prophets and sacred writers were controlled by the Spirit of God, at the time they wrote, similar to persons in the "mesmeric state," who are made by the mesmerist to say and write whatever he may chose to impress upon their minds. But I am unable to see how the admission even of such a probability helps our author's position, but, rather, is inconsistent therewith: for:—

4. We may reasonably conclude, if this hypothesis is true, that the "inspirational power" of the Spirit directed them infallibly in all their utterances; that they unfolded the mind of Deity so far as he desired to reveal it to the human family; and, although clothed in their own language, the truths they uttered were no less the inspired Word of God—a Plenary Inspiration—than if they had transmitted to us the exact words of God—a Verbal inspiration.

5. Admitting such to have been the manner of the [illegible] inspirational power; that it operated, if you please upon the sacred writers on the mesmeric theory; admitting as true that is applied to "the original documents," it becomes most presumptuous for our English editor and preacher to claim that it applied "only" to those documents, unless, indeed, he will venture to affirm that they have lost their inspirational character by transmission to the generations then unborn, in which case Christianity to-day has no inspired rule of faith and practice; and, indeed, if this is true, it rests upon a foundation of sand—a foundation insecure and in danger of being swept away by the floods of skepticism. Let those believe this who can.

6. But the height of illogical reasoning and absurdity is reached by the editor of the Exegetist when he claims that notwithstanding the admission that this "inspiration power" came upon the writers" "as an infallible guide," it applies "to only such parts" of "the original documents" "as could not otherwise be produced." Our editorial friend, however, has signally failed to tell us—as he should have done to make his statements of any logical force—what reason we have for believing that any portion could have been produced, with the authority of God, without the "inspirational power" of the Holy Spirit as an infallible guide. When he has shown (as his position to receive any degree of approbation requires him to do,) that any part of the sacred writings has been produced without "the inspirational power" of the Spirit of God, then it will devolve upon him to enlighten the world by showing what portion is of human production, that in interpreting the will of God we may determine how far we have been deluded by accepting the work of men in our simplicity as the work of God. And, further, he will owe it to the world to inform us when and by whom was imposed upon us human writings for the word of God.

Again: Because interpolations and various readings have appeared the editor of the Biblical Exegetist would have us believe that the Verbal and Plenary inspiration claimed for them is untenable. He says:—

"Interpolations and various readings abound, though these things are never of such a character as to destroy the integrity of revelation itself. So far as they are concerned, therefore, the Verbal and Plenary inspiration claimed by some for the original scrolls "is clearly untenable."

As these "interpolations and various readings" are human additions to the work since it came from the hands of the inspired writers, and, properly speaking, are no part of the original Scriptures, it is difficulty to see how these interpolations can render either "the Verbal" or "Plenary inspiration ....untenable" or how the claim of the inspiration of the sacred writings in any way affected thereby.

The admission, which he is compelled to make by existing facts, that these "interpolations and various readings," though they abound "are never of such a character as to destroy the integrity of revelation itself," amply sustains the theory of Plenary inspiration, which holds (as he states it) "that the work of the Holy Spirit under whose influence the sacred penman wrote, was such as to guard against substantial inaccuracy, while left to their own manner of expressing the ideas of the Spirit. Otherwise it is difficult to account for peculiarities of style and phrase by which the work of the several writers is characterized."

It is a wonderful fact, which speaks volumes for the Divine character of the Scriptures, that in the ages of darkness and superstition through which the sacred writings have passed, and notwithstanding the efforts of the enemies of the Bible to uproot it by fire and blood, and the labor of its professed friends to bend it in support of their theories and opinions, until "interpolations and various readings abound," yet they have utterly failed to "destroy the integrity of revelation itself."

The testimony of Bently, given in another part of the Biblical Exegetist is eminently worthy of consideration. He says: "The real text of the sacred writers does not lie in any MS. or edition, but is dispersed in them all. 'Tis completely exact indeed in the worst MS. now extant; our is one article of faith or moral precept either perverted or lost in them; choose as awkwardly as you will, choose the worst by design, out of the whole lump of readings." S.

(To be concluded.)

I am still in the field, scattering the grand truths of the word of God. But what the harvest will be I cannot tell. Some appear to hear with delight, others are bitterly opposed. The word of God is truly "sharper than any two-edged sword," and these "weapons are not carnal but mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strong holds, casting down imaginations and every high thing," such as immortality of the soul, going to heaven at death, endless torture, and all other imaginations and traditions of men. Truth cuts to the very quick. Men rage and writhe under the keen edge of the Word of God, why, because they believe a lie and love not the truth. We are truly living in the last days, when they will not endure sound doctrine.

I incline to think the hundred and forty and four thousand is nearly filled, and then the rapture of the saints. The marriage and the glory forever. Then commences the grand restitution, when all the kindreds of the earth shall be blessed through the seed (Christ and the church). Paul calls the gospel good news of the kingdom of God, because under the kingdom reign of Christ and the church this blessing is to be carried out, and all the kindreds of the earth are to be blessed, and death will not interfere or cut off from the blessing of resurrection and coming to the knowledge of the truth in love. Jan. 25, 1885. the writer preached the funeral discourse of the child of Bro. Piles of Chatauqua Co., Kan., about four months old, a promising little boy. We tried to comfort the mourners by treating on the resurrection, and showing that the children "will come again from the land of the enemy to their own borders." etc.

Miscellaneous.

The platinum mines of the Ural Mountains, in Russia, now supply the world with that metal. It is shipped first to dealers in France and England, where it brings about $28 per pound of pure metal. It is necessary to refine it carefully; in the crude state it consists, according to a recent analysis, of 75.1 of platinum, 1.1 palladium, 3.5 rhodium, 2.6 iridium, 6 osmiridium, 2.3 osmirum, 4 gold, 1 copper, and 8.1 iron.

The camphor laurel, a native of China, and the tree from which most of the camphor of commerce is obtained, seems to have been introduced successfully into California, one tree in Sacramento having attained the height of thirty feet. The wood, every part of which smells strongly of camphor, is light and durable, not liable to injury from insects, and much favored by cabinetmakers.

A GEORGIA METEOR.

The most remarkable meteor that we have ever heard of was seen by a number of our townsmen on Monday night Feb. 9th about 10 o'clock. From several persons who saw it, we gather that it presented the appearance of a round ball of fire, without a tail, about the size of a small house, moving from the southeast to the northwest. When it had gone nearly out of sight in the distance it was seen to explode. Some two or three minutes after it disappeared a loud rattling, rumbling noise was heard, first in the southeast and ending in the northwest. The sound was heard by numbers of persons besides those who saw the aerolite.

STRANGE DISCOVERIES IN BRITISH GUIANA.

Mr. Fr. F. im Thurn, the well-known explorer of British Guiana, has made another expedition to the interior of [illegible] Mountain. When he was last able to communicate with a friend in Georgetown, which was in the early part of December, he had ascended the slope of the mountain to a height of 5,000 feet. He says that it was a lovely spot, a very garden of orchids and of most beautiful and strange plants. On his way to Roraima, he passed through an Indian country in which he found an extraordinary state of things. There were no missionaries, but the Indians had built churches of their own, in which for six hours a day men, women, and children were engaged in perpetually repeating the Ten Commandments and the Creed, while occasionally members of this strange congregation would increase the general discord by singing praises or hymns. Mr. im Thurn points out that while there is good work for well-selected and educated man to do among these unsophisticated natives, the tendency of the system which they have established among themselves is to withdraw them from regular habit of industry. The traveller found a portrait of Mr. Gladstone in one of the churches.

A STORM CLOUD UNDER THE FEET.

The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "Last summer a party of travellers were visiting Switzerland, and one morning they set out about three or four o'clock to see the sunrise on Mount Blanc. They had not proceeded far when a violent thunderstorm burst upon them, and so alarmed the party that they wished to return at once. But the guide said, 'No, the storm is descending; if we go on we shall soon be through it; trust me and follow me.'" Some of the party demurred, and returned to the shelter of the hostelry, but a few trusted and followed their guide. As they continued their ascent they had to pass through the thundercloud, and very dark and terrible it was; the lightning played around them, and the thunder echoed among the mountains, but the guide had but one word for them, 'Trust me and follow me.' Very soon they stood above the cloud, and looked down on the storm as it raged in all its fury in the valley where their friends had remained. And now the first rays of the sun began to flush the snowy peaks, and a great solemnity fell upon them. No one had the courage to break the silence, full of the awful grandeur and sublime beauty of the scene before them, and when at length one of their number spoke, his first words were, 'It is well worth all we have come through.' So, dear Christian friends, when trials and troubles darken your path here, by faith catch one glimpse of your dear Master's face, and you too will say, 'It is well worth all we have come through.'"

BUILDING A BRIDGE OVER THE JORDAN, IN PALESTINE.

U. S. Consul Merrill, at Jerusalem, reports that, during the past summer, an attempt has been made to build a bridge over the Jordan at Jericho. It has progressed slowly, however, as the lumber furnished had to be brought from Europe, and carried on the backs of camels from the port at Jaffa to the river. The Consul suggests that there might be some market in Palestine for American lumber, as the Austrian and Turkish lumber now used there is of poor quality and high priced, but the country is probably too poor to make much of a market for anything at present; the whole yearly imports at Jaffa, which is the Mediterranean seaport for Jerusalem, amount to only about $300,000.—Scientific American.

The Wonders of the Sea.

The water of the Red Sea is of an intense green color, and so transparent that even at the depth of two fathoms the sea bottom is distinctly visible. It is carpeted with coral-plants of many varieties, with sea-weeds of many species, and with numerous other "wonders of the deep" of both the animal and vegetable kingdoms. The infinite diversity of form and color and arrangement, still further varied by the restless medium through which it is seen, makes a sight which the eye never wearies of contemplating. This beauty is still further enhanced by the thousands of brightly colored fishes which flash through the waters. They are truly marvelous for their beauty of form and color. To say that every color of the rainbow is represented is an utterly insufficient comparison. Not only are there violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange and red fishes, of purest hue, but there are numbers which combine two or more of these colors. One little finny denizen of most graceful form was of a delicate cobalt blue, with fins and tail of a fine lemon yellow; there were others with dark blue stripes on a rich golden ground; some black, and silver spots; some red, with green fins and tail; others with secondary and tertiary colors mingled in most elaborate patterns and delicate proportions; while one species, having a rich, warm green for its prevailing hue, had fins and tail edged with a genuine prismatic spectrum.

Nor is beauty of form and color the only charm. The sponges are of excellent quality and are gathered for commercial purposes. The pearl oyster is likewise abundant, and pays the diver for his labor and risk in going for them among the sharks and "stingarees." The precious tortoise-shell is also found in large quantities. At present these treasures are garnered by a few lazy blacks, who float upon the waters on their log-made catamarans, and seem only to go down into the water when they are too lazy to sit upright on their clumsy crafts.—Correspondence of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Reason of Infidelity.

In the course of my experience in society, I have never met with an instance where a man took up the argument as an unbeliever in the truth of Christianity, but it might be traced to an irregularity in his moral conduct; thus confirming a frequent remark of mine; "When a man is opposed to Christianity, it is because Christianity is opposed to him."—Green's Reminiscences of Rev. Robt. Hall.

"Now" is the only word ticking from the clock of time. "Now" is the watchword of the wise man. "Now" is the banner of the prudent. "Now" is the call of God. "Now" is the solemn admonition of eternity. Let us keep this little word constantly in our mind. Whenever anything is to be done, we should do it with all our might, remembering that "now" is the only time for us. It is indeed a sorry and dangerous way to get through the world by putting off till to-morrow, saying, "Then I will do it." This will never do. "Now" only is ours; "then" may never be. "Now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation."

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Feb. 26, 1885.

We are now entering a most important period in the world's history. Indeed we expect that 1885 will unfold startling events. Their proximity is indicated by the shadows cast before. Let us support THE RESTITUTION and make it truly the herald of our coming King.

ARTICLES have accumulated on our hands this winter. We must give variety and keep our readers posted up on the events passing in the world, and on the signs of the times. Though occupying a little room this week, we have studied brevity. We cannot dispose of long articles as readily as of those that are shorter. Will do as well as we can.

SHORTLY after the occupancy of Egypt by the English, we expressed it as our humble opinion that England had gone into Egypt to stay. To that opinion we still adhere, and shall adhere till the stern logic of events compels us to essentially change it, or retract it altogether. While confessing that present appearances are calculated to annihilate even the faintest supposition that English prowess will hold its own in the land of the Pharaohs, our views of prophecy compel us to cleave to our expressed opinion. It is not the first time that a British force has met with an overwhelming disaster. In the winter of 1842, an army of 4,500 combatants and 12,000 camp followers, were so completely destroyed in Afghanistan, that only one individual, Dr. Brydon, reached a fortification, Jelalabad, held by an English brigade, to tell the tale. The fall of Khartoum, the death of Gen. Gordon, and other reverses on the Nile, are calculated to stimulate the English government to use the same energetic measures to retrieve her disasters that she used after the Kurd-Cabool and Jugdaluk passes became the graves of her retreating army before the Afghans. The whole Eastern Question is quite likely to open up into an "irrepressible conflict" that will result in the liberation of Palestine from the trampling feet of Turkish despotism. The Porte is very angry at the Italian intervention that has taken place without any regard whatever to the Sultan's rights. The Turks are perfectly satisfied that Italy is to have a quid pro quo in some colonial acquisition—say Tripoli—for lending a helping hand to England in annexing Egypt. At any rate, England is now brought to confront at least Islamism in Africa under the leadership of the Mahdi. It is now seen that the true line of invasion is from Suakim, on the Red Sea to Berber on the Nile, over which route of 240 miles, a rail road is immediately to be constructed. Among the events looming up in the near future are the downfall of Moslem power, the political enfranchisement of Palestine, and the return of a portion of the Jewish nationality to the land covenanted to Abraham and his seed. Russia and England, the two great world-powers of the last days, are moving as resistlessly as the march of fate to their predestined work in the winding up scenes of Gentile times. The grand trend of events now is through all the awful sublimities of horror and unparalleled tribulation, as throes and birth-pangs, into a re-genesis for our earth, and the introduction of the ages of glory. The "age-lasting" wintry period, during which the fig tree of Jewish nationality was to be fruitless, is about merging into spring time; and though some cold blasts may hinder the developing buds for awhile, yet the summer time of the renovation age is now proximately near.

"We are living we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling
To be living is sublime."

Periods of frightful calamity have marked the changes of dispensations. The contemporaneous graves of the ante-diluvian myriads were made in the drift and slime of a world-drowning flood. The Savior shed his tears of anguish over the doomed city Jerusalem. In view of last day desolations the harps of prophecy have sounded notes of wailing agony that have echoed across the ages.

"Earth what a scenery lies before thee,
None like it in the shadowy past;
Of all the throes that ever tore thee
Even though the briefest—is the last!"

I expect to be in Kansas sometime the first of March (D. V.) Will hold a series of meetings at Millerton, Sumner Co. Could probably visit some other points while in the state if desired. Address at Rensselaer, Ind., until March 1st, after which Millerton, Kan. If Bro. Thos. Shively or Sr. Elizabeth Hornady are in Kansas City and will write me their whereabouts, I will try to call on them in passing. D. T. HALSTEAD.

THE HANDFULL OFFERING.

(The wave offering, usually termed; lit. το δραγμα or η απαρχη, the First Fruits offering.) Its symbolic Parable significance, and its relation to the Levitical census, census or poll-tax paid into the temple treasury.

The word translated "handful" has a wonderful significance in the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Covenant, and a clear understanding of this parable significance is absolutely essential to any intelligent apprehension of the typical numbers, weights and measures of the Bible. Then, moreover, such an understanding throws a flood of light upon the grand underlying doctrinal principles of God's plan and purpose in the creation and redemption in this cosmos, as thus revealed in his word.

The word δραγμα is a term originally taken from the everyday nomenclature of the farmer, and in this use meant as many stalks of grain as the reaper could well grasp in his left hand as he reaped with the right, and this significance passed over to the απαρχη or "first-fruits" offering, as a descriptive term, because it appropriately designated the kind, amount and form of such an offering, as well as the manner of presenting it to the priest who was to offer it "acceptably." Then the term passed over into the commercial use as a unit of weights and measures, and has come down to us in the name of a particular coin common to the Greek and Roman civilizations, to-wit, the drachme (English drachm, one-eighth of an ounce Apothecaries weight, one-fourth of an ounce Averdupois) Greek word δραγμη. Both these words δραγμα and δραγμη are verbal nouns derived from the verb δρασσω, meaning "to grasp with the hand."

The rationale of this use as applied to weights and measures seems to have been as follows. As a unit of quantity, first in measuring grain, the number of grains of wheat that a man could hold in his hand was found to be about 66, and taking this as a rough standard unit, convenient multiples of this came to be used as common standard measures, and the weight of such a handfull employed as a unit with its multiples as a common standard of weight. However this may be we find in the drachm and its kindred word dragma, [illegible] standard of value and measure as old as civilization and the Bible, and we also find that the word dragma, traced further back than its immediate derivative, namely its verb, goes back to another earlier and more primitive verb δραω, which means "to do with the hands." So that "the handfull" has the additional intrinsic meaning of "a handfull of something that the hand has done," and this in a good sense always implies utility.

Now see how beautifully the legal coin in which the κηνσος "poll-tax" was paid into the royal treasury of the temple under the Levitical order of things, typified the relation man sustained to God as a useful subject of his kingdom. This legal coin as we learn in various places of "the Old" and "New" was a διδραχμον, or two δραχμαι, "two handfulls," both hands full of utility or useful goodness. No faith without works, no works without faith is the lesson. If both hands are full of an offering to God our King, we cannot very well be serving Mammon at the same time. And remember every man who was "a citizen" of this state or "order of things" must pay this κηνσος or poll-tax.

Christ even paid it, though a "Son of the King," and of the "royal household" for whom it was ministered. Read his conversation with Peter in Matthew when he sent him to "fish" for the money to pay it with.

The coin found in the fish was a "stater" which is the equivalent of a τετραδραχμον or four δραχμαι, just enough to pay his own and Peter's tax. This tax, bears in mind, was not "the Roman tribute," but the Levitical "poll-tax." Again, the δραχμη was nearly the equivalent of the later δραχμα or Latin denarius, and was as nearly as can be computed in our currency sixteen and two-third cents, and two of these, whether you have in mind the δραχμη or the δραχμα would equal thirty-three and one-third cents.

Now bear in mind that Christ gave thirty-three and one-third years, or all of his natural life to God's ministration, most useful ministration, in behalf of mankind, and finally the life besides in which he was enabled to do this work of ministery. Here are both handfulls to a purpose indeed: and now you see why Christ is called the δραγμα or απαρχη, or "the handfull, first-fruits offering," and why he was "lifted up," as the old "hand-full" offering was, "acceptably" unto God: and do you not see why God pays any and every laborer who obeys the call "go work in my vineyard" (not "one penny") but one δραγμα or one δραχμη? He gives him all that was promised under the "Old Covenant" of law, the handfull of life. "The one who conforms to that law shall live by the law."

But the "Good Samaritan" ministers two denarii or two drachmæ, two διδραχμα, two handfulls, all the usefulness, all the beneficence all the life, in short there is under the "two covenants" the "Old" and the "New." His great "Archetype." The Christ, finally by giving his life acquires "the official qualification" and "ability" under "The New Covenant" to minister the "New" life itself as well as all that belongs to it. He thus becomes "The Last Adam" or the "New Adam," or the "Alpha" of the "Telos" of God's plan and purpose, of which "the handfull" or "το δραγμα" is the most primitive type, or the unit standard by which to estimate man's significant value in his relation to God and his brother man, in all the wonderful harmonic problems of life. The thought when once grasped is seen to be not only beautiful, but like all true beauty, charms us with the simplicity and grandeur of its utility and wisdom.

"THE APOSTLES' CREED." OMISSIONS OF POPULAR TEACHING. ITS ASSERTION OF THE PRIMARY GOSPEL DOCTRINE FOR SALVATION.

In approaching this subject, as presented by Brother G. R. Kramer, the pastor of "The Church of the Blessed Hope," in Brooklyn, (whom I report from memory, in brief) it is duty to say that it is not to "build on another's foundation." No, No, but to demonstrate our faith in that "foundation" by echoing, expanding and emphasizing, "the sure word of truth and grace" as embodied in this oldest embodiment of apostolic teaching.

Unbelief and misbelief abound. Hence we take this method to arrest attention. Our teaching is not modeled after the great foretold apostacy, but rather is the faith of the first Christians, who were "called and chosen and faithful" even unto martyrdom. We teach the Bible—the authorized, and acknowledged "Word of God." "Every Scribe instructed unto the kingdom"—is to bring out [illegible] new and old," new to those not instructed; but "old" as it was received from Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles. The wisdom from above."

Hence, "we believe and therefore speak!" It is a grand thing to believe revelation. It involves the confession of God, and our own future life! The end of evil—and earth restored!

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth!" etc. Then, these men were not agnostics, know-nothings; but believers in the profoundest truth of revelation; like Abel and Enoch, Abraham and Isaiah, Peter and Paul, and their fellow apostles.

The authors of this creed were not on the negative side of these things; but believers of the most positive, profound and absolute truth, touching the world, the system of things in which we live.

"We know and we know, "that every house is built by some one, and that he, who built all things, is God." Heb. iii. 4 Because he has condescended to tell us so in his word—because, as every article of furniture, or food, or apparel, in our dwellings, has had a competent cause; so there is no great world in the all comprehending system of "heaven and earth," by accident or by its own blind, unoriginated forces—because he has been revealing himself in every age—to Adam and Noah—Abraham and Israel, and through Jesus and his apostles. Now to crown this good reason for believing that "God, the Father Almighty, made earth and heaven," we still see and have them! The earth is our abode with its ever-hanging heavens! They exist in exact accord with the record! Heat and cold, summer and winter, seed time and harvest, day and night, and man in "dominion." Thus also in the order of the ages. The Patriarchal, the Mosaic and the Christian—the law and the gospel! Thus of the "four" great Gentile dynasties; Babylonian, Persian, Grecian and Roman.

Thus further of the decline of centralized power, in Pope and Grand Turk, and other centers; and thus also of "saying to the lightnings, go and say here are we," by telegram!

"What is truth?" A statement according to the facts! Hence this creed comes; "I believe in God the Father, maker of heaven and earth!" We believe and have the demonstration in the Bible record; and in the grandest facts of all time, that sustain the record! "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel who only doeth wondrous things, and let the whole earth be filled with his glory!" Amen.

The Fatherhood here has relation especially, to the name and work of Jesus Christ, that follows.

The dreamy delusion that the Fatherhood and Sonship are universal, annuls itself and undermines redemption! For if all are "sons and daughters" by natural birth—of the earth, earthy—then Jesus and his redemption are needless. On the low plane of Old Adam, and sin and death, there is naught better than to eat, drink, die, and be dead! It is on the higher plane of God the Father—of Jesus Christ his only begotten Son that any can hope to be born again to the promised life everlasting in the world to come!

To preclude misapprehension, it should be stated that this is my statement of the subject, here [illegible] three days ago. The doctrine of the sermon was divine, and the diction was worthy of the theme. J. B. COOK.

FLORAL CITY, Fla.

Editor Restitution:

Please change my address from Denver, Miami Co., Indiana to Floral City, Hernando Co., Florida. To all the loved ones in Christ, whose love and sympathy smoothed the rough journey of life I send a hearty greeting. The "Land of flowers and sunshine" has been my home since Dec. 16. My daughter Cora and I coming in advance of my wife and son who arrived Jan. 31st. At the age of 51, and with a broken constitution, I began life in the true pioneer style. Our home is in a dense pine forest, 25 miles from a rail road, recalling vividly the scenes of my boyhood days, when our pioneer home was carved out of the dense forest in Fulton Co., Indiana. I stood in the doorway of our humble home and counted five deer that passed near our house. The steady onward march of civilization will soon drive these timid creatures to the everglades where for a brief while they escape the relentless hunter, while their present haunts will become a blooming garden teeming with golden fruit. This is not an ague-ish tural county, but when more fully developed will produce corn, oats, rye, potatoes and a variety of fruits and vegetables. Orange culture however is the leading industry, and is destined in the near future to become a vast enterprise. Ten years ago the half [illegible] was comparatively in its infancy, now it is attracting the attention of capitalists from all parts of the world. But if Florida had been shorn of every attraction she possessed except her lovely winter climate she would still draw thousands from the cold chilling blasts of the north to enjoy the balmy air of this rightly-named land, for each day since I came here beautiful roses freighted the air with their delicious perfume. The average temperature noted at morning, noon and evening for 17 days in Jan. was 66. This country may be justly called "God's Great Laboratory" in which is manufactured heavens pure vitalizing tonic, sweet pure fresh air. One feels like praising God with each heartfelt inspiration. No wonder that infatuated Spaniard Ponce DeLeon thought the fountain of perpetual youth must be located here. See how this bountiful gift of God is manufactured. The cold winds sweep down from the snow covered mountains of Mexico, coming in contact with the warm waters of the Gulf they are not only properly tempered, but freighted with salt, and then are wafted through the pine forests whose balsamic odors impart the finishing touch, thus forming a tonic that is almost a certain cure for catarrhal troubles, and incipient stages of consumption. But the fadeless fields of immortality are not here. But the sure promises of God warrant me in believing that the time is near when the Life-Giver will "make all things new," thus while enjoying the one blessing I anticipate the other.

CONCERNING A HYMN BOOK.

In answer to many inquiries concerning the progress made toward the issuing of a Hymn Book, I will say the committee appointed to supervise the publication have not received sufficient financial encouragement to warrant them in going forward with the work. Most of the matter necessary has been selected and can be used, if considered appropriate, at any time the necessary means can be secured to insure the publication of the work. The amount of money pledged was only about half enough to issue the book, according to the plan adopted. There is little doubt but that the sales of the book when published, would more than pay the cost of publication, estimated at one thousand dollars; but that amount would have to be raised before the book could be issued.

Very Truly Yours.

THE EGYPTIAN WAR.

SUAKIM, February 21.—Enormous numbers of hostile Arabs are massing at Tamai, but few of the enemy are at present noticed along the coast hereabouts.

LONDON, February 23:—A dispatch just received from Cabul says no little uneasiness prevails in Government circles because of the remarkable numbers of Russians pouring into the Afghan capital, ostensibly as travelers. It is the general belief of the natives that the alleged Russian travelers are military men, and their visits are connected with the rumored scheme of Russia for the annexation of Afghanistan.

The following is from a Paris correspondent of the Evening Journal. As will be noticed, it is the writer's opinion that England will now plan and determinedly execute a more masterly line of policy in the contest with the Mahdi than that slow and easy one that has resulted so disastrously.

"The serious journals agree that the fall of Khartoum is a check to the power and influence of England; she can not follow up the Mahdi, and must not retreat. Time will show. More important is the opinion of military men; they have, from the first, condemned the force sent out, as inadequate, and the Nile route a mistake. Berber, from Suakim, across the 240 miles stretch of desert, was the road naturally marked out, and the one that must be now taken, though at the twelfth hour. Khartoum, it is stated, must be occupied by the British, no matter at what cost, and it will be a costly undertaking, though that will not conquer El Mahdi, who will retreat deeper into Central Africa—to Kordofan and Darfour.

The French make no mistake as to the political consequences of the fall of Khartoum. English opinion will sweep away any Government that even hints at a scuttling out of either Upper or Lower Egypt; and she will now terminate her hesitating and vacillating policy of the last two years, and which has ended in the present misfortune. She has not only military but diplomatic check to wipe out, and numerous snubs to resent. In a word, for the French the triumph of the Mahdi implies the establishment of the English protectorate in Egypt."

THE TEMPLE IN THE MILLENNIUM.

I have long felt that the typical meaning of many parts of the Tabernacle of Moses, and the Temple of Solomon, pertaining, as they do, to the future of Israel as a nation, will be better understood by that people in a coming day, when the veil shall be uplifted from their hearts, and when, in unbroken unity, they shall "worship Jehovah in the beauty of holiness," and all that see them shall acknowledge that they are the "seed the Lord hath blessed (Isa. lxi. 9). If this be so of the Tabernacle and Temple of old, how much more of the Temple of Ezekiel?

At the best, we must say, "Now we know in part only." For the full understanding of these Scriptures we must wait till the day dawn, when the shadows shall have fled forever, and "we know even as we are known."

While there are many difficulties connected with a literal interpretation of Ezekiel's vision—difficulties which I believe will only vanish with its fulfilment, they are few indeed compared with those which belong to what may be called the spiritualizing theory of interpretation.

That we have symbolism in the temple of Ezekiel is admitted. But are we on this account to deny its literalness?

The tabernacle of Moses, the temple of Solomon abound in symbols, but had they on this account no literal history? Were they mere ideal houses? Can we think that when Ezekiel is told to write or pattern the form in the sight of the people, it was not with a view to its ultimate material construction?

In seeking to determine the question of the futurity of Ezekiel's vision, we shall do well to notice what is declared to be the condition of the nation at the time of its fulfilment. And in doing so, we shall, I think, be forced to the conclusion that it answers exactly to that which is elsewhere described as pertaining to millennial times. For example, in the latter part of the thirty-ninth chapter of the prophecy, where we have the introduction, so to speak, to the visions of the chapters which follow, we read, "Therefore, thus saith the Lord, Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel," etc. So in chap. xliii. 7. The vision is seen as relating to a time when "God will dwell in the midst of His people forever, and the house of Israel shall no more defile His holy name."

Further, it is seen to be the time of the return of the glory to the land. The visions of Ezekiel as described in the first part of his prophecy, which he saw from the banks of the river Chebar (chap. i.), contain a striking contrast to those which he beholds when brought into the land of Israel and set on a "very high mountain." The most prominent feature in the first series of visions is the departure of the glory, the visible symbol of Jehovah's presence, first from off the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, where it fills both the house and court (Ezek. x. 3, 4).

From the threshold of the temple the glory ascends and stands above the cherubim (ver. 18). Finally, he beholds the glory leave the city and stand upon the Mount of Olives, that mount whence the Lord of glory ascended, and upon which His blessed feet shall again stand when He returns!

Before the departure of the glory the prophet is shown the abominations of Jerusalem, on account of which God had withdrawn from it His presence. The picture also given in the middle chapters of Ezekiel's prophecy of the state of the city and people at this time is fearful indeed.

By the same gate from whence the glory departed it is seen returning. "Afterward He brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east, and behold the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and His voice was like a noise of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory; and the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east" Ezek. xliii. 1-4.

It has been truly said, "the solution of this usually thought intricate and difficult prophecy is the departure and return of the Shechinah."

That Ezekiel's temple receives the returning glory, proves its futurity. (The second temple had no Shechinah.) Moreover, this determines the time of its erection. The return of the glory is inseparable from the return of Him who is Himself the "Glory of His people Israel," and in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The destruction of Solomon's temple followed the departure of the Shechinah. The destruction of both city and temple followed the withdrawal of the glory in the person of the Lord Jesus. Answering to the return of the glory as seen in Ezekiel's later vision, Christ will come again from heaven in like manner as He went away, and as King of Israel reign over a repentant, restored nation; a people "all righteous," who shall no more defile His name with their abominations.

No mention is made of the Ark of the covenant in Ezekiel's temple. The type is wanting; the Antitype supplies its place. Jehovah Jesus dwells in the midst of His people—they need no ark as the symbol of his presence. A full display of His Divine glory is ever before them. "And it shall come to pass when ye be multiplied and increased in the land in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord; neither shall it come to mind; neither shall they remember it; neither shall that [the ark] be done or made any more" Jer. iii. 16.

No veil is spoken of, nor any day of atonement; neither is any candle-stick or lamp stand mentioned in Ezekiel's temple. The Lord Himself will be the light thereof. Israel's "true light" will then have come, and the glory of the Lord have "risen" upon His people.

Perhaps the most remarkable fact about the temple, as seen by Ezekiel, is its position. It is not in the city or its suburbs, but in that portion of the oblation (or that part of the land allotted to sacred purposes) called "Most Holy." The entire oblation is about fifty miles square. "All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand reeds. Ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square, with [including] the possession of the city" Ezek. xlviii. 20; xlv. 1.* This is further divided into three portions, to each of which is ascribed a different degree of sacredness. The northern or upper division, which is called the "most holy oblation," is set apart for the priests, the sons of Zadoc. "The priests, the ministers of the sanctuary, who shall come near to minister unto the Lord: and it shall be a place for their houses, and an holy place for the sanctuary; and the sanctuary of the Lord [the temple] shall be in the midst thereof" Ezek. xlv. 4; xlviii. 18. The middle portion of the oblation is set apart for the Levites. This is called the "holy oblation." It was of the same dimensions as the priests' portion—viz., twenty-five thousand reeds,—or about fifty miles in length, west to east, and ten thousand reeds, or twenty miles in breadth, north and south. The lower or southern part of the oblation, a strip of twenty-five thousand reeds, or about fifty miles in length, east and west, and five thousand reeds, or about ten miles in breadth, north and south, is thus described: "And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth, over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane [or common] place [i.e. not strictly sacred to priests] for the city and suburbs, and the city shall be in the midst thereof" chap. xlviii. 15.

The city will have twelve gates, named according to the twelve tribes of Israel, beyond which, extending for a little more than two hundred and fifty reeds, or a half mile, will be its suburbs. There are no cities of refuge in the millennial arrangement of the land of Israel. But the year of jubilee is to be observed Ezek. xlvi. 17. The name of the city from that day shall be "Jehovah Shammah"—"The Lord is there." It will be "the city of the Great King, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth" Ps. xlviii. 2. Seeing the establishment of the millennial city and temple in the land of Israel is inseparably bound up with the glory of Christ, with whom we are heirs, and joint heirs, the promise thereof should set upon our hearts to excite expectation and to animate hope. The glories of the millennial reign on earth form a part of the joy resulting from the travail of Christ's soul as Redeemer; they are fruits of His sufferings, the reward of His pains. He who refused to take the kingdom of this world from Satan, as the price of His obedience, shall possess the sovereignty thereof as the reward of His obedience. That He shall reign, whose right it is, is our solace now in view of all the disorder and confusion which prevail in the earth.

Oh, let the glories of this prophecy teach us to fasten our thoughts more upon the sure things of God, as those who look for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God Heb. xi. 10, into which all the redeemed shall be ultimately gathered. The city which Abraham looked for and John saw coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. Eternal city is an earthly one, [illegible] away. This [illegible] and eternal, [illegible] while its chief glory [illegible] is there. "God Almighty and the Lamb are the Temple of it" Rev. xxi. 22. Just so. The chief glory of the millennial city, the earthly Jerusalem, will be as its name indicates, "Jehovah Shammah—the Lord is there."—Frank H. White, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

OBITUARY.

CUSHMAN.—At her home in West Plymouth, at 11 o'clock Saturday night, Feb. 14, 1885, Maria A. Cushman, wife of John V. Cushman, aged 34 years, five months and 27 days.

Sr. Cushman was the daughter of James and Mary Buffum and was born in Plymouth in which place she continued to reside most of her life. Her illness was borne with Christian fortitude, although its continuance was quite eighteen months, during which she was deprived of the privilege of meeting with the household of faith in their place of worship. The funeral took place on the Monday following her death. The services were conducted by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION. The weather was extremely cold and the snow blockade on the roads also hindered some of the relatives from attending the funeral.

JACKSON.—Feb. 18, 1885, in Aurora, Illinois, at the home of her brother, A. L. Jackson, Stella H. Jackson, of Bright's disease of the kidneys, after an illness of one year aged sixteen years, one month and eighteen days. Stella was the daughter of the late S. L. Jackson of Aurora. MRS. EVA M. NORRIS.

I am under many obligation, to you for sending me your valuable paper so long without money, but will be more punctual in the future; and you can depend on me being a yearly subscriber for your paper as long as I live, and have the means, and the paper continues as good as now, for it is the only paper that contends for the faith once delivered to the saints, and the life as it is in Christ Jesus.

A Mite Story.

Only a drop in the bucket,
But every drop will tell;
The bucket would soon be empty,
Without the drops in the well.

Only a very little penny—
It was all I had to give;
But, as pennies make one dollars,
It may help some sweet to live.

A few little bits of ribbon
And some toys; they were not new,
But they made the sick children happy,
Which has made me happy, too.

Only some outgrown garments—
They were all I had to spare;
But they will help to clothe the needy,
And the the poor are everywhere.

God loveth the cheerful giver,
Though the gift be some small result;
What doth he think of his children
When they never give at all!

The British Crown is not the property of Queen Victoria, but of the nation. All the crown jewels are kept in the Tower of London. The room in which they are kept is a ground-floor apartment, with somber stone walls eight feet in thickness. It is small, and in its center stands a huge, iron-barred cage, oblong in shape and rising nearly to the ceiling. Within this cage is a stand, terrace-topped and covered with velvet, which was, at one time, white. At the extreme top is the crown made for Victoria. Below it, on one side, is the crown of the Prince of Wales, and on the other that of the last of the Stuarts, the four Georges and William IV. One crown had served very well for all those men, but when, in 1837, the royal headgear had to be put upon a woman's head, it was, of course, much too large, and a new one had to be made. Besides the crowns, there are in the collection the royal wand, a solid gold stick three feet seven inches in length, the royal communion service, three large fonts, all of solid gold, out of which the royal children are baptized, besides numerous other presents that have in times been presented to the state by friendly sovereigns. The entire collection is valued at fifteen million dollars, much of which sum is represented in the rare stones that grace the crowns and scepter, the famous Koh-i-noor, the second largest diamond in the world, being one of them.—Home Journal.

The Wall of Snow.

...two on the southern ...ious wid- ...ilt; and a pret- ...mmer was that little ..., peering out from the embow- ...ng vines. Now and then it happened one could get a glimpse of the good old dame herself sitting in the open door—in her high-backed chair, and her Bible in her lap. The picture was one of quiet happiness. But it was not the aged widow herself who had gathered all the pleasant things about her cottage-home. This was the work of Karl, her only son, who lived with her, and supported her by working at the trade of a carpenter.

Karl was a noble fellow, and he had a heart as tender as it was strong; yet he was now twenty-eight, and was not married. He was indeed a good son. He had long been engaged to a worthy maiden, but he would not marry her until he felt he could do so without lessening the comforts which the infirmities of his mother made necessary. But Karl had prospered, under the blessing of heaven, and he was now about to marry his betrothed and bring her to their little cottage-home. It was winter, and the widow's house did not look very picturesque, divested of its summery drapery. But all was bright within; the narrow windows were full of Karl's choice flowers, transferred to neat boxes of his own handicraft. The Russian stove sent forth its genial glow, and the aged widow sat waiting, with a placid smile, the entrance of her children. And now the merry bridal group return from church, and the evening passes joyfully away.

But fearful was the change which morning brought. A hostile army was approaching the city of Strelsund, and might be looked for at any hour. In every heart fear and trembling. Day passed in dreadful suspense, and night closed in over the still watching, praying, fasting city. As night deepened there came on a terrific storm of snow and wind, which made the scene still more desolate and fearful. But how is it within the widow's cottage? Karl had for a while busied himself with barricading the doors and windows, so as to offer some obstruction to the rude soldiery, and had done the best he could to defend his mother and bride. Then he sank down into gloomy silence, while his young wife sat by him pale and trembling; but the aged widow sat with her eyes fastened upon her book, and seemed lost to all around her. At length she raised her eyes, and a bright smile beamed upon her countenance, as she repeated these lines:

"Round us a wall our God shall rear,
And our proud foes shall quake with fear."

"What! dear mother," replied Karl, "is your faith as strong as that? Do you really expect God will build a wall round our poor hut, strong and high enough to keep out an army? I wish I could believe it till the hour comes: it is terrible to wait in this state of mind."

"Has not my son read," replied the mother, "that not a sparrow falls to the ground without our Father? that faith has stopped the mouths of lions, and turned aside the edge of the sword?"

Karl made no reply, and the little family again sank into a sad silence. Just at midnight there was a lull in the storm, and they heard the great clock striking the hour of twelve. At the same moment the faint sound of martial music caught their watchful ears in the opposite direction; the fatal time had come. The little family drew closer together, and as the aged mother returned the pressure of her son's hand, she again repeated:

"Round us a wall our Lord shall rear,
And our proud foes shall quail with fear!"

The music drew nearer, mingled with a confused sound of trampling and shouting. Soon shrieks were heard; the crackling of flames, and the crash of falling houses, told them that the work of plunder and destruction was going on. But no hostile foot invaded the widow's dwelling; it stood quiet and unharmed amid the uproar, as if angels were encamping round it. At length the tumult died away—the storm ceased—and a death-like silence fell upon the scene.

After waiting several hours, Karl ventured to unclose a shutter; but the light came dimly through the snow, which was heaped to the very top of the window. He cautiously opened the door, but here again a wall of snow met his view, and he was obliged to cut his way into the open air. When he had done this he stood silent with astonishment and awe at the sight before him. Huge drifts of snow had completely encircled the cottage, and made it in appearance a mere mound of snow! They were indeed hidden by "a wall," and had dwelt safely in the pavilion of the Most High. Karl led his aged mother out to behold her "wall of faith." The pious widow wept as she looked up to heaven, and gently exclaimed—"Faithful is He who hath promised; He also hath done it."

Dear Children.

Come, let us wander in thought again over the beautiful plains of Mamre, and tarry a little longer in the tent which the friend of God pitched, where the free woman lived who represented heavenly things, or "The Jerusalem above." I told you in my last why the bond-maid and her son were cast out. I want you to mark well the outline of character in the child born after the Spirit, for it is not said that the faith of the friend of God was counted to him for righteousness until he lifted up his eyes heavenward, and saw in the multitude of bright stars the countless numbers, and heavenly order of the Promised One. It must have been night when God took him abroad and said, "Tell the stars if thou art able to number them, so shall his children be." This reminds me of a little girl in Brooklyn, who said to me, "Teacher, while I was writing the covenants I noticed God never told the Joyous One his seed should be like the dust, or land, but only like the stars." I had not perceived that before, and was pleased with her inquiring mind. In this Promised One were all "the exceeding great and precious promises" hid, for Jehovah had said in the "Joyous One," my friend, shall thy seed be called, for I will establish my covenant with him. Because he was to be a type or pattern of the Son of God, and God wanted to unfold to his dear friend exactly what he intended to do with his beloved Son, whom he promised should come at the appointed time. So when the "Joyous One" became a young man, in whom his dear father's hope was wrapped up, for although quite old, he had firm faith that if he died God would confirm his oath to this dear son, and all the land counted to his father, north, south, east, and west, would be his, which promise made him "the heir of the world." It hardly seems possible that his father could ever dream that he must offer this precious son as a burnt-offering, so that only his ashes would be left. But God wanted to test the faith of his friend, to see if he firmly believed all he had promised him. So he told him to go to a land, the name of which signifies "The bitterness of the Lord," and there offer, on one of the mountains which God would tell him of, his beloved son, in whom every hope of life was centered. The friend of God tarried not, but early in the morning his willing, obedient steps hastened to do as God commanded. It is not written that he told his wife, neither did he go to the flock and take the choicest lamb, hoping that God at the last moment would accept this instead of his son. No, my dear children, he took the precious, beloved one along, thus crucifying his best affections. O, when he clave the wood for the sacrifice, and sharpened the knife that it may do for a perfect work, how his loving, faithful heart must have pondered on the trial before him. He had three days, and perhaps three sleepless nights, praying for courage, not only to do, but suffer the Lord's will. Plenty of time was given him to turn back, but he had purposed in his heart not to transgress God's law. When the third day came, he lifted up his eyes and saw the place afar off. Fearing perhaps the young men who journeyed with them would hinder him in obeying the commandment of God, he said "Abide ye here with the ass while I and the lad go yonder, and worship and come again to you." His father took in his hand the fire and the knife, but the wood to burn up the sacrifice his beloved son bore, just like Jesus, who carried his own cross. When they came to the mountain of which God told him, he began to build the altar, and his son who no doubt had watched his father many a time offer a sacrifice, wondered where the lamb could be, and said, "Father behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" Mark how touching and calm his answer was. "my son, God will provide himself a lamb." When the altar was ready, he took his son, bound him as he had seen his father bind an animal before killing it. And while he was doing this, it is not written that the patient lad opened his mouth to utter a murmuring word to his father but "was led as a lamb to the slaughter." His willing obedience must have increased his father's love, seeing he delighted to do his will, even unto death. His father did not do this to punish his dear son, for he had never done anything worthy of death. He was always well pleased with him, although he put him to grief, he did not willingly afflict or grieve him. Perhaps he had never spoken an unkind word to him. But when he saw in his father's hand the sharp knife ready to slay him, what dreadful terror must have seized him; his soul must have been exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death. But what must have been the pangs of deep sorrow which his dear father felt! O, what faith! what love to God; what confidence in his word! But while this terrible struggle of nature was going on, the Angel of the Lord was watching the willing son, and his faithful father, and called aloud, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do anything to him, for now I know thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thine only son from me." So well pleased was God with the faithfulness of his dear friend, that he called a second time out of heaven, and said, "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord: for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice. Therefore he is called the Father of the Faithful. He gave the mountain a beautiful name, that in the bitterness of the Lord he "will see or provide." Our Heavenly Father did not demand of his faithful friend what he intended to do himself; "for he so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believe in him should not perish, but have life eternal." His dear friend yielded up, but God gave his loved one back. Which was like a dead one coming to life again. In this we have a shadow of the resurrection which happened on the third day. We read that the "Joyous One" was a meditating man or a man of prayer, that he sojourned in a place which name signifies a Pilgrimage, seeking always a pure near living, springing waters. The name given was "the well of the oath." When his faithful father died, cruel men who cared not for the waters of life, stopped up the wells he had dug: but the promised one and his servants unearthed them and caused the life-giving waters to flow again. Others also the servants dug; the first one they called "Idving," the second "Opposition," the third "Hatred," the last "Room." He had a lovely bride. A servant in the tent of the friend of God sought her out. His name signifies "the help of God." He went in search for her bound with an oath. This faithful servant prayed that God would direct his way and make him as one sent. The Angel of the Lord went before him, and led him, to a well where the beautiful maid, a very fair virgin, was drawing water. He had prayed to meet her just there, and her sweet disposition led him to suppose she was the chosen one. He bowed himself, and worshipped the Lord who had led him the right way. Soon he decked the chosen one with magnificent jewels of gold, and rich raiment, which he brought from his master's tent. How grand every circumstance appears to us connected with this tent, when we trace the full purposes of God hid in these natural incidents. The worker may well say, "Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural: after that which is spiritual," we must trace the natural to comprehend the glorious spiritual. When you read this my beloved children, may the Lord say, "Let there be light."

Your affectionate Teacher
E. COFFMAN.

LIFE IN MODERN PALESTINE.

The Scene of the Miracle of the Five Loaves and Two Small Fishes.

HAIFA, Jan. 6.—If, as I stated in my last letter, students of Biblical topography have been much exercised in their minds as to the identification of the ruins on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, which indicate the site of the once famous city of Capernaum, and have applied not only a great amount of antiquarian research and of time in the way of minute local examination and literary labor in the hope of definitely settling this knotty point; but there is another upon which they have no less anxiously expended their ingenuity. This is to solve the vexed question as to whether there were, in the time of Christ, two Bethsaidas or one. This question would never have arisen had it not been for the confusion introduced into the scriptural narrative by the puzzling accounts given in all the four gospels of the miracle of the feeding of the multitude with five loaves and two fishes, the scene of which the four evangelists are unanimous in describing as having been in a desert spot which must have been on the eastern side of the lake, for immediately afterwards "they crossed over to the other side," arriving at Capernaum, which was on the western side. But according to one (Luke) this desert place (on the eastern side) belonged to a city called Bethsaida, and according to another (Mark), Christ, after the miracle, "constrained his disciples to get into the ship and go to the other (or western) side before, unto Bethsaida, while he sent away the people." Hence the confusion; starting from the western side they take ship, cross over to a desert place belonging to Bethsaida; the miracle is performed there, and the disciples are constrained by their Master to take ship and cross the lake back again to what must be another Bethsaida. Then the storm arises. He comes to them on the waters, and they finally reach Capernaum in safety.

Reland, the learned geographer of the last century, was the first to invent the second Bethsaida on the western side, which is not mentioned by either Josephus or Pliny, the latter of whom distinctly puts it on the eastern side; and I have not been able exactly to discover upon what authority Reland hit upon this easy solution of the problem. The only historical Bethsaida of which we have any certain record was a place at the northeastern extremity, originally a village, but rebuilt and adorned by Philip the Tetrarch, and raised to the dignity of a town under the name of Julias, after the daughter of the emperor. Here, in a magnificent tomb, Philip was himself buried. On the other hand, we have indications of the existence of another Bethsaida, in the mention of a Bethsaida which was the birthplace of Peter and Andrew and Philip, which Mark tells us was "in the land of Gennesareth," and therefore on the west shore of the lake. Supposing Tell Hum to be Capernaum, and the western Bethsaida to be on the site usually assigned to it, this hypothesis would give us two Bethsaidas only six miles apart, not a very probable supposition; or else we have to suppose that the land of Gennesareth extended across the Jordan to the east side, which we know to have had another name, and to have been in another province; or to suppose, as Dr. Thomson, who resolutely refuses to have two Bethsaidas, does, that half the town was on one side of the Jordan and half on the other, and that the half on the west side was called Bethsaida in the land of Gennesareth, though the plain of that name is five miles distant. Moreover, there are no ruins conveniently placed to support the presumption, which is very strained. Altogether the subject is one which has puzzled every Biblical geographer hitherto, and after a careful examination of all their arguments I find myself just as much in the dark about it as when I entered upon the investigation. As, therefore, after visiting all the localities, I do not feel any more competent to enlighten your readers, I will confine myself to describing the different places which have been suggested as the sites of these cities, as well as of others which I visited in this section of country, some of which I was the first to discover, and none of which have been positively identified.

Meantime, the scene, which the tradition of many centuries located erroneously as the spot upon which the miracle took place, is exactly above us as we wind along a rocky path cut in the precipice which overhangs the Sea of Galilee. The huge impending crag is crowned by an artificial plateau, which is 200 feet long by 100 broad, and in the northwest angle are the remains of a wall and the ruins of a building, probably a fortress of some sort. This spot was known in the middle ages as the Monss Christi, or table of Christ. In olden time the great Damascus high road ran just below, and the fort above doubtless commanded this pass: but it has become impassable, and the path now follows the channel of an aqueduct hewn out of the living rock. For about 200 yards we find ourselves riding along the narrow floor of this ancient watercourse. On our left the smooth rock rises precipitously, and on our right it forms a wall from three to four feet high, over which we could drop a stone perpendicularly into the waters of the lake. The aqueduct which thus forms our singular roadway is about three feet wide; emerging from it, after we turn the angle of the rock, we find ourselves overlooking a little bay, into which rushes a brawling torrent, the largest which enters the lake excepting the Jordan, and which here turns a mill. It is, however, only a few yards long, as it bursts from the ground in great force, in what is by far the most powerful spring in Galilee, and is, without doubt, the celebrated Fountain of Capernaum mentioned by Josephus as watering the plain of Gennesareth. This it did by means of the aqueduct which we had already traversed, the distant from the fountain to the plain not being above a mile. Besides the biblical fountain, which is estimated as being more than half the size of the celebrated source of the Jordan at Banias, there are four smaller fountains, all more or less brackish, and varying in temperature from 78 degrees to 86 degrees.

One of the special subjects of interest connected with these fountains is the presence in them of the remarkable fish called the coracinus. The only known habitats of this fish in the world are in the Nile, in a fountain which I have also visited in the plain of Gennesareth called Mudawara, and in this spring. Josephus accounts for its existence here, as well as in the Nile, by a hypothetical subterranean water communication with the great river of Egypt. Modern geologists point to it as an evidence of the fact that in some long bygone period Palestine might have been included in a great Ethiopian basin. However the circumstance is to be accounted for, it is most remarkable, and was doubted until Canon Tristram verified it twenty years ago by a somewhat singular experience. Crossing the little stream which issues from the fountain of Mudawara and flows into the lake, and which happened to be very low at the time, he was surprised to observe a quantity of fish wriggling along in single file, and so close together that the mouth of one touched the tail of the one before it. In places there was so little water that they had to flop across intervals of almost dry land. Here he caught them easily with his hand, and, as many averaged three feet in length, he was not long in making a good bag. What surprised him most, however, was to find that as soon as he laid hold of one it began hissing and screaming like a cat. Making a bag out of his cloak, he carried them off in triumph to his camp, which was three hours distant, and could hear them hissing and caterwauling to it all the way. He describes them as being a most delicious fish to eat, something like an eel in flavor, and possessed of extraordinary vitality, as some of them were still living after they had been two days out of the water. The last volume just issued by the Palestine Exploration Fund contains a print of this extraordinary creature, which has a long slender body, apparently not much thicker than that of a good-sized eel, with two long fins, one on the back and one on the belly. The mouth with its long cartilaginous streamers (I do not know the ichthyological term of them), somewhat resembles that of a catfish. I unfortunately had no means of fishing for them on the occasion of my visit, and they did not happen to be migrating to their spawning grounds, which they were evidently doing when Tristram caught them, but my late experiences on the shores of the lake have been so full of interest that I propose to make another visit in the spring, when I hope to go supplied with tackle, and to give you my own piscatory experiences.

There is a small tract of fertile land in the rear of the mill, but no ruins except those connected with mills or water works. Nevertheless it is impossible almost to conceive that a position so favored by nature should not have been the site of a town, and it is on this spot that many geographers place the western Bethsaida. There is no apparent ground for their doing so beyond the necessity of finding a spot somewhere which should support their hypothesis. If, however, they must have a second Bethsaida, I should rather put it a mile further off at Khan Minieh instead of so very close to Capernaum as this would be, always supposing Tell Hum to be Capernaum, which is only two miles distant from this spot. Dr. Thomson's theory that El Tabghah, the modern name of this place, was the grand manufacturing suburb of that large city, from which its fountain took its name, seems to me rational. Here were the mills, not only for it but for all the neighborhood—so also the potteries, tanneries, and other operations of this sort would be clustered around these great fountains, a theory somewhat borne out by the name, Tabghah, which resembled the Arabic word Dabbagh, meaning tannery.

There is no doubt that in this neighborhood some where, probably on the plain of Gennesareth, was a location of a town far older than any of those whose sites we are now discussing, and this is the Chinneroth mentioned in the Old Testament from which the lake, in the days long anterior to those of Christ, took its name, and which the Talmud renders Ginizer, which is therefore doubtless identical with Gennesareth. Indeed, it may be noted as a curious fact, which has been forced upon me by these investigations, that the towns noticed in the gospels, excluding the large cities, such as Jerusalem, Tyre, and Sidon, are almost all places not mentioned in the Old Testament, Nazareth and Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Chorazin and Tiberias are names never occurring in the Hebrew Scriptures; and the scenery of the life of Christ lies as a rule apart from the centres, religious or political, which reappear again and again in the early episodes of Jewish history.—*Correspondence N. GENEVA, O.,

Editor Restitution:

Though we are strangers in the flesh, we are friends and brethren in the Spirit, for we are looking forward to the times of restitution of all things which were spoken of by the mouth of all the Holy Prophets of old. We are not strangers when we are looking forward to the times when the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and his anointed, and he shall reign for ever and ever, and when I peruse the good paper, THE RESTITUTION, and read the testimonies of those that are strangers to me in the flesh, I say, God bless that brother or that sister. May the day soon come when we shall all be gathered from the west, from the east, and the north, and the south, and sit down with him in that kingdom which has been prepared for us from the foundation of the world. We are in that time of trouble spoken of by Daniel. That dark cloud of trouble is getting blacker and blacker, and it will spread over the whole earth. But we have this promise that if we watch and pray, we shall escape all of this and stand before the Son of man. I am trying to hold up the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, here in my part way, and the prayer of my heart is that he will use me for an humble instrument for his cause. I am so glad that God has led me out of Babylon (the nominal church of these times). It is nothing but confusion. O, I thank God, the Father of my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, for bringing me out of that terrible darkness into the glorious light and liberty of the gospel, and my earnest prayer to God my Father, in the name of my elder brother Jesus, is that I may stand up for him and his word, for his (God's) word is truth, and may I learn more and more of God and his love as I run in that race until I reach the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, and I stand ready to go forth and proclaim the gospel of glad tidings to all men, for we can see that the groaning creation waiteth for the manifestation of the Son of God. They are crying Peace, but there is no peace. We can now see the fulfilling of Joel iii. 9-16. But after this when Jesus the anointed, and his Bride will possess the kingdoms then will be that glorious fulfilling of Micah iv. 1-13. O, what a grand time that will be. O, Lord hasten the day. Amen. I wish I had the means to send and get some tracts on the Life and Death question, for that terrible doctrine that we have immortality now, and go to heaven at death, is leading men and women away from the truth. That error is a high wall that stands between man and the truth. It is the doctrine of the adversary. He taught it in the Garden of Eden, and has been teaching it ever since. May the Lord help us to hold up the truth, is my prayer to him that heareth and will answer. May the Lord bless you and keep you in the faith, for it will not be long before we go forth to meet him. Yours in the blessed hope of our soon coming Lord. J. J. DUNN.

MESSIAH'S ADVENT.

F. BOTTOME, D. D.

He came to His own in the fulness of time,
But him they knew not nor His mission sublime;
They read not His signs, they saw not His star,
Yet strangers discerned and came from afar.

Through dimness of vision they strained for the light,
But heard not the Bethlehem song in the night;
They knew not the infant that lay in the stall
Was child of the Virgin, and Monarch of all.

They looked for Mr coming, great David's great Son!
But knew not Messiah His time had begun,—
That the lowly degree, by prophets foreshown,
And the mission of love was the hour of his throne.

They stumbled before Him, and over their fall
Came sickness and famines and bleeding to all;
The babe in the manger is born to the race,
And He, the rejected, has magnified grace.

Despised and rejected, of men as to them,
But when He shall come in His glory again
The dead and the living, the bound and the free
In grand procession shall bow down to Him.

Meanwhile at His feet, in the manger of old,
We bring Him our homage for spices was sold—
We worship Him lowly the child in the stall,
And hail Him Redeemer and Savior of all.

PEOPLE IN THE SOUDAN.

The Anthropological Society of Washington have just received from the Anthropological Institute of London an extremely interesting paper on the ethnology of Egyptian Soudan, prepared by Professor A. H. Keane, a member of the institute council. This paper throws much light upon the characteristics of the warlike and predatory peoples, who, under a leader of Islam, are to-day disputing the occupation of their territory by one of the most formidable nations of Christendom. The writer states that the expression Soudan, or Beled-es-Soudan, "Land of the Blacks," applies to the whole region between the Atlantic and the Red Sea and from the Sahara and Egypt toward the equator. Ethnically speaking, it is the land of transition between the Hamites of the North and the negros of South Africa. The East Soudan, the scene of the British military operations, the writer says, is the converging point of nearly all of the African races. In giving the distribution of the races he says that the Somerset Nile connecting Lake Victoria and Albert Nyanza flows through Bantu territory. The Bahr-el-Jebel between Lake Albert and the Sobat confluence is held by negroes. The White Nile between the Sobat and the Blue Nile confluences, and the main stream northward is occupied on the left chiefly by Semites and on the right by Hamites. From Dongola to Assuan, on the Egyptian frontier, the valley between the Lybyan and Arabian deserts is held by the Nubians. The whole region east of this valley, as far as the Red Sea, and between the Abyssinian highlands and the coast round to Cape Gardafui and south to the equator, is held by the Hamites. The arid wastes and steppes west of the Nile are held entirely by the Semite nomads, while in the outlying provinces of Kordofan and Darfor Semites, Nubians, negroes and even Hamites and Fulahs are intermingled. Thus along the course of the Nile the writer shows that the Bantus and negros occupy the south, the Semites and Hamites the center and Nubians the north.

Although officially included in the Egyptian province of the equator, the people of this region, the Bantus, have never been conquered. They have exclusive possession of the southern half of the continent, except the region of the Hottentots and Bushmen, and extend at points 3 degrees north of the equator. They are negroid rather than negroes. Professor Keane shows that the negro is numerically the most important element in Egyptian Soudan, and hitherto has held almost undisturbed possession. Within the area of the countless head-waters of the White Nile in this portion of the Soudan is concentrated one-half the population of the whole Nile basin, from the equatorial lakes to the Mediterranean, and embraces an estimated population of 40,000,000 of people. This includes several powerful negro nations still enjoying political autonomy, as the Zandeh (Nyam Nyam), the Mittu and Monbuttu. Some of these occupy regions within the Khedive's domain. In these Nilotic peoples the salient features of negro race are less prominent than elsewhere. Although Islam has made some progress, the bulk of these people are still nature worshipers. When preparing for battle the "medicine man" flays an infant and pieces the bleeding infant on the war-path, to be trampled by the warriors marching to victory. Human fat is a staple of trade. The Monbuttu cure for future use the bodies of the slain in battle and reserve their principal for terrible cannibal feasts. These Nilotic races in many cases are skilled in useful industries, as agriculture, iron smelting and casting, weaving and the manufacture of pottery. The form and ornamental designs of their utensils display artistic taste, while their iron implements have a temper superior to that of European manufacture. They are cannibals and yet show a regard and devotion to the weaker sex.

The Semites or Caucasic stock of North-eastern Africa are described as the Coktanides and the Ismaelites or Arabs. Since the Mohammedan invasion of the seventeenth century this element has become predominant and is the disturbing influence which inspires fanaticism, promotes dealing in slaves, and without it there would be no Mahdis and no Egyptian question to perplex the counsels of European statesmanship and to break up ministries.

In describing the characteristics of these people this paper speaks of them as proud, ignorant, bigoted, nomadic owners of cattle, camels, horses and slaves, hunters, robbers and warriors. The life of the men is devoted to carling for their cattle, slave-hunting and war, while the women till the fields. The Arab tribes are described as numerous and powerful, commanding great influence among the surrounding populations and often defy the supreme authority or compel it to accept their conditions in the administration of Eastern Soudan.

The same paper then speaks of the Hamite races, the true, indigenous element in North Africa, their kinsmen, the Semites, being recent intruders from Arabia. The Ethiopian Hamites, or northern group, the most important, occupy the Sukkim district and their warriors largely participated in the operations before and after the battle of El Teb. They are described as handsome, of bronze, swarthy or light chocolate complexion, of Caucasic or European type of features, with long, crisp hair, falling in ringlets over the shoulders. They are described as zealous Mohammedans, occupied chiefly with camel-breeding and as caravan leaders, governed by hereditary sheikhs, and, like other Hamitic and Semitic kindred elsewhere, are distinguished for their personal bravery and love of freedom. From the third to the sixth century of the present era they infested the Southern frontiers of Egypt, and, though often defeated by Aurelian and Probus, continued to [illegible] outlying provinces of the empire and finally compelled Diocletian to withdraw the Roman garrisons from the region of the cataracts, replacing them by the warlike Nubatai tribes from the great oasis of Kargoy, in Upper Egypt.

The paper then proceeds to give an account of these same people of venerable antiquity, now known as the Nubians, and which, cradled in the Kordofan Highlands over 3,000 years ago, settled in present Kargey oasis and valley of the Nile about Meroe. In 615 they embraced Christianity and formed the powerful African Kingdom of Dongola, which lasted 700 years and was overthrown by the Arabs and came under the dominion of Islam. The Nile Nubas live in settled and semi-civilized Mohammedan communities and are treated on an equality in Egypt, where large numbers are engaged as free laborers, porters, costermongers and in other pursuits. They are strong and muscular, war-like and energetic and generally excel the Egyptians. The present Mahdi is a Nubian of Dongola, but has found his chief support, not among his own countrymen, but among the more recently converted negroes and especially the Arab and Hamite communities of Kordofan and other parts of Eastern Soudan.—Philadelphia Times.

A DAY OF QUESTIONS. THE LORD JESUS' QUESTION.

"While the Pharisees gathered together, Jesus asked them, saying,—What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him,—The Son of David. He saith unto them—How then doth David in spirit call him Lord, saying—The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand, till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool? If David then call him Lord, how is he his son? And no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions."—Matt. xxii. 41-46.

In former papers we have been viewing Jesus on the defensive; we now come to consider him as the aggressor in debate. Having silenced his opponents by discreet and incontrovertible answers to their questions, so that no man durst ask him any more questions, he now carries war into the enemy's camp by asking them a question. They would doubtless rather have avoided crossing of swords further with him; but he willed it otherwise, and to complete their discomfiture asks them one pertinent question—What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he? "Ye learned Scribes and Pharisees, who pretend to teach others, and to know so much regarding the law of the Prophets, and the hope of Israel, what think ye of Christ? What is your opinion of the national Messiah looked for? What sort of a man do you expect? Whose son is he?" Such were the thoughts underlying our Lord's pointed question. It was a question aimed directly to correct, or expose, erroneous Jewish conceptions regarding the nature and person of the Messiah.

"What think ye of Christ?" was in itself a question of a wide range, but in order to focus the point to which he wished especially to call attention, he immediately added—"Whose son is he?" Without any hesitation, nay, with alacrity no doubt, not perceiving the ultimate issue, they replied—"The son of David;" and a feeling of relief would be felt that so simple and easy a question was all he had to put to them.

The answer is just what we might have expected from any Israelite. Their Scriptures sanctioned the expectation that the Messiah would be of the house and lineage of David, with whom God had made the everlasting covenant, saying:—"My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that has gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven." (Psalm lxxxix. 31-37). "Thus saith the Lord:—David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel.... If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their own season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne." (Jer. xxxiii. 17, 19-21).

In any proper consideration of our Lord's question, and the reply of the Pharisees, we must not overlook these promises to the house of David. Yet, notwithstanding the solemnity of God's oath, and the positive declaration, of the Spirit of God regarding Israel's national hope through David's son, these Scripture promises are unceremoniously set aside by Gentile believers, and ignored, or, what is even more unwarrantable, appropriated, and misapplied. It is just because of this, that I find a remarkable weakness in both Dr. Gelkie's and Canon Farrar's explanations of this incident. Both ignore the literal acceptation of the promises to David; both suppose the head and front of the Jewish error regarding the Messiah was in expecting him to be a Prince on the literal throne of David, reigning in Jerusalem over the house of Jacob. They consider that the Jewish people should have been better informed, and known that Christ's kingdom was not of that nature, that it was spiritual and not literal. Hence they both seem to think that the sole object of Jesus was to argue with the Pharisees regarding his personal claim to be the Messiah.

Now, I would not say that Jesus may not have had that object in view in his first question; for whilst the bulk of the people recognized that he was the son of David, the Rulers, Scribes, and haughty Pharisees, chose to ignore any such fact. Their confession, therefore, that the Messiah was to be the son of David, might be taken as confirming the claims of One who was generally acknowledged to be the son of David. Yet this was not the chief object in view. The preliminary question—"Whose son is he?"—was only the first skirmish, preparing the way for a more important and serious charge. In giving the ready answer—"The son of David"—it is quite likely that the thought would pass through the Pharisees' minds that Jesus himself was of that lineage, and that he was seeking thus to convict them of rejecting him; but when, passing that by, he proceeded to put this further question—"How then doth David in spirit call him Lord, saying, the Lord said unto my Lord," etc., then they had no answer whatever to give, and this is somewhat remarkable. Let us seek out the reason.

Here, as in the case with the Sadducees, our Lord takes his opponents upon their own ground, for Ps. cx. from which he quoted, was an acknowledged Messianic Psalm, but it taught a truth of which they were utterly ignorant.

It is difficult to form an exact estimate of the light in which the Jewish people held the person of their expected Messiah, for there were evidently divergences of opinion as to what were, and what were not proofs of Jesus' Christ-ship. Some said—"We know this man whence he is: but when the Christ cometh, no one knoweth whence he is." "Of the multitude many believe I on him; and they said:—When the Christ shall come, will he do more signs than these which this man has done?" "Others said:—This is the Christ." But some said,—What, he might rank as heir to the promise, and so Matthew traces the descent from David, through Solomon, to Joseph. His statement is quite in agreement with facts:—"Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ." Luke, on the other hand, traces our Lord's lineage back through Heli, his grandfather, the reputed father of Mary, to David, by another son, Nathan, and is at the same time careful to state that Jesus was only the "supposed" son of Joseph. By both mother and adopted father, therefore, he was of the house and lineage of David.

Born, however, by the miraculous conception of the Holy Spirit, he had a higher honor in being called the "Son of the Highest;" and it was in this Divine origin that he dignified the house of David. It was because of this that the angel of the Lord hailed Mary as blessed among women. It was because of this that the babe in Elizabeth's womb leaped at the sound of Mary's salutation, and Mary magnified the Lord. It was because of this that the heavens opened, and the Spirit descended upon him, with the acknowledgment of Sonship from the Father; that the demons cried out at his presence, saying:—"We know Thee who thou art; thou art the Son of God;" that the same heavens which before had opened for him, were closed in darkness when the awful wickedness of his death was accomplished, so that a Roman centurion—a Gentile—confessed—"Truly this was the Son of God." It was because of this that death could not hold him bound; for God could not "suffer his Holy One to see corruption," and therefore he has proclaimed him with power to be the Son of God by the resurrection from the dead.

There is, therefore, a very great deal involved in the teaching of our Lord to the Pharisees regarding David's Son, yet Lord. His being the Son of God was indeed the proof of his Messiahship. The Scriptures teach us to take a very exalted idea of Christ's nature and person, and it would ill become us to seek to lessen that dignity in our own or other people's estimation. No, fellow-readers, let us rather "exalt his name together."—R. K. Strang, in Messenger.

THE DISCONSOLATE.

Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Matt. xi. 28.

Come, ye disconsolate, where'er you languish,
Come, at God's altar fervently kneel;
Here bring your wounded hearts, here tell your anguish—
Earth has no sorrow that heaven can not heal.

Joy of the desolate, light of the straying,
Hope when all others die, fadeless and pure,
Here spreads the Comforter, in God's name saying:
"Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot cure."

Go ask the infirm what boon he brings us,
What charm for aching hearts he can reveal,
Sweet as that heavenly promise, Hope sings us!
"Earth has no sorrow that God cannot heal."

THE INNER SPRING.

There is a wonderful truth veiled and yet evident in Psalm xlvi. 4: "There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the City of God, the Holy Place of the tabernacles of the Most High."

It was a very marked peculiarity of Jerusalem, it was a feature singular to it among the chief cities of the world, Jerusalem was an altogether inland city. It was perched upon its hills amid surrounding mountains. It lived its fast in no broad river. It had no harbor looking outward on the sea. And yet no city was supplied with water as Jerusalem was within itself. For there was within Jerusalem a living spring beneath the temple vaults. It was this spring whence the water welled to fill the two Siloam pools. It was of this perennial spring within Jerusalem whence came the two streams that made glad God's city, of which the Psalmist sings: "All my fresh springs shall be in thee," bursts forth another Psalm. "Draw water out of the wells of salvation," exclaims Isaiah referring to this unwasting internal fountain. It was the figure borrowed from this spring which Jesus used, when, there in the temple, during the feast of Tabernacles, Jesus stood forth and cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink: he that believeth on me, as the Scripture saith, out of him shall flow rivers of living water; but this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive."—Wayland Hoyt.

CHRISTIANITY ON NOTHING.

The times are ripening onward to the coming of Christ, to the last great conflict between good and evil, and the final overthrow of all enemies of our Lord.

For the question of the fulfillment of the promise of the coming is not a question of human fidelity. "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Yet, he might rank as heir to the promise, and so Matthew traces the descent from David, through Solomon, to Joseph. His statement is quite in agreement with facts:—"Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ." Luke, on the other hand, traces our Lord's lineage back through Heli, his grandfather, the reputed father of Mary, to David, by another son, Nathan, and is at the same time careful to state that Jesus was only the "supposed" son of Joseph. By both mother and adopted father, therefore, he was of the house and lineage of David.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 4, 1885. NO. 9.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR. Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as its King of kings and Lord of lords, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with Him in the government of the nations at the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the final vindication of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the doctrine of repentance, as immersion; preparation for the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life, as essential for our salvation.

LETTER TO A FRIEND. PART I.

I have been thinking of you a great deal since I saw you. I agreed to write you a long letter, and now take the opportunity of doing so. The question to be considered is one of great importance, affecting our eternal salvation. We may enquire, what are the present existing facts. Death is in the world, it lays us all, rich and poor alike, in the grave, from which there is no redemption, unless we look to revelation for light. Then let us look to the only source of light that exists, for a solution of this momentous question. If we trust in that for our guidance, we shall be made wise unto salvation, through faith in what it reveals. If we desire to know the cause of the existing trouble, we must commence where the trouble began. Unless we know the disease, we cannot apply the remedy. The foundation of education lies in the alphabet. So the beginning of the sorrow, trouble and death, under which the human race now exists, originated at the commencement of the race. Let your mind revert to what occurred at the creation of man, his trial, and disobedience, and then follow the dawning light until we find the remedy.

We read that God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. Gen. ii. 7. From this account of man's creation, we learn nothing about an immortal soul, for the simple reason that nothing is said or intimated in reference to such a Pagan notion. The term immortal is only once used in the Bible, and then it is applied to [illegible] 1 Tim. i. 17. We have [illegible] the living soul that God [illegible] bring a wife out [illegible] Adam [illegible] garden [illegible] kinds of particular importance was the tree of life, the [illegible], the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The pair were told that of the trees of the garden they might freely eat with one exception, and that was of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The penalty of death was attached to disobedience. Gen. ii. 17. Now mark what followed, under the subtle reasoning of the serpent. The woman was beguiled unto eating of the forbidden fruit and her husband also with her. For this act they and their posterity have had a fearful experience. The immediate result in their case was the acquirement of knowledge, first a guilty conscience. Second the discovery of their nakedness and its results, and shame at their condition when they heard the voice of the Lord God. Gen. ii. 8. Before they transgressed they experienced none of these feelings.

I believe it was necessary for man's development, to have an active stimulant to bring his faculties into play. The law of necessity was laid upon him, when driven out of the garden to till the ground from whence he was taken. This set all his intellectual faculties in motion. Let us see what followed their disobedience. The guilty pair were brought up for sentence. And unto Adam God said: Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Gen. iii. 17. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground, for out of it wast thou taken, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. This is plain language, and to insure the carrying out of this sentence, the Lord God said, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live forever, etc., he placed cherubim with a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life. Gen. iii. 22. There is no double meaning here, it was sure death to Adam and his posterity. But even in this dark day of adversity and despair, merciful light began to dawn, and the purpose of God displayed itself, in announcing to them, that the seed of the woman, should bruise the serpent's head. Gen. iii. 15. It is very evident from this statement, that the serpent became a tyrannus for sin. And through its influence in leading them astray, therefore it became the representative of sin in the aggregate. Was it not the sin power, that provoked the Lord of glory, the woman's seed; and when that was done, the bruising of the heel was accomplished. When Christ shall come to destroy the works of the devil, then will he crush the serpent's head. We have this idea carried out in Rev. [illegible] tion. Behold an angel came down from heaven, and he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, etc. Rev. xx. 1. These names represent the sin powers from the beginning. Down to the time when it shall be bound or restrained by the Lord Jesus. You will notice it is called that old serpent, thus going back to the origin of sin, the real starting place of the enmity to God, and which is to be destroyed by Christ. Now my dear friend, let us follow the race of man, and learn what God hath truly done and what he intends to do, we can safely trust ourselves to be guided by the light of his word. From Adam to the flood we have no special revelation. A brief record of increasing wickedness is given by Moses, until God destroyed all the wicked by the flood, saving Noah and his family through his special provision. The light of the future was again displayed, when we come to the history of Abraham. Here it was that the light shone which is to become brighter and brighter, until we come to the perfect day of the Sun of righteousness. The development of Christianity has been progressive, it did not flash suddenly upon the world at the birth of Christ, it had its date from the beginning of revelation. This being so, we understand how it was, that Abraham rejoiced to see the day of Christ, in which all nations were to be blessed. Paul said Moses esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. The calling of Abraham was a great step in the progress of salvation. Consider what was said unto him. And the Lord said unto Abraham, get thee out of thy country, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show you, and I will make of thee a great nation, and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed. Gen. xii. 1, 2. We know a great nation was composed of the twelve tribes of Israel, the grandson of Abraham. Christ would never have been born king of the Jews if this were not so. The calling of Abraham was the preliminary work of God, for the accomplishment of what he designed to do. The land of Palestine was promised to him and to his seed the Christ, for an everlasting possession, and Jerusalem was to be the capital city of the whole earth, and the city of the great King Matt. v. 35; Ps. xxxii. 13.

There were several promises made as recorded in Gen. xiii. xiv. xv. xvii. xxii. all of which await their fulfilment in Christ. See Gal. ii. 26-29. For further light upon the purposes of Jehovah, we must follow the fortunes of Israel, for independent of them there is no salvation. John iv. 22. Let us follow Jacob to Egypt where he died. On his deathbed he foretold the coming of Shiloh (the Christ) through Judah. We now follow the eventful history of his descendants, and their deliverance from bondage by Moses. Their sojourn in the wilderness. The giving of the law from Sinai to govern them in their relationship to Jehovah, and to one another. We finally see them brought into the land promised, under Joshua after the death of Moses. The appointment of judges to rule them under Jehovah. At last they desired a king, which God gave them in the person of Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin. His removal, and the selection of David, a man after God's own heart, who should fulfil God's will, in the punishment of his enemies, the wicked nations who surrounded his chosen people.

Now bear in mind that Israel was God's only choice, of all the nations he chose no other, all the nations were left to work out their destiny under the law of sin and death. Being without law, they perished without law. Paul affirms this of them. Romans ii. 12. It was through Israel alone that God wrought, first for the salvation of them who obeyed him; lastly, he offered salvation to the Gentiles, through the gospel, which was for the purpose of taking out of them a people for his name. Acts xv. 14. Returning to David. God having established him upon the throne over Israel, we have a still further development of Jehovah's purpose. See 2 Sam. vii. 12, etc., here it was definitely announced to David, that he should have a son, who should secure his throne forever before him. Solomon's reign was only a type of Christ, who was to be David's son and Lord. Solomon was a man of peace, typical of the Prince of Peace. He also built a house for the name of Jehovah, howbeit Jehovah dwelleth not in houses made with hands. The house that Solomon built was typical of another house composed of living, precious stones, which the Lord Jesus is preparing for a habitation of God by his Spirit, he himself being the chief corner stone, in whom all the buildings fitly framed together, groweth up into a holy temple of the Lord. Eph. ii. 20, 21. David in referring to the covenant God made with him concerning this Son, and throne, said, that it was all his salvation, and desire. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Ps. cxxxii. 13. Ps. lxxxix. 1-4. Although none of David's descendants ever fulfilled the requirements of a righteous ruler, in its fullest sense, yet the line of descent was not broken, until Zedekiah a wicked king, when it was declared by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, that the throne of David should be abolished. Hear his words. And thou profane and wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, etc., I will overturn it, and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him. Ez. xxi. 25. You will perceive that the one whose right it was had not come yet. Whose right was it to the throne of David? See Luke i. 28. And the angel said unto Mary, fear not, for thou hast found favor with God. And behold, thou shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. And he shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever. And of his kingdom there shall be no end. Luke i. 26. No other throne or kingdom was ever preached, or expected by the followers of Jesus. We read: Jesus said, ye my apostles, have followed me, or continued with me, in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Luke xxii. 28.

From the time of David and Solomon, we have the varying history of Judah and the other tribes. During these times we have the writings of the prophets, who testified before hand, of the sufferings of Christ, and of the glory that should follow. 1 Peter i. 10. Isaiah says: For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, of the increase of his government, and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, etc. Is. ix. 6. The same prophet foretells that Messiah should be cut off for the sins of others. Is. v. 3-8. Jeremiah also foretells the glory of Christ's reign, in fact all of the prophets speak of Christ.

And ye shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall. Malachi iv. 2.

The writer was lately employed to do some work for a gentleman who owns a large stock farm in Western Maryland. One day one of his men invited me down to the barn to see how he fed his cattle.

I was not much surprised to see how he gave them their hay and chaff; but when he went to water them my curiosity was raised, for there is a beautiful brook running through the farm a few hundred yards from the stalls. I asked him why he did not let them out and drink their fill. (It took him nearly two hours to water them). "O, that would never do," said he, "please shut the door, the darker the place is kept, the better. Soon as they see the light their eyes begin to water." What do you mean? Said I. "Well, you see when I let in the light they fret, they want to get out and have a general kick up." Well would that do any harm? I inquired. "Yes, it would take their attention from their work! You see we want them to do nothing but eat, eat, eat, all day and all night too. If they can." Will do they grow up rapidly by this kind of treatment? "Yes man in a few weeks they'll be as round as a ball." All of a sudden Malachi's figure came to me.—And ye shall go forth and grow up as calves of the stall." Reader can you realize that your experience harmonizes with the figure? If not are you called? If we sincerely fear—reverence—the Lord, we will seek to know what he would have us do. We will not fret like the cattle I have been describing, to get away from the Good Shepherd"—the keeper of Israel. No we will sing with David. "He makes me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters."

Job says (xxvii. chapter) "Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom," (that is it leads to wisdom).

When one feels that he must give an account of himself to God, he will not be over anxious about the opinion of the elder brother, his motto will be, we must obey God rather than men. I noticed the man gave the foal and the drink to each of the cattle separately, calling them as he approached them by their names.

This of itself impressed me with the intense personality of God's dealings with our race in all ages. In most of our great church organizations a poor, moneyless man, is well nigh lost sight of amid the ringing of the merry chimes and the operatic interludes of the Professor at the great organ; but God never loses sight of the unit: —"To this man will I look," He says, "even to him who is of a broken and contrite spirit and who trembleth at my word." Nobodyless brethren do you belong to the church whose chief business would seem to be—"a liberal collection"? (nine tenths of which is required for the 2,000 dollar person) and are you ostracized because you have nothing to give? Be not discouraged. We may be of very little use in the service of one big churches, and yet be very good servants of our Lord and Savior Jesus the Christ.

Those few faithful ones in the church of Sardis (Rev. iii. 4; may, and doubtless were, treated as the greatest of drunks, because of their contempt for the human "rider" or amendments, introduced into the pure and simple service inaugurated by our Lord and his immediate disciples: but hear what our ascended Redeemer says,—"they shall walk with me in white; for they are worthy."

Brother be loyal to the truth, at cost of everything, and you will receive doubly for all your losses. When the assembled world shall stand before the Judge of all the earth. A church certificate will be of very little value then. In conclusion let us all attend to God's glorious proclamation:—"Ho, every one that thirsts, come ye to the waters, etc." How different this to the church dirge:—"Hark from the tomb a doleful sound." Our Lord, in his various descriptions of the kingdom of heaven, pictures it as something cheering, stirring. At one time it is a wedding, then, the return of one supposed to be lost.

The recovering of lost money, etc. etc. Every picture is sun-lit. Not one night picture in all the group. Reader gaze often upon these beautiful word pictures of the Master and you will grow up as calves of the stall. Amen.

"THE WORLD TO COME."

Future existence, in some condition, is clearly revealed in the Word of God. Mankind cannot cease to be. Immortality is one attribute of the Spirit. "The wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." If the righteous exist—if they live on through eternal ages—they must have a place in which to exist—some substantial residence—a material abode, because, after the resurrection of the body, they will have material, substantial bodies. "In the place of eternal blessedness there will be ground to walk upon; scenes of luxuriance to delight the corporeal senses; the kindly intercourse of friends, having bodies such as we now wear, and faculties of perception, and thought, and mutual communication, such as we now exercise." So says Dr. Chalmers. When and where shall we find such a place? We shall find it when we inhabit "the world to come."

Some say that the phrase "the world to come" means only the promised state of the Church under the gospel, with the worship of God therein, with a special relation to the Messiah, the Author and Mediator of it." But the word of God gives no sanction to such an interpretation of the term "world," in its application to the Church, even in any condition of the Church. It certainly cannot mean the Church in its present organization, for the phrase is "a world to come," and the Church, when this was written, was already in an organized state.

Then this "world to come" is not contrite spirits and who trembleth at my word." Modoyless brethren do you belong to the church whose chief business would seem to be—"a liberal collection"? Future existence, in some condition, is clearly revealed in the Word of God. Mankind cannot cease to be. Immortality is one attribute of the Spirit. Some say that the phrase "the world to come" means only the promised state of the Church under the gospel, with the worship of God therein, with a special relation to the Messiah, the Author and Mediator of it." But the word of God gives no sanction to such an interpretation of the term "world," in its application to the Church, even in any condition of the Church. It certainly cannot mean the Church in its present organization, for the phrase is "a world to come," and the Church, when this was written, was already in an organized state.

Then this "world to come" is not confined to earth, and heaven, as we have at present, and a heaven stretched over it, as we have at present; and it is not by the absence of these but by the absence of sin that the abode of immortality will be characterized." Thornton says, "The idea that the perfected kingdom of Christ is to be transferred to heaven is properly a modern notion. According to Paul and the Revelation of John, the kingdom of God is placed upon the earth."

And now, if the glory of God fills the earth, there will be no place for sin, moral evil, and death. There is no connection, necessarily, between sin and materialism. In the world to come sin may be done away with forever and materialism perpetuated in full bloom and vigor of immortality. Everything in that world will be written "holiness to the Lord."

The coming of the world to come will be the reign of Christ. He will be King over all the earth. "All kings shall bow before him, and all nations shall serve him." Such will be the final abode and future home of the righteous in the "world to come." This is the end of all things in the present economy. There is nothing beyond but ages to come, or eternity.—*G. ### Identifying Scripture Localities in Palestine.

Professor Hull has issued a valuable paper on Scripture localities visited in 1883-4, and illustrating the accuracy of the Bible narrative. While considerable interest attaches to his remarks on the point where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, and the particular mount on which the Law was given, we judge his identification of the site of Calvary will be most highly valued by our readers.—

One of the most recent identifications in or about Jerusalem is the site of Calvary, the topographical details of which have been very clearly elucidated by Captain Conder. Attention has up till recent times been diverted from this determination by the assertion that the site of our Lord's crucifixion is beneath the roof of "the Church of the Holy Sepulchre," which occupies a position nearly in the centre of the modern city. The labors of the officers of the Palestine Survey and others here not only succeeded in exploring the claims of this locality, but also in fixing the real site (as it seems to me) beyond the pale of controversy. If there is any fact clearer than another in reference to the place of the crucifixion, it is that the spot was outside the walls of Jerusalem. As the apostle puts it both figuratively and actually, "Jesus suffered without the gate," and as there was a garden at the place of the crucifixion containing a tomb, it is tolerably certain the spot was beyond the suburbs of the city. All requirements are met by the site described by Captain Conder, which is one accepted by (I believe) all the intelligent Jerusalem visitors of Jerusalem, and let's the which, after having visited and carefully considered, he satisfied my own mind." Outside the city through Damascus Gate, which leads out from the north side of the city, we turn to the right by the road which follows the course of Agrippa's wall, and at a distance of about one-fourth of an English mile we find ourselves in front of a platform of limestone, breaking off with a slight scarp in the direction of the wall. The face of the scarp is perforated by a cave, known as "Jeremiah's Grotto," and, seen in a certain direction, this prominent knoll has an appearance not unlike that of a skull; hence possibly the name "Golgotha."

More probably, however, the locality was a place of interment, for it is known that the great cemetery of Jewish times lay to the north side of the city, and therefore in the neighborhood of the grotto of Jeremiah. A Mohammedan cemetery occupies a portion of the platform, and an Arab Sheikh has pitched his tent at its base. Here—undesecrated by any building sacred or profane—stands in its naked simplicity the natural platform on which it is now inferred was erected the cross of the Savior. From this position with outstretched arms He embraced the city over which He had wept when first He had viewed it from the Mount of Olives. The position of the first and last view are almost exactly opposite each other. As if to place the identification of the spot beyond controversy, an ancient Roman causeway has been discovered stretching in the direction of Herod's Gate, which, passing through Agrippa's wall, opens out almost in front of the platform, and we can scarcely doubt was that along which the procession moved after leaving the Pretorium towards the place of crucifixion. Amongst all the objects referable to the time of our Lord, none seems to me more clearly genuine than that I have now described as the site of Calvary.—Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

THIS DO IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME.

God was the God of Israel. He had redeemed the descendents of Abraham from the bondage in Egypt. He had given them an annual festival to be held as an enduring memorial of their emancipation from slavery, as well as a covenant symbol of their special relation, as a nationality, to the God of the universe. They had a magnificent public ritual to manifest the excellency of their religion and the superiority of their ordinances to all. The passover was, however, the ordinance that linked the present in glorious memories with the wonderful past. Grand and glorious as were its memories and associations yet, so far as concerned the company assembled with the Great Teacher, it was the last celebration. Old things were passing away. The new order must have new symbols. The Great Teacher is to become the author and source of a New Life and a Redeemer from sin and death.

The new life and the procuring redemption must have new tokens; and the new society, in its ordering fellowship, must have new observances for new remembrances. Accordingly Jesus takes one of the unleavened cakes, gives thanks, breaks it, and hands it to the disciples—first in the incipient church—saying: "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you, this do in remembrance of me." Then taking the cup he again gives thanks, and passes it to the wondering circle with these words: "Drink ye all of it, for this cup is the New Covenant in my blood which is shed for you." The new feast thus supercedes the old, and its sacred emblems are to be an ever-recurring memorial of the absent Lord till he shall come again. Of this new institution the memories linking the present to the histories of the past are most impressive. They reach the solemn scene in Jerusalem, they grasp the gatherings of the martyred myriads, they take hold of solemn assemblings all the way along the journey of the pilgrimage church. Is that final communion very far in the future when the "left-over" of the church shall gather around the last table on which the memorial emblems will ever be placed? Will those gathered worshippers have some premonition that the loaf before them will never be replaced—that the cup will never be refilled? Toward the consummation of this age we hasten. Last things are most solemn. There was a last passover—there will soon be a last communion. Let our Savior's words on each occasion sink deeply into our hearts, "This do in remembrance of me."

THE GOSPEL OF LIFE IN THE BOOK OF THE ACTS.

The historical book of the "Acts of the Apostles" furnishes an especial point of view from which to study subjects more fully treated of in the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament. The book of the "Acts," being what it is, shows faith in action, theory in practice, and teaching, unfossilized and ranged behind an aggressive front, in preaching. It epitomizes the much that was said in the little that is reported, thereby bringing salient points into prominence; and that is an advantage. It does more than give outlines of Apostolic discourse: it shows the impressions those discourses produced, and the practical results to which they led in those who heard them, whether of antagonism or surrender or suspense of judgment pending the reception of more light. The value of circumstantial evidence is well known; we have it here in the Acts. From this point of view, seemingly trival incidents acquire a value quite unique. Having the Gospels and Epistles to guide us, we can assign a definite evidential force even to the impressions of those who heard the first proclaimers of the gospel. The authorities in Jerusalem were sorely troubled because the apostles "taught the people, and proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead." We know what that means. The Jews in Thessalonica thought to incite the Gentile subjects of Cæsar against the men who were going everywhere "turning the world upside down" by their testimony to the claims of the Anointed Monarch of the world. We understand that. The curiosity of the Athenians was excited because Paul proclaimed "Jesus and the Resurrection." We know also what that means.

And so we might go on, noting and comparing incidents which yield striking glimpses of what the speeches must have said, and the proportions which they must have given to the various truths and facts they proclaimed. No doubt we have to allow for mere passing necessities of discourse, since the enemy had to be confronted just where he pleased to show himself. Nevertheless, when we observe the care spared with which the first preachers made their way to that which was nearest their hearts, striking out short roads to the centre from every point of the circumference; when moreover, we remember, the hot haste in which they fulfilled their mission—partly from choice, and partly from necessity—so that they had to speak out quickly that which they felt their hearers most needed to know—then their utter silence on some themes is not more startling than their manifest explicitness on others is impressive. There is one subject which we can see they must have said much about, judging from what is recorded; for though the record of it does not bulk large when measured by the concordance, the few references to it are very significant. That subject is the theme of this paper: The glad tidings of life—of life in Christ. The formal allusions are but four, but each of them is striking.

I. For instance, what could be more significant than the way in which our Lord Jesus is set forth in iii. 14, 15, as the "Author," or rather as the "Princely Leader (ἀρχηγὸν) of Life," in plainly designed contrast with Barabbas the "murderer?" Contrast, it is well known, is one of the most available and efficient means of fixing the meaning of language; and the contrast here speaks for itself. Barabbas did not simply rob men of their happiness, but he took away their lives. By contrast, Christ does not merely grant men happiness, though of course he does that, but he confers upon them the substantive gift of life itself. It is through him and through him only,—through him moreover as the fruit of his redeeming work,—that men may live for ever. Christ did not create them immortal; but he makes them immortal in saving them. We know this to be the thought here because of the inherent significance of a title which contrasts him with the murderer. He is not merely the "Author" or "Giver" of life, but the "Princely Leader" of it. He rises to life first that we also may rise. As a Prince he leads the way, beckoning the army of contenders for the life immortal to follow him through death and resurrection up to God's right hand in eternal glory. Both points stand forth boldly: it is substantive life that he gives, and that substantive life is the life beyond death, everlasting and blessed. But for him we had perished.

II. Then again what a nameless beauty of brevity and power is to be seen in the words of the delivering angel, v. 20: "Go ye, and stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life." "This life," "all the words of" it; nothing more is said—that is enough. And yet this covers the whole gospel of Christ; since it was for preaching this that the apostles had been imprisoned, and it was to preach it again that they were now set free. So then, to preach life is to preach the gospel. Note, moreover, the pronoun: "this life." The pronoun is given without an antecedent: the angel only says "this life," not explaining what life—there was no need—the apostles knew what life without being told. How striking! All the more so, just because the phrase has another well-known reference which is morally impossible here. "This life" does sometimes mean the present life in contrast with "the life to come," though it cannot mean that here. When, however, it is so used, the pronoun, "this," is suitable just because it hits a familiar nail on the head: "This life"—that you are now living—this ails all around you—that you are all always thinking about. Well, now, to take this very phrase out of the lips of common-place and set it to the key of life immortal made possible through the risen Jesus, was worthy of an angel! Worthy, however, not as being far-fetched, but as being exquisitely and eloquently fitted to the men and the matter in hand. "This life" spoken by angel lips to apostles' ears, could only mean one thing: it meant eternal life, given in Christ, as rescue from perishing. This is what the apostles would instinctively and instantly think of; for of it they were full. This is what they burned to blaze abroad. And, therefore, it was the eternal life in this case, that was the frequently named, the familiar, the ever-present. The angel knew the chord he struck. It is impossible also to see reflected in the phrase "this life" a fitness not only to the minds of the apostles, but to the minds also of the people of Jerusalem. "This life" was in the air. Every one in Jerusalem had been talking about it. In fact, we can, without the slightest strain, conceive of a believing Jew overtaking a doubting Jew in the streets of Jerusalem and begging renewed converse with his neighbor thus—"Another word, brother, concerning this life,"—supply, "about which we were talking when last we met." We ought perhaps to apologise for belaboring so obvious an explanation of this strangely familiar allusion to what has largely fallen out of nineteenth century Christian discourse. But there is the phrase in the Acts. We believe the exposition of it here offered cannot be gainsaid. Simple as it is, it may well furnish food for reflection.

III. The next allusion to life is on the face of it, extremely simple and casual. It is the satisfied exclamation of the men of the circumcision when they had heard Peter's narrative of his going in unto Cornelius, the centurion of Cæsarea. "And when they heard this, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then to the Gentiles also hath God granted repentance unto life" (xi. 18). This is a remarkable exclamation, if for no other reason than that it completes the evidence that God hath granted repentance unto the whole world. He had before this granted, through his exalted Son, "repentance unto Israel" (ch. v. 31): now, "to the Gentiles, also," hath he granted the same privilege. But Israel and the Gentiles, considered, make up the whole world. Therefore, to the whole world hath God granted repentance. Praise for evermore be to his holy name! This, however, is not the only remarkable thing about the passage. Another thing in it is worthy of notice; and that is the way in which repentance is described. It is called "repentance unto life." It might have been described in one of several other ways; such as repentance unto reformation—repentance unto forgiveness—repentance unto holiness, but no! it is named simply "repentance unto life." It thus echoes the fundamental note of the gospel: "You have sinned and deserve to die; but by Christ, the Life-giver, even the wanderer is to return, to give up the sin that rules; and he seeks thus to remove the only obstacle to the forthgoing towards that soul of his life-giving power and love. If men will only repent, Christ promises that they shall live for ever. Life eternal in sin is what the holy Jesus neither will nor can bestow. We may be told that this is but a slender argument to show that the first Christians believed eternal life to be obtainable only on the basis of holy union with Christ. Our reply is that we do not for a moment count it for more than a passing indication of what was the current of primitive thought—a mere link in the chain of circumstantial evidence; and yet we are bold to affirm that all the same it does count for something. It will be seen that, for the moment, we are appealing to practical minds. Let preachers begin to speak frequently and emphatically of repentance as being "unto life," and they will soon feel the force of the argument, circumstantial though it is. We know with what accelerated speed and intensified appreciation, the word, as a choice word, leaps to our lips. Let doubting brethren try it; they are surely not afraid of primitive forms of speech.

IV. The fourth and last passage which our principle of selection brings before us is perhaps considerably more weighty than the preceding; and in some ways is certainly quite unique among all texts in the New Testament which refer to the gift of everlasting life. Acts xiii. 46-48 is the passage: "And Paul and Barnabas spake out boldly, and said, It was necessary that the Word God should first be spoken to you. Seeing ye thrust it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee for a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the uttermost parts of the earth. And as the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the Word of God: and as many as were disposed for eternal life believed." This passage with its context is graphic; and should be graphically understood. To fly off to high dogma, of the nature of fatalism, in order to decipher it, is in our judgment just the way not to get near grasping the facts as they lie pictured before us. These Gentiles have for a week been hearing an announcement of eternal life which has not been directly addressed to them—only to Jews—in their hearing. Notwithstanding this circumstance, they have become immensely interested in what these Palestinian Jews—Paul and Barnabas—have been proclaiming to their Antiochian brethren. We see this in their conduct. On the first Sabbath, these Gentile outsiders occupy, it may be, only a few of the back seats in the synagogue, but on the second Sabbath, there they are in great numbers: for meanwhile one serious Gentile has been telling another of the strange and wonderful discoursing of the Hebrew visitors concerning life eternal in and through a risen Jew—one Jesus. The report has set the city by the ears; and that is how the crowd behind has flocked in to-day. Their inconvenient numbers—their eager curiosity—their marked and respectful attention fill the minds of the old Hebrew synagogue worshippers with jealousy. "What! are they to show more interest than we?" We fancy we can see the growing impatience of the Hebrews. They shake their heads. They exchange knowing glances with each other. By and by, the meeting is open; and one Jew after another begins to speak against the teaching of Paul and Barnabas; till, waxing warm, and finding that they are ready to keep each other in countenance, they actually revile the advocates of Jesus. Hereupon the new preachers are emboldened to meet the opposition with the prompt courage of which we have just read in the verses cited above. We picture the Apostle Paul waving his hand with a decisive welcome to the crowd behind as he says, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles," climbing his act by his confirming word from Isaiah the prophet. But in leading up to this act and its prophetic confirmation, Paul and Barnabas have told their Hebrew hearers how they view their unseemly conduct—what construction the put on it:—they hold them, by their envious and vilifying opposition, to have done two things: (1st) To have thrust from them the Word of God; (2nd) To have judged themselves unworthy of eternal life. Profoundly significant charge, as we shall see. But let us follow the unexpected development of incidents to its climax. The Gentiles, or a number of them, are delighted. This is just what they wanted. They have heard and have been deeply moved by the preaching. The eternal life preached—and so preached, through the risen Jesus—has been to them a revelation. It has fascinated them. It has impressed them. It has mightily drawn them. They have in fact believed it, as far as they have felt themselves entitled to believe it. But their faith has looked a basis for personal appropriation. They have not been sure that the "life" was for them. They have not been told so. As Gentiles—out of covenant, and not directly addressed—they have doubted it. Now, however, their doubts and fears are set at rest by this "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." And so it comes to pass that as many of these aforesaid interested Gentiles as are disposed—have come to be disposed—with the facts before us why ask how they have come to be disposed: as if there was no disposing power in the most gracious and believable announcement to mortals of life everlasting!—as many of them as have become disposed for life eternal; disposed, that is to say, to trust Christ for it, and in the strength to fight the battle to obtain [illegible] now believe, with all the assurance and joy of an explicitly warranted faith. So at least we understand this, as we think, much misunderstood and much abused passage. And we further presume to think that had not lurking reminders of fatalism conspired with some lack of historical imagination in the minds of translators and revisers to obscure this most vividly concrete apostolic reminiscence, our common people might ere now have revelled in its simple gospel light. It only remains to go back for a moment upon the unheard of crime which Paul and Barnabas charged upon these jealous Antiochian Jews: the crime, namely, of judging themselves unworthy of eternal life. We do not hear this crime charged home upon men now-a-days; and the reason is, the false attitude which a debased Christianism has assumed towards the merciful provision of life eternal. It cannot be a sin to judge ourselves unworthy of eternal life, unless it be right to count ourselves worthy of it. From this there is no logical escape. But morally worthy of it sinners cannot be. What worthiness then remains for worthiness of some kind there must be; else could it be no sin in any men, Jews or Gentiles, to count themselves unworthy. From the standpoint of the position that man was created for but not in immortality, we can answer this crucial question. Our answer is this. Sinners are men; and though men as sinners are morally unworthy, yet men as men are ontologically worthy; that is to say, they belong to a race for whose capacities life eternal is the only worthy and commensurate destiny. In this sense, all men are worthy of eternal life; and it is a high crime when any judge themselves unworthy of it. Their duty is to rejoice in the possibility, through Divine grace, of obtaining it. Their duty is to be warmly disposed to accept the gift. Their duty is to give God credit for his large-hearted generosity and his perfect perception of the fitness of things in providing for men, though sinners—because still they are men—the inestimable boon. Their duty is, when the precious promise is brought home to them, to take it to themselves and to rely upon it. In a word, their duty is, both to be disposed for eternal life, and to believe! After this, the unproved dogma that men are in any case destined to live for ever because they are necessarily immortal by creation, stands discredited.—Joseph H. Rotherham in Rainbow.

The statue in Wall Street, New York, erected on the spot where Washington was inaugurated first President of the United States, is the largest statue of him in the country. It is the work of John Q. A. Ward. It is of light-colored bronze, and is of colossal size, being about thirteen feet six inches in height and weighs seventy-five hundred pounds. The head is two feet in height and two feet broad, in extreme measurement. The extreme breadth of the statue is six feet. The pedestal on which it stands is about six feet in height, and what may be called the rostrum, on which the pedestal is placed is about seven feet above the street-level. This and the pedestal were designed by Richard M. Hunt.

Washington, in the statue, is supposed to be in the act of taking the oath of office. The left foot is slightly advanced and the right hand extended. The left hand rests on the hilt of his sword. The figure is dressed in the costume of the period—open coat, long waistcoat, knee-breeches and stockings, with low-cut shoes and buckles. Around the neck is an old-fashioned cravat. Frills are displayed at the shirt-front and ruffles at the wrist. The body is erect, and the head is held high. The features express calm dignity and power. To the right of the figure is a short column of fasces, on which rests an open Bible. A military cloak hangs from the left shoulder and partly conceals the left arm, affording a mass of drapery for a background.

The inscription, cut in large, plain letters on the rostrum face is:

ON THIS SITE,
In the building then known as Federal Hall,
GEORGE WASHINGTON
Took the Oath of Office as First President of
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
April 30th, A. D. 1789.

Altogether the work cost about $35,000, of which ninety per cent. was subscribed by members of the Chamber of Commerce. The statue was cast by the Henry and Bonnard Bronze Manufacturing Company, of New York. In front of the statue is the memorial stone (surrounded by a railing) on which Washington stood when he took his first oath of office as President.

Sunshine All the Way.

ADA M. STEPSON.

Sometime, when cares and sorrows all are past,
And we no more shall know a tear or sigh;
When life's dark heavy clouds have closed at last,
And the eternal sunshine draweth nigh,
We'll see, methinks, how small and light will prove
The griefs and cares we make so hard to-day!
And how, had we but trusted in God's love,
We might have seen the sunshine all the way.

It cannot be that days should all be bright,
Of grief and pain we each must have a share!
Behind the clouds is lingering still the light!
God will not send us more than we can bear.
Then let us joy to think God knows the best,
And scatter love and kindness all we may.
To make the paths of others free from more blest
Will help us find the sunshine all the way.

When He cometh the New Jerusalem cometh; the Paradise of God cometh; the river of the water of life, saints, angels, the new heaven, the new earth, all beauty, all splendor, all sanctity, the realization of all lovely dreams, love; in a word, all that is precious cometh; nor will it ever be possible to conceive of a good not found in the region irradiated by His smile.

He that Should Come.

When John the Baptist was languishing in the prison of Machaerus, vainly waiting for deliverance, his great soul began to wrestle with the doubt that prompted the question he sent to Jesus: "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" A similar question might have sprung to the lips of the Judean shepherds when, at the word of the angel, they hastened to Bethlehem to find the Savior of the world, and saw only a helpless little "babe wrapped in swaddling-clothes, lying in a manger," among "the beasts of the stall." It would not have been surprising if they had turned from the babe and its poor mother with the incredulous query: "Can this be the great Messiah of whom the prophets of our Israel have spoken—he who should deliver his people?" But they were devout, clear-eyed souls who had often, in the long night watches, dreamed of the "consolation of Israel" and they believed the wondrous words of the heavenly messenger and rejoiced with great joy.

Yes, the Christ of Bethlehem, of Nazareth, of Gethsemane, of Calvary, is "He that should come." The sweet perfume of his beatiful name has wafted on breath of prayer and song around the world. The sound of his footsteps has gone forth through all the earth. Wherever his dear feet have walked, through all the Christian ages, the desert has rejoiced and blossomed as the rose. As the Sun of Righteousness, shining in his strength, with "healing in his wings," He has been pouring light, life and joy into the darkness, death and sorrow of the world.

Yes, it is "He that should come," for behold he has opened the eyes of the blind, unstopped the ears of the deaf, made the lame to leap as a hart, caused the tongue of the dumb to sing for joy, and thrilled the heart of despair with the music of eternal hope. He has proclaimed "liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." He has bound up the broken-hearted and given to the mourners in Zion "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."....

"Look we for another?" No! He is "the fairest among ten thousand and altogether lovely." He is the mighty Savior who has saved us from sin and filled us with love, peace, hope, joy and eternal life. Could another do mightier works than he has done? No, we look not for another; but with the early disciples we look for "this same Jesus" to come again "the second time without sin unto salvation." With Paul, we look for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ." With John, the beloved, we hear the voice of him "which testifieth these things," saying to us, "Surely, I come quickly," and our longing hearts respond, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

The Ascension.

If I had sufficient imagination I should like to picture our Lord and the eleven walking up the side of Olivet, communing as they went—a happy company, with a solemn awe upon them, but with an intense joy in having fellowship with each other. Each disciple was glad to think that His dear Lord and Master who had been crucified was now among them, not only alive, but surrounded with a mysterious safety and glory which none could disturb. The enemy was as still as a stone; not a dog moved his tongue; His bitterest foes made no sign during the days of our Lord's after-life below.

The company moved onward peacefully toward Bethany—Bethany which they all knew and loved. But they come to a standstill, having reached the brow of the hill. The Savior stands conspicuously in the centre of the group, and, following upon most instructive discourse, He pronounces a blessing upon them. He lifts His pierced hands, and while He is lifting them and is pronouncing words of love, He begins to rise from the earth. He has risen above them all to their astonishment! In a moment He has passed beyond the olives, which seem with their silvery sheen to be lit up by His milder radiance. While the disciples are looking, the Lord has ascended into mid-air, and speedily He has risen to the regions of the clouds. They stand spellbound with astonishment, and suddenly a bright cloud, like a chariot of God, bears Him away. That cloud, conceals Him from mortal gaze. Though we have known Christ after the flesh, now after the flesh know we Him no more. They are riveted to the spot, very naturally so; they linger long in the place, they stand with streaming eyes, wonder-struck, still looking upward.

Their lengthened gaze needed to be interrupted, and, therefore, two shining ones, such as aforetime met the woman at the sepulchre, are sent to them. These messengers of God appear in human form that they may not alarm them, and in white raiment as is to remind them that all was bright and joyous; and these white robed ministers stood with them as if they would willingly join their company. As no one of the eleven would break silence, the men in white raiment commenced the discourse. Address them in the usual celestial style, they ask a question which contained its own answer, and then went on to tell their message. As they had once said to the woman, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen;" so did they now say, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

Do you not see them going down the side of Olivet, taking that Sabbath day's journey into the cruel and wicked city without a thought of fear; having no dread of the bloodthirsty crew who slew their Lord, but happy in the memory of their Lord's exaltation and in the expectation of a wonderful display of his power. They held fellowship of the most delightful kind with one another, and anon entered into the upper room, where in protracted prayer and communion they waited for the promise of the Father. You see I have no imagination; I have barely mentioned the incidents in the simplest language. Just try and realize the scene, for it will be helpful so to do, since our Lord Jesus is to come in like manner as the disciples saw Him go up into heaven.

Editor Restitution:

You will please to publish this notice in THE RESTITUTION:

George Cook died in Rudd, Floyd Co., Iowa, on the 13th of November, 1884, of paralysis, aged seventy-nine the fifth of last July. He was a firm believer in life only in Christ at his appearing and kingdom. He heard, believed and obeyed the gospel that is a savor unto life in 1857. He met with bitter opposition in his family from his companion and some of his children; but he never faltered, no not for a moment, knowing that it is through tribulations that he must enter the kingdom of God. Oh, that we may all greet him when the Life Giver comes is the prayer of his daughter,

SARAH POTTER.

VOICELESS NIGHT.

(Author unknown, the manuscript being found in an English cottage.)

In the still silence of the voiceless night,
When, chased by airy dreams, the slumbers flee,
Whom in the darkness doth my spirit seek,
O God, but Thee!

And if there be a weight upon my breast,
Some vague impression of the day foregone,
Scarce knowing what it is, I fly to Thee,
And lay it down.

Or if it be the heaviness that comes
In token of anticipated ill,
My bosom takes no heed of what it is,
Since 'tis thy will.

For, oh! in spite of past and present care
Or anything beside, how joyfully
Passes that almost solitary hour,
My God, with thee!

More tranquil than the stillness of the night,
More peaceful than the silence of that hour,
More blest than anything, my spirit lies
Beneath thy power.

For what is there on earth that I desire,
Of all that it can give or take from me,
Or whom in heaven doth my spirit seek,
O God but thee?

THE DESTINY OF THE JEWS.

Sermon By Rev. Dr. H. Pereira Mendes at Nineteenth Street Synagogue.

Preaching from Exodus xiii. 21, Dr. Pereira Mendes yesterday reviewed the stirring portion of the day containing the escape from Pharoah, the passage of the Red Sea, the battle with Amalek. Many a time since then, he continued, have we exulted at our escape from a Pharaoh of tyranny only to find a new peril threaten us; oft have we passed through a sea of trouble and Amalek after Amalek have we fought. What is to be the end of it all? Never has nation withstood like ours tempests of time, decay incident to age, the withering lightnings of a world's contempt. But the night of oppression is o'erpassed, and we enjoy a day of prosperity; the sunshine of liberty bathes us; the light of toleration irradiates us, and in the warm glow of equality we bask. Yet, as in our text, our fathers in the day saw but a cloud to indicate the presence of a Providence working for them, so it seems that the workings of Providence for us to-day are clouded in mystery. Has a Providence ceased to work for us, or is our destiny accomplished? [illegible] but one answer. For I [illegible] brought forth from [illegible] and Christian [illegible] have we been kept alive [illegible] thousand unparalleled atrocities, each enough to make humanity ashamed to the very end of time—simply and only that we might become good American citizens?

Our destiny to be a nation of Mosaisms, to Messianise the world by our example. Then, alas for the world! What aeons of ages must pass before it is Messianized!

Friends, Judaism must have something to live for, or it will succumb under present conditions. It is not a question of reform or orthodoxy, it is a question of the existence of Judaism. To say we have no distinctive national future and here is our Palestine, that we were brought out of Egypt and preserved through centuries to come to an end here, to let loose a tide of pretty words flashing with generalities, to now and then ridicule or openly insult orthodox Judaism, will not preserve our faith or our nation. It is true that orthodoxy as is generally seen in this city is too often combined with uncouth manners or dress of some of its followers. That is the result of their environment in the lands they have left. It does not represent the countless cultured, courtly men whom kings honored and princes respected in days gone by. But shall reformed Judaism be taken as the standard of Judaism, with its abandonment of its distinctive national future? How can it, when a leading preacher publicly declared a fortnight ago that reform had as yet failed to achieve what it promised. It has not succeeded in consolidating Judaism, in rallying Israel around its elevated standard. Instead of rendering the Jews more faithful and more ardent upholders of the time honored flag it, even more than old-fashioned orthodoxy, allowed the watchfires of religion, the flames of the domestic altar, to cool down, if not to die out altogether.

A HIGHER DESTINY.

I trust the failure will not end in disaster. Far differently does orthodoxy speak. It declares we have been preserved for some higher destiny—a destiny indicated in the word restoration. With such a hope hearts ever cold pulsate with mighty energy.

Let us then see what restoration means for us and for the Gentiles. It means for us a national home for our people, though they push their individual fortunes in other lands. It means a fatherland which from its position holds the gate for three great continents to trade through, a land which when the iron horse wakes the Oriental quiet will contain cities of swifter growth than even a Chicago, which in 1837 had 4,170 people, or a San Francisco, which in 1846 had only 800. It means a prosperity greater even than in the days of Solomon, when the five trade lines of the then known world converged in his land, and "silver was like stones in the street;" greater than when a Tyre, chief port of the ancient world, teemed with the wealth of a far reaching commerce, as described in Ezekiel, xxvii. which I would ask you to read. And it means a restoration of our religion, a priesthood supported by the people and utilized as the public ministers, educators and judges, and not lobbyists—an end to the present system of every congregation shaping its own course and every individual his own life, and calling the result Judaism.

FOR THE GENTILE WORLD.

For the Gentile world our restoration has yet greater significance. It is a cause of sad thought for the student of history and the believer in mankind's progress to note so many unpleasant features attending the close of this century. The increased resources of civilization have created new social ulcers. The vast fortunes of individuals, the accumulation of capital, the growth of wealthy and powerful corporations built up by the enterprise or foresight of a few throw out of balance many important social relations and give rise to murmurs which may presage a storm of greater violence than has yet shaken society. Furthermore, the jealousies of the modern powers, their great colonization mania promising many future entanglements, the shadows that haunt despots, the unrest of disturbing elements, violent means such as assassination in one land and in another the destruction of historic relics and peril to innocent life—all these things are by no means to the honor of the century. Add to these the divergencies in what is holiest and dearest to humanity, religion. Countless sects, each professing to be right, and not a few consigning all others to perdition, add also the dishonor and fraud continually suspected in ordinary relations of life and the consequent distrust and it must be granted there are many things to be remedied.

Those that will be cured by the education of the masses—and the sooner a moral education is given the masses the better—will be met by the restoration of our people, for that means a court of arbitration for the world. The preacher read in evidence Isaiah ii. 2-4, repeated in Micah iv. 1-3; Zech. viii. 22,* continuing:—This, friends, is something to live for, a destiny noble indeed, an end to which every episode in our wondrous history seems calculated to further. For this was our nation rescued from Egypt, brought to Canaan and preserved amid the wrath tempests launched at it, as "despised and rejected," "sorrowing and grieving," "wounded and bruised," it trod the thorn paths of its terrible pilgrimage.

Is it not a noble destiny, since, by its fulfilment, the whole world will be benefitted? A court of arbitration above all suspicion—and there can be such or we must abandon hope in mankind—would restore to trade thews and sinews now trained to war, and utilize the vast sums spent for warlike purpose to win those victories in the field of humanity's progress, infinitely more glorious; to combat ignorance, grapple with human misery and lead the masses to a higher mental and moral plane. Nation then "shall not lift up sword against nation;" then shall love and truth meet; righteousness and peace embrace. Friends, the workings of Providence may be and are clouded with mystery, but for this we wait, for this we hope, for this we live.—N. Y. Herald.

The Hebrew Language.

Of late years a movement has been observable among Jews which deserves some notice. Whilst in the first half of the present century the study of the Hebrew language was almost forsaken among that class of Jews which "held with progress," that is to say among those who cast almost their entire religion to the winds, became something very much akin to the infidels, the language in which the Old Testament is written has become much more popular among them within the last twenty or thirty years, and even those who do not intend to become Rabbis, now pay a great deal more attention to the "sacred tongue" than even the more Orthodox Jews used to do about forty years ago.

This movement may be looked upon as a healthy reaction. The infidel Jew is more difficult to grapple with than any other infidel, but the Jew who acquires the Hebrew language in order to make himself more thoroughly master of the sacred book of the Old Dispensation, is not like the rock that the Savior talks us about, but may be considered as soil well prepared for receiving the good seed. In fact, whether the doctrine of Salvation be brought to a dead stop with the last chapter of the prophet Malachi, or whether it be carried to its logical ends by the superaddition of the New Testament, there can be no doubt about the immense benefit which every seeker after truth must derive from the study of the language in which Moses and Isaiah wrote. On this subject the Jewish Allgemeine Zeitung makes the following remarks:—

"The Jews who had emigrated to Egypt, after the destruction of the first Temple, had been fully imbued with the Greek civilization of the age, which had become especially powerful since the foundation of Alexandria. Nevertheless they did not deny their Jewish origin; nay, so great was their attachment to their past and their love for their sacred books, that the Jewish friends of King Ptolemy Philometro induced him to have them translated into Greek, a translation which has become known as the Septuagints, after its seventy translators, and which brought the Scriptures of the Old Testament to the knowledge of all the civilized nations of antiquity. It enabled unprejudiced minds among the Greeks, and subsequently among the Romans, to perceive how infinitely the teachings of Judaism are above the views held by the ancient heathens. Throughout the Roman Empire the Scriptures met with numerous friends and admirers, especially among scholars, who would not be satisfied with a mere translation, but set about to study the original tongue. This endeavor on the part of learned Gentiles to acquaint themselves with the Hebrew language has continued down to the present day.

"Since the days of the Reformation, which brought the Bible to the intellectual knowledge of all the nations of Europe, and of the world at large, many scholars have visited the sacred places to acquaint themselves de visu with the surroundings of the great events recorded in the Scripture, and by this means the ethnology and natural history of the East have become as generally known as those of Western countries. We may therefore look upon the Hebrew tongue as that Eastern language which for upwards of 2,000 years has been studied with greater interest by the enquirers after truth than any other language.

"The chief importance of the Hebrew tongue, however, is at the present day to be found in the influence which it has acquired once more as a purely Jewish discipline. During the ages of aggression and persecution, every Jewish parent thought it his duty to instruct his children in the knowledge of the sacred tongue. This instruction, which had fallen into desuetude for a time, is being revived now, and it must necessarily form an integral part of religious teaching for every Jew. The knowledge of the Hebrew language is, if we may term it so, the palladium of the Jewish faith; and an ignorance of the one is generally attended by an ignorance of, and indifference to, the other. True religion must necessarily be strengthened by an acquaintance with the sacred tongue which is the key to the sacred books and indispensible for religious [illegible] controversy." As far as controversy is concerned, it is obvious that the controversial knowledge to be derived from a study of the Scriptures of the Old Testament in the original tongue cannot but lead the student on to the way of Salvation as revealed in the New Testament.—Israel's Watchman.

Jesus Christ and the Jews.

What we said in our first article of the Jews, applied to them as a race or generations of distinct peoples. What we mean by this is that no other nation or tribe of mankind could have suffered the afflictions and persecutions that they have suffered for 2500 years without becoming extinct as a people. According to the divine decree of Jehovah they have been dispersed among all nations of the earth and yet they have not amalgamated or lost their identity as a race. For my part I can see nothing else than the hand of God in all this. Although as a nation they have become the "tail," as spoken of them near 4000 years ago by one of God's prophets, Deuteronomy xxviii. 43; also by another, hundreds of years afterward that "the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterwards shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days; Hosea iii. 4, 5. Christ himself said while on earth: "For there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people; and they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, Luke xxi. 23, 24. All the trials, the persecutions and sufferings that were spoken of them have been fulfilled to the letter. All things have come upon them on account of their disobedience to the commandments of God, in not keeping his Sabbaths, and their worshiping of false gods. When I spoke of them as a loyal people it was in regard to modern times and to other nations, to whom they became subject. They have always been a very zealous people in regard to the traditions of their fathers. The honor and accumulation of wealth that they have gained in Europe and America, in the present century are evidences to me that the times of their dispersion are about ended—the times of the Gentiles about fulfilled. They were over-loyal to the Roman government in the time of Christ; hence they declare "we have no king but Cesar;" John xix. 14. And so they crucified Christ and said; "Let his blood be on us, and on our children; Matt. xxvii. 25. But although they have done all these things in strict accord with all that was spoken of them yet all the prophets of the Scriptures speak in the most glowing terms of a time in the near future, (we apprehend,) when the whole twelve tribes of Israel will be regathered unto the land of Palestine; to the land promised unto the fathers: and they will then certainly become the head and not the tail of the nations. The Jews as a people after the "final restoration," which will take place ere long, will then become the foremost of all peoples—they are now prepared to take lessons from the nations, and Jesus Christ and the church as one perfect ruling element of kings and priests will then rule over them and bless them. And not only that but they shall look on him whom they pierced or [crucified; see Luke i. 33. Matt. xix. 28, all of chapter xii., of Zacharias and all of chapter xxxvi., of Ezekiel; also read Amos ix. 8, to 15. I could cite hundreds of prophecies that speak of their restoration from which they will never be pulled up again. The restoring of this power and kingdom to them is the very gospel; for belief of which and strict obedience to God's commandments will give to men salvation through Jesus Christ.—Josiah M. Fike, in Western News.

This is the second article written in defense of a Jew who located here and who told me yesterday that THE RESTITUTION was the best paper in the world; he is much pleased with it. He and his wife are from Chicago. I remain yours in the one faith.

JOSIAH M. FIKE.

The Persecuting Church.

The Sunday at Home quotes an eloquent preacher of the Romish faith, with fitting comments: The right of persecution was through all ages boldly claimed by the Church of Rome. Surely it is now strange to read the language of Bossuet, one of the most illustrious and also one of the most recent ornaments of that church. He says:

"The Church of Rome is the most intolerant of all Christian sects, it is her holy and inflexible incompatibility which renders her so odious to Protestants; it is this which renders her so severe and so unusual to all sects separated from her; they only desire to be tolerated by her, but her holy severity forbids such indulgence."

And he continues: "The exercise of the power of the sword in matters of religion and conscience is a point not to be called in question; there is no delusion more dangerous than to make toleration a characteristic of the true church."

No doubt upon these doctrines Rome has throughout all ages faithfully acted, and these principles called into existence the daggers of St. Bartholomew, the sword of D'Alva, and the fires and stakes of the Inquisition. The good King St. Louis always recommended his crusaders not to argue with unbelievers, but to "thrust the sword into them up to the hilt."

If men want light, there is abundance to guide them; if they choose darkness, God will not compel their belief.

The Faith of a Child.

The following incident, as related by the Denver News, occurred at Platteville, Colorado, showing as it does the strength of a child's faith, and the care and faithfulness of God in regarding it:

"The child went with her father, on a cold afternoon, in the woods to find the cattle, and was told to follow the calves home, while the father continued his search for the cows. She did so, but the calves misled her, and very soon she became conscious that she was lost. Night came on, and with it the cold November and the dreaded wolves. With a strange calmness she continued on her uncertain way. The next day, Sunday, at ten a. m., she reached, in her wanderings, the house of John Beebe, near a place called Evans, having traveled constantly for eighteen hours, and a distance of not less than twenty-five miles. All night the wolves growled around her, but harmed her not; neither was she in the least frightened by them, although we are far from supposing Colorado wolves to be as harmless as kittens. All know that in ordinary cases fierce packs of bloodthirsty wolves would devour a man and even a horse. But this little one was invincible in her trusting, simple faith. The narrative states: 'She said that the wolves kept close to her heels, and snapped at her feet; but her mother had told her if she was good the Lord would always take care of her, and so she knew the wolves would not hurt her, because God wouldn't let them!' The child was hunted by a great number of people, and being found was restored shortly to her parent in perfect health and soundness."

The Story Told by the Drummer at the Bar.

"No, I won't drink with you to-day, boys," said a drummer to several companions, as they settled down in the smoking car and passed the bottle. "The fact is boys I have quit drinking—I've sworn off." He was greeted with shouts of laughter by the jolly crowd around him; they put the bottle under his nose and indulged in many jokes at his expense, but he refused to drink, and was rather serious about it. "What's the matter with you, old boy?" sang out one. "If you've quit drinking something's up; tell us what it is."

"Well, boys, I will though I know you'll laugh at me. But I will tell you all the same. I have been a drinking man all my life, ever since I was married, as you all know. For seven years not a day passed over my head that I didn't have at least one drink. But I am done. Yesterday I was in Chicago. Down on South Clark street a customer of mine keeps a pawn shop in connection with his other business. I called on him, and while there a young man of not more than twenty-five, wearing threadbare clothes, and looking as hard as if he hadn't seen a sober day for a month, came in with a little package in his hand. Tremblingly he unwrapped it, and handed the article to the pawnbroker, saying 'Give me ten cents.'

And, boys, what do you suppose it was? A pair of baby shoes, little things with the buttons only a trifle soiled, as if they had been worn once or twice. 'Where did you get these?' asked the pawnbroker. 'Got 'em at home,' replied the man, who had an intelligent face and the manner of a gentleman, despite his sad condition. 'My—my wife bought them for our baby. Give me ten cents for 'em—I want a drink.' 'You had better take these shoes back to your wife; the baby will need them,' said the pawnbroker. 'No s-she won't because she's dead. She's lying at home now—died last night.'

As he said this the poor fellow broke down, bowed on the show-case and cried like a child." "Boys," said the drummer, "you can laugh if you please, but I—I have a baby of my own at home, and I swear I'll never drink another drop." Then he got up and went into another car. His companions glanced at each other in silence; no one laughed; the bottle disappeared, and soon each was sitting in a seat by himself reading a newspaper.

My Dear Children:

Before you forget the beautiful history of the promised one, I want to interest you a little longer about the circumstances which surrounded his children, who were twin boys, whom the Lord called, "two nations and two manner of people, and said the one people should be stronger than the other people, and the older should serve the younger;" and truly they were strangely different from their birth. The first born was red, covered with hair just like an animal; he was of a restless disposition, "a cunning hunter, and a man of the field;" when he went forth it was with the intent to kill, and no doubt his hands were daily red with blood. His brother was very different for he loved his home, sought the society of his dear mother, would listen to her advice, and from his youth thought upon God; reason, and not instinct only, governed all his actions.

And yet there was something about the hunter his father loved, his thoughts followed him in all his wanderings; but the youngest was mother's favorite. One day the eldest came in from hunting very hungry, and his brother was eating a bowl of pottage. He said to him, "feed me I pray thee with that same red pottage, for I am faint," and this confirmed his name, which signifies "red." The younger one said, "sell me this day thy birthright." He answered "I am going to die and what profit will this birthright do to me?" And the younger said, swear unto me this day, and he swear unto him "and sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, thus the firstborn despised his birthright." When their father was about a hundred years old, and his sight became dim he thought he was going to die, and called his firstborn, and said to him, "Go, my son, to the field and hunt me venison, and make me savory meat such as my soul loveth, that I may bless thee before I die." He quickly obeyed the voice of his father, but as soon as he was gone his mother, who had heard what her husband had said, called the youngest, and told him to go to the flock, and fetch two kids of the goats, and said, I will make them savory meat such as thy father loveth, and thou shalt bring it to thy father that he may eat and bless thee before his death. He told his mother his brother was hairy and he was a smooth man. My father may feel me, and I shall seem to him a deceiver, and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing, and his mother said, "Upon me be the curse my son, only obey my voice, go fetch me them." He hastened to do as she desired and she made the savory meat. Then she took the goodly raiment which belonged to his brother and put it on him, and that which was unclothed she covered with the sacrificial skin of the kid from the flock. Its blood had to be shed before the blessing could come upon nations, and the blessing must first come from the promised one.

Children, beloved, I want you clearly to perceive that the youngest was sole possessor of his brother's birthright, that it was lawfully his by purchase, and confirmed by an oath, and it became his because the firstborn did not buy it; if he had done so I think he would never have sold it; he came into the world with this right and made no sacrifice to retain it. The youngest perceiving what wealth this birthright entailed upon his brother, would have been thankful if he could have gathered a few crumbs from such a rich table. They were children of one parent and yet represented two different peoples. It is well, my children, for you to understand the one who possessed the birthright must have his father's blessing. This alone entitled him to it. Therefore when he stood before his father clothed in the goodly raiment of his brother, possessing all his brother's right, he could truly say, "I am thy firstborn," for in this deep and true sense, seeking the blessing which belonged to him, he was none other. His name given him by his father did not entitle him to the right, God having willed or promised an immense tract of land to Abraham and Isaac. The firstborn of Isaac was born with the same right, but he had the privilege of selling this right to his brother, which he did of his own free will. He did not reason or look into the future, but was entirely controlled by present circumstances, not perceiving as his brother did, the recompense of reward the birthright conferred upon him.

Dear children if we read this history in a careless way, we come to the conclusion that their mother was a deceiver and influenced her son to practice the same deceit on her husband; but she knew the youngest had the right to the promised one's blessing, because the very fact of his craving the birthright was to her a manifestation of the fruits of righteousness. It may seem strange to you that the promised one should be the father of two such opposite characters, the firstborn so blind to his own interests, and the youngest seeking in every way to obtain it; the firstborn seemed to cause his mother bitter grief, and no doubt she would often remonstrate with him to no purpose.

Now let me unfold to your tender minds in as simple a way as possible, what this is intended to teach, for God's grand and wonderful purpose is wrapped up in the circumstances surrounding these two boys, which was prophetic or history in advance. God would not have taken such care of the Scriptures these many centuries if in reading the history of his dear ones of old it conveyed no deeper meaning than what you read in the beautiful story book. Therefore it is written, "Search the Scriptures." Isaac, or the promised one, was a type or figure of Jesus Christ who was promised to the world hundreds of years before he came, and when he did come the faithful who were waiting for him said, "This is he of whom the prophets did write." It is said the twin boys were two nations, differing from one another. The firstborn represented the Jewish nation who had a right and title to Jehovah's blessing; but this they despised and were blind to the glorious inheritance which their birth as a firstborn nation brought them into possession of. They had no faith in "the exceeding great and precious promises" given to their fathers, and the very one through which the birthright came, even the promised Redeemer, they rejected and killed.

Isaac was the father of these two nations, but Jehovah was the father of our Lord and Savior. The youngest son who bought the birthright represented the Gentile nations who had no more to give than a mess of pottage for the glorious birthright for which they earnestly craved. As two nations they had one father, but there is a marked difference between a Jew and Gentile. God wanted the firstborn should have it. He sent his dear Son "who would have gathered them as a hen doth her brood under her wings, but they would not." Our blessed Lord called them the lost sheep to whom alone he was sent; he offered the gift without money and without price, but of their own will they rejected it. God forces no man, all he asks is their will; this he must have or this will can never be done on earth as it is in heaven." And because they despised his goodness, he offered their glorious portion to the Gentiles, which, if we accept, makes us the seed of Abraham or "children of promise as Isaac was." We obtain our birthright by being born out of water, as Jesus said, "Except a man be born of water and the spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Ye must be born again. This is God's way of giving us the birthright, which makes us children of the covenant. We can obtain the birthright no other way, for God has promised the Gentiles nothing but what the Jews lost, and if we neglect this we can never receive the promised inheritance. The meaning of the name of the youngest son was "Supplanter" which signifies he gained something belonging to another, and stood in the exact position of his brother, the firstborn. "The word of the Lord is a lamp unto our feet and a light to our path." I remain your affectionate teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

I left home on the 23d day of Jan. and traveled 280 miles, returning home on the 17th of February, finding my family in tolerably good health. I delivered while gone from home 27 lectures on the themes we so dearly love found in the Scriptures of truth, to well filled houses. It seems to me that the people at large are becoming more interested in the truths of the Bible now than in former years. I immersed two men in the all saving name of Jesus Christ. May the Lord bless them and guide them into all truth. May they ever be found battling for the truth as it is in Christ until the Lord shall come to reward all his saints.

HERE AND THERE.

MRS. ORA C. SEEDMAN.

"At evening time it shall be light."

Most favored Saint, kept here so late,
Thy Master's gracious will to wait;
Thou here shalt know His matchless ways,
That heightened test thy pilgrim days.

Thou here hast trod with aching feet,
The paths where sin and sickness meet;
But there thy Savior stands with palm,
With robe, and crown, and victor's psalm.

Thou here hast seen thy friends depart,
While thou wast left with broken heart;
But there thy loved and lost shall shine,
Like thee in radiant life divine.

Thou here hast known the pain of toil,
That curse to man, on brain, or soil;
There thou shalt join the glorious feast,
Of those from toil and curse released.

Thou here hast known a mother's woes,
Her cares, her fears, her cares, her throes;
There thou shalt know right royal pride,
With ransomed children by thy side.

Thou here hast lived a humble lot,
Not name, nor fame, from mortals sought;
Thou there shalt wear such sweet renown,
As deck the all diamond's crown.

For here, like her, a cross hast knelt,
[illegible]
But there thy joy, not for that cost,
But thousands through his preaching won.

Thou, here, as we by faith hath been,
The Lord's own, but dimly seen:
Yet firmly faith, like Jacob's tried,
In Joseph shall be verified.

Thus, till death loose the silver cord,
Or [illegible] proclaim the Lord,
Mayst thou, to one and here to there,
The glory of God's presence bear.

"THEORIES OF INSPIRATION."

A Bible Student's Reply to the Editor of the "Biblical Exegetist,"

[Concluded.]

Mr. Robert Ashcroft in advancing his peculiar theory of inspiration in the Exegetist, further adds:

"We apply a much more reasonable canon "of inspiration to the sacred writings when we so far overcome our timidity as to acknowledge in them the presence of a human as well as divine element."

That the theory of partial inspiration as set forth in the above statement is "a much more reasonable canon of inspiration" of the sacred writings than that of the Plenary inspiration of the Scriptures does not appear from anything that the Editor of the Exegetist has given us on the subject.

What are we to understand by this dual character ascribed to the sacred writings—"the presence of a human as well as divine element?" Have we fallibility and infallibility intermingling and co-existing? If the sacred writers were controlled by the Spirit, and this "inspiration power" was an "infallible guide," as the Editor of the Exegetist has told us, are we to understand that the Spirit failed in its work as an "infallible guide" and allowed the exercise of human volition in penning the sacred writings? How else could "the element" have found a place therein commingling with the Divine in the same text? The sacred writers either were "controlled" by the Spirit or they were not. They either wrote under the "inspirational power" of the Spirit or they did not. There can be no intermediate ground. If they were controlled by the Spirit—if they wrote under its inspirational power—then they were but human agents or instruments, in giving us a Divine record, true in every particular, because written under the guiding power of God. On the other hand, if they exercised human volition, or their own wills, in penning the sacred writings, or any part of them, then they are not an inspired work, and God is made a party to a grand deception in palming off upon frail mortals as an authoritative inspired work the inventions of human minds. The idea is preposterous. Indeed might a person feel great "timidity" in ascribing to the sacred writings a character which casts almost blasphemous aspersions upon the Creator and Lawgiver, as well as impeaching the honesty of the sacred writers, who have never claimed for themselves credit as authors, or even hinted that they penned the sacred writings other than under Divine guidance, as they were "moved" by the Holy Spirit.

In the same line of reasoning the writer in question continues:

"The degree of inspiration for which we contend is neither greater, nor less than would be required for the exhibition of the Divine schemes in its fullness and integrity. It simply embraces all that appertains directly or indirectly to that system of truth of which Christ is the center and end."

Are we to understand by the foregoing that there are degrees of inspiration? He claims a "degree of inspiration" no "greater or less than would be required for the exhibition of a Divine scheme;" but how is he able to determine with certainty this degree, or draw this line of distinction, or how any other human being is able to do so, he utterly fails to inform us. The Romanist could put forth this arrogant claim more consistently by claiming for his church—on the assumption of Apostolic succession, as he does—divinely delegated authority to interpret the Scriptures, and he thus escapes the dilemma into which our author involves himself and his followers. If one human being can presumptuously claim the prerogative of private judgment to determine the "degree of inspiration" with which we are to interpret the Scriptures and ascertain the Divine will and character, any one can just as consistently set up the claim for the greater or less degree of inspiration for the same purpose, and so on ad infinitum. Thus would the whole obligatory force of the Scriptures, as the word of God, be frittered away, and the solid foundation of Christian hope be irretrievably shattered, to the inconceivable delight of infidels and the enemies of Christianity every where.

The doctrine of partial inspiration, as advocated by this writer, cannot be accepted by any devout Christian and consistent Bible Student for the following reasons among many others:

1. It is a hypothesis without the sanction of the Scriptures. If the Divine Author designed that we should believe in the partial inspiration, or accept them as only partly of Divine origin, we have yet to learn it from any of the "holy men" who spake as they were moved,—"borne irresistably along,"—by the Holy Spirit. If we are to accept their writings with any such shadow cast over them, our duty in this respect has not been revealed among the other duties growing out of God's revelation to a perishing race.

2. It subordinates Divine authority to the caprices of human reason by exalting private judgment, and thus placing that grand book of Divine revelation at the mercy of the fallible human mind, with its frailties, whims and fancies, all of which may come actively into play in deciding, to its own liking, to what degree divinely-chosen writers were inspired; to decide, according to their preconceived opinions, what portions of the sacred writings were inspired by God; and when the inspired portions are selected to their liking, then determine to what "degree" they are inspired. Truly such a claim exalts the human mind beyond any comparison.

In attempting to meet a very natural objection raised to his theory of inspiration the Editor of the Exegetist says:

"Some will say that we leave it to the choice of the Bible reader himself to determine where the inspirational line may be drawn, and thus burden him with the responsibility of deciding as to what is infallible truth and what is not. We, however, draw a distinction between what is inspired and what is infallibly true."

It is difficult to see how the drawing of this line of distinction "between what is inspired and what is infallibly true" relieves the Bible reader of the responsibility of deciding "what is infallible truth," if, indeed, his position is tenable regarding the presence of "a human as well as divine element" in the sacred writings. If man is left to draw the inspirational line, to separate the human from the Divine, and thus decide what is truth, surely he must be responsible for such action. The Editor of the Exegetist fails to meet this weighty objection to his position, the force of which he recognizes and attempts to avert. It will not do to say that man left to the exercise of private judgment "to determine where the inspirational line may be drawn" in the interpretation of the Scriptures, is devoid of responsibility in making such distinction.

The Editor of the Exegetist would have us believe that only such utterances of the sacred writers as are not "infallibly true" are "inspired." This is an assumption of the right of private judgment in interpreting the Scriptures almost unparalleled. It is a most unwarrantable supposition that because the sacred penmen incorporated into their writings much which is infallibly true, such as historical matters relating to the Hebrew nation, etc., along with revelation of doctrines and prophecies, that therefore their record, made under the inspirational power of the Spirit, is only partially inspired, and we are given a degree of discriminating power in reading them that the inspired writers did not have in making them, for they drew no line of distinction between the inspired and uninspired, if any such distinction existed. Who is prepared to say that if God had not seen fit to inspire the sacred writers to detail the history of the Hebrew nation, as given in the Old Testament, we would to-day have any such history in an authentic form? Take for example, the wandering of the Hebrew nation in the Wilderness—it we had no account of it by the inspired penman how much reliable information would we posses regarding that terrible chapter in their history? If these "infallible truths" had not come from inspired hands, would we have them in our possession? The sacred writers recorded many things, such as the sayings of wicked men, etc., which were not inspired, but the record of these things, which they made, is stamped with Divinity, and we must accept it as true unconditionally. In no other position is there safety. When we admit the right of private judgment in determinating the inspirational character of the Scriptures and claim the right to exclude any portion as uninspired, we open wide the gates of the Christian citadel of truth to the enemies of Christianity, against whom, upon this line of attack, we can make no effective defense, while they proceed to its demolition.

As a parting thrust at the theory of Plenary inspiration the Editor of the Exegetist says:

"It is common to cite the allusions of the Christ to the Old Testament Scriptures as evidence of their Verbal or Plenary inspiration. It is remarkable, however, that all his citations of them concern matters of faith and practice or histories subservient thereto. He took no part in any Scripture controversy that did not in one way or another affect his mission into "the world."

It is remarkable, also, that while Christ frequently quoted from the Scriptures "matters of faith and practice, or histories subservient thereto," thus recognizing the inspirational character of the work from which they quoted, he never intimated that what it did not serve his purpose to quote was not, therefore, also, inspired, or indeed, that any portion was not as divine in character as the citations which he made; and hence the fact that Christ only quoted such portions of the Hebrew Scriptures as affected "his mission into the world" proves nothing against either Verbal or Plenary inspiration. The very sanction he gave them, however, and the application he made, affords ample assurance of their inspirational character, and gives a Divine principle for their interpretation. Christ applied the Scriptures according to their obvious import, and we cannot do better than to follow his example.

Of the advantage of his hypothesis Mr. Ashcroft says:

"The devout student will feel that alleged errors and discrepancies are not of the serious consequences they must ever seem to be on the Verbal or Plenary hypothesis; and his mind will not be fruitlessly employed, and his candor and integrity distressed and weakened in the enforced attempt to extract harmony from what seems to regard as discordant materials."

It is difficult to conceive how any one can honestly believe that the claim of partial inspiration will be of any advantage to the cause of truth because it affords a convenient means of disposing of what some, according to their preconceived opinions, may "regard" as discordant materials. It is not to be inferred that these supposed "discordant materials" are not to be found in the inspired book itself, but rather exist in the human theories which their devotees endeavor to sustain by twisting the Scripture "materials" to fit them; and in thus interpreting the Scriptures there will always be discord. While this way of dealing with the Scriptures exists the devout student will have his "candor and integrity distressed" in vain attempts to harmonize the Bible with his theories. Why is the melancholy spectacle presented to-day of the existence of almost innumerable Protestant Sects, many of them radically antagonistic to each other, although drawing their doctrine and prospects from the same divine volume and devoutly worshipping the same God of our fathers? Why this difference? The book is the same in the hands of each and they recognize the same Divine Author. The answer is to be found in the manner in which they interpret the Scriptures to harmonizing them with the tenets of their church or with their preconceived theories, and consequently the Scriptures have been wofully wrested from their plain import, and questions of inspiration are being pushed forward by those who have new theological theories to advance to the detriment rather than to the advantage of Bible Students, and to the great hinderance of the onward march of Scriptural light to dispel the theological fog of modern orthodoxy.

The Editor of the Exegetist truly says that "the Bible needs to be saved from many of its friends." It needs to be saved from those who would draw a vail of uncertainty over its pages which the masses—the common people—can not penetrate; it needs to be saved from those who would throw the solid ranks of the soldiers of the cross into confusion and retreat, for the theory of partial inspiration leaves them no definite line of defense or attack, and opens a most unfruitful field of religious controversy, with nothing to be gained for either the cause of truth or morality; it needs, indeed, to be saved from those who would cast most serious reflections upon the character of God, impugn the motives of the sacred writers, and bofog the Christian world. Truly the Bible should be saved from such friends.

Editor Restitution:

Forty-five years have rolled away since I embraced the glorious truth that Jesus our Elder Brother was coming to reign on the earth. Forty years are past since I left the pastoral care of the Baptist Church in Hampton, Conn., and ceased to build up that church or any of the sectarian churches, and from that day to the present my all has been identified with the coming of Jesus and its kindred truths as I have learned them. And I have never seen the time since I left the Baptist Church, that I had as great a hatred towards bigotry and the spirit of Popery as I now have. God forbid that it should be otherwise, is my prayer. Amen.

But I took my pen to say that I have never seen the time since 1844, that Jesus my Elder Brother was so precious, and the truth seemed to take a deeper hold on the elect of God, than it now does.

Glory to God! The gospel of the kingdom at hand has not lost its power yet: no, no. When presented in its purity and simplicity, and with the expectation of its accomplishing the purpose of Jehovah, his own seal is set to it, his children quickened, the wanderer reclaimed, sinners converted to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and a line of separation drawn between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. And those seraphic spirits that encircle the throne of the Eternal, are led to rejoice, and union is secured throughout the entire ranks of the sacramental host of God's elect on the earth! The ear of salvation continues to roll steadily along towards the ports of endless day. Glory to God!

My brethren, let us continue to proclaim to all, as we have opportunity, the speedy coming of the Son of man—Jesus our Life Giver, to restore all things spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began; and the preparation requisite to be made in order that we may stand when he appeareth. Methinks that harmony and union will be preserved throughout the entire ranks of God's called out ones—the Church of God! Salvation's ear continues to roll on without being jostled, until the work of taking out of the Gentiles a people for his name is accomplished, and a voice be heard sounding through the upper vault of heaven, down to the dark cell of woe, shaking the middle air with its deep toned thunder, piercing the deafest ear, melting the hardest heart. Though that heart be a thousand times harder than the nether millstone, "saying, it is done!" What is done? The work of the church that belongs to this age! The last tear shed—the last prayer offered—the last exhortation given—the last sermon preached—the last tithe given for its support—the last soul taken out of the Gentiles for his name—the Spirit's influence withdrawn, and the sinner's doom unalterably fixed by the eternal fiat of the God of Israel, where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched! Brethren let us see to it that we are found giving this last note of warning that belongs to this age, till that solemn moment shall arrive, and then all we will have to do will be to drop this mortal clothing, and put on immortality, and be caught away to meet our lovely Jesus and accompany him to Zion's Mount, the Eden of rest.

Glory Allelujah! My wings are already plumed for the grand consummation! And whilst writing, gladly could I lay aside mortality and put on immortality, and meet Jesus my Life Giver, my surety, my all. We will in a little while see him. Amen.

Your old pilgrim brother in the element of the kingdom.

I feel that the paper is very dear to us since we are away from the ones of like precious faith with whom we have been associating in our distant home in Illinois. Since coming here we have learned that two of our number have left our ranks and joined the Seventh Day Adventists. They live about twenty miles from here. We feel that had they rightly searched the Word to rightly understand it in regard to the question they never could have turned away. I have been investigating the subject and am confirmed in my opinion that there is no holy day now; that under the law of Christ the old law is abolished. I think that Paul makes it so plain in the epistles that no one could make a mistake about it. Here I would like to thank Brother Cook for his article in the Nov. number of THE RESTITUTION on this question. It has greatly aided me, and I feel more deeply than ever the importance of searching the Word that we make no mistake.

Edgar! While I paper greatly impressed me. Oh! how earnestly I was made to feel my responsibility in the knowledge I have so plainly been made to see, and how I longed to do something for that Gracious One who had done so much for me. I felt that my Master's cause demanded the immediate attention of all his children even the humblest, and what could I do, when I was greeted with frowns and sneers, by those of my own household—when these things were mentioned, yet still I know that the living Savior will help me, and if he sees that I have a heart truly desirous to work for him, he will show me the way.

H. Houzeau of the Brussels Royal observatory has published the first result of the last transit of Venus, and he places the sun's distance at 91,736,830 miles. Of the previous determination of the distance made since 1862, Leverrier's was nearest, being 91,357,000 miles.

A recent writer says that cat-worship was carried to its greatest extent by the ancient Egyptians, whose devotion to their pets was such that, according to Herodotus, when a fire broke out they cared for nothing but the safety of their cats, and were terribly afflicted if one of them fell a victim to the flames. On the death of a cat the inhabitants of the house shaved their eyebrows, and the deceased cat was embalmed and buried with great solemnity in a sacred spot. Many cat mummies have been found in the Egyptian tombs, and some are to be seen in the British Museum, together with similarly preserved specimens of human beings and sacred calves. Their movements and their cries were consulted as oracles, and the murder, or even the accidental suicide of one of them, was punished by death.

HOW IT HAPPENED THAT WASHINGTON WAS ELECTED THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The President of the Senate, elected for the future purpose of counting the votes, declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, whereby it appears that George Washington was unanimously elected President. Whereupon the following certificate and letter, prepared by a committee consisting of Messrs. Paterson, Johnson, Lee, and Ellsworth, were adopted by the Senate and signed by their President:

Be it known, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York, the sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President, by which it appears that George Washington, Esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America. GEN. GORDON'S VIEWS OF DEATH.

"God knows what my anxiety was. Not for my life, for I died years ago to all ties in this world and to all its comforts, honors, and glories." It was on Sept. 11, 1877, when on his expedition to Shaka, 500 miles southwest of Khartoum, with four companies of indifferent troops, to break the neck of slave raiding in its very den, that Gordon wrote these characteristic words, which may be fitly quoted at a time when there is too much reason to fear he has actually laid down his life for those whom he had vainly striven to save. They breathe precisely the spirit with which Gordon always regarded life and death. "God has given you," he says, writing to his friends, "ties and anchors to this earth, you have wives and families; I, thank God, have none of them, and am free. * * * You are only called on at intervals to rely on your God; I am obliged continually to do so. I mean by this that you have only great trials, such as the illness of a child, when you feel yourselves utterly weak, now and then. I am constantly in anxiety. The body rebels against this constant leaning on God; it is a heavy strain on it; it causes appetite to cease. Find me the man—and I will take him as my help—who utterly despises money, name, glory, honor—one who never wishes to see his home again, one who looks to God as the source of good and controller of evil, one who has a healthy body and an energetic spirit, and one who looks on death as a release from misery. If you cannot find him, then leave me alone."

That instinctive clinging to life, which is natural to all men, Gordon seems to have overcome as completely as Ignatius Loyola, or John Wesley, or Cromwell's Puritans. When his poor Soudanese lambs pressed him on every side with their complaints, he wrote: "I must not complain if they have no thought of what I have already gone through. There is only one issue to it, and that is death, and I often feel I wish it would come and relieve me." One can hardly doubt that if Gordon was in fact stabbed as he left the palace he had so bravely held for twelve months, he saw in the dagger only an instrument of deliverance. In every reference to death, it was with him the great "release." "I value my life as naught, and should only leave unwillingly for perfect peace."—London Telegraph.

God makes the earth bloom with roses that we may not be discontented with our sojourn here; he makes it bear thorns that we may look for something better beyond.

Announcements.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 11, 1885. NO. 10.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to The Restitution, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites for the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

LETTER TO A FRIEND. PART II.

We come now to the time that Christ should be born. We have a record of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham. Thus identifying Jesus as the son promised to David, and the seed promised to Abraham. Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, where is he who was born king of the Jews. Matt. ii. 2. We find this idea of the kingship of Jesus, referred to throughout the New Testament. Jesus said, swear not by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great king. Matt. v. 35. To whom but himself, could this apply. Again, when the son of man shall come in his glory, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. Matt. xxv. 31. When Jesus stood before Pilate the Roman Governor, he asked him if he was king of the Jews, Jesus said thou sayest it. Pilat wrote over his head on the cross, This is Jesus, the King of the Jews. Matt. xxvii. 37. Nathanael said, thou art the son of God, thou art the king of Israel, John i. 49. Thus we see, the prominent idea in the minds of those who acknowledged Christ, was his kingship. Is it any wonder that the Apostles were interested in regard to the time when he should establish the kingdom. After the resurrection, they asked him saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel. Acts i. 6. This inquiry showed clearly how they had been instructed both by the prophets, and by [illegible] himself, for without Israel [illegible] no kingdom of God, or of [illegible] them it was not for [illegible] seasons, [illegible] to be of any [illegible] to know. They were exhorted to be faithful unto death, which they all suffered for the faith of the Lord Jesus. Peter on the day of Pentecost said, That David being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that he would raise up Christ to sit upon his throne, he seeing this spoke beforehand of the resurrection of Christ, etc. Acts ii. 29. This same Apostle said of Jesus, whom the heavens must receive, until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his prophets, since the world began. And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you. Acts iii. 20. This gospel of the kingdom, was first to be preached before the second coming of the Lord, so said Jesus, and so Peter proclaimed. Paul said to Timothy that Jesus should judge the quick and dead, at his appearing and his kingdom. 2. Tim. iv. 1. We read, And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name small and great etc. Rev. xi. 18. Hear the song of the redeemed. And they sang a new song, saying, thou hast redeemed us unto God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God, Kings and Priests, and we shall reign on the earth. Rev. v. 9. No where does Christ or his Apostles speak of a kingdom above, but the kingdom and dominion under the whole heavens, which shall be given to the saints of the most High. Dan. vii. 18. Jesus said, the meek shall inherit the earth. Matt. v. 5. Up to the crucifixion, no notice had been taken of the Gentiles, they were allowed to work out their evil course as I said before. That this is the case we may learn from what Jesus said to the woman of Syrophenicia, it is not meet to take the children's bread and give it to the dogs, let the children first be filled, etc. Yet because of her great faith he healed her daughter. He said upon another occasion, I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. After his resurrection he sent his Apostles forth to preach the gospel, he told them to begin at Jerusalem. The house of Israel was first choice, both nationally and individually, but when they rejected the counsel of God, against themselves, then the apostles turned to the Gentiles. Acts xiii. 46. The opening of the door to the Gentiles, was intrusted first to Peter whose mind had been prepared by a vision of a sheet let down from heaven, in which were all kinds of beasts. Peter was instructed by this that the Gentile's opportunity had come, to hear the word of the truth of the gospel, and be saved by faith in its teaching. Acts x. This whole chapter will prove interesting and instructive. Although the Gentiles were brought in, it was by faith, and hope, no other than what already existed as the faith and hope of Israel, which Paul said was his hope. Acts xxvii. 20. The faith and hope of the Israelites was all right in every respect but this, they rejected Christ as the King, their promised Messiah, so they fulfilled their own Scriptures in putting him to death. Acts xiii. 27. When they saw him, they saw no beauty that they should desire him. Is. liii. 2. They expected a royal conquerer when he come, they overlooked those Scriptures which spoke of his suffering before he entered upon his glory, had they known it Paul said they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. 1. Cor. ii. 8. They were blinded for a purpose, but that blindness will be removed when the Lord comes. Rom. xi. 25. The Gentile in embracing christianity had to become a Jew in faith and hope. Paul said he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh. But he is a Jew which is one inwardly, etc. Rom. ii. 28. Christ being a Jew, when a Gentile believed the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, and was baptized into him, they became Jews by adoption, and were circumcised with the circumcision of Christ, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh, by the circumcision of Christ. Col. ii. 11. And therefore were no longer strangers and foreigners but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God: having been built upon the foundation of the apostles and the prophets (their teaching) Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone. Eph. ii. 19.

The teaching of the Bible is not to save immortal souls from hell torments, but to teach us the way that God intends to remedy the accumulated evils that exist in the world, by the institution of a divine government upon the earth, when he shall govern the nations in righteousness by Jesus Christ. Ps. xxii. 28. Acts xvii. 31. The gospel is an invitation to God's kingdom and glory, when it shall be set up; men are invited to share with Christ in the honor and glory of his administration, when the time comes for the saints to possess the kingdom. Dan. vii. The believer becomes a joint heir with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be glorified together. Rom. viii. 17. The time of reward is when the Lord comes, not before. For the son of man shall come in his glory, and then shall he reward every man according to his work. Matt. xvi. 27. For the kingdom of heaven is as a man traveling into a far country, and he called his servants, and delivered unto them his goods, and straightway took his journey. Matt. xxv. 14. This illustrated the fact, that Jesus was first to go away to the Father, to receive the kingdom, and to return at the time appointed by the Father, for the restoration of the kingdom again to Israel. Acts i. 6. When that time arrives the son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, and then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, etc. And he will say unto them on his right hand, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Matt. xxv. 34. Paul said there was a crown of righteousness laid up for him, which the Lord the righteous judge should give him at that day, and also to all them who love his appearing. 2 Tim. iv. 8. John says we know, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. John iii. 2.

Peter speaks of the salvation to be brought unto us, at the revelation of Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. i. 13; and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. James says blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him. James i. 12. See Rev. The time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name small and great. Rev. vi. 18. Jesus taught that the reward of the righteous would be at the resurrection of the just. Luke xiv. 14. From these testimonies we learn, that neither reward or punishment, is meeted out, until the Lord comes. Judgment does not precede his coming, Paul says, he shall judge the living and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom. In conclusion I would ask, what must we do that we may inherit eternal life? What did Abraham the father of the faithful do? It is written he believed God, and it was accounted unto him for righteousness, we also must believe the truth and obey it, if we would become heirs of the righteousness which is by faith. What is the truth we must believe and obey? Jesus says the gospel. This gospel of the kingdom must be preached as a witness among all nations, and then shall the end come. Matt. xxiv. 14. Then the gospel is made up of the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, for an example of this read Acts viii. 12. To believe these things embrace the hope of the promises made of God unto the fathers of the Jewish nation, which Paul said was the hope of Israel. There is no other Bible hope but this. Acts xxviii. 20. Jesus said, Abraham rejoiced to see his day. He saw it and was glad. How did Abraham see the day of the Lord. He saw it by faith. The realization of the promises made to him could only be verified to him, when his seed, the Christ, should possess the gate of his enemies. Gen. xxii. 17. Hear Jesus again. They shall come from the east, and the west, and from the north, and the south, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God. When this takes place what Paul says will be fulfilled. And these all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise, God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect. Heb. xi. 40. I could write at much greater length, but you have much better articles on the faith no doubt, so I will conclude for the present. I exhort you in the words of Ananias, to Saul of Tarsus after his conversion, and now why tarriest thou, arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins. This act constitutes the obedience to the faith, as Jesus said to the apostles, he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned. Hoping the Lord will bring you into the fold, through the door, believe me, truly your friend.

JOHN GOODLIFFE.

The Names Melchisedek and Josedek as Appellations of the Christ. The One Significant of and Explanatory of his High Priestly Office, the Other of his Prophetic Healing Virtue.

Everyone who has fed upon "meat" and not "the unadulterated milk" alone of "the word" knows that the Christ is a priest "after the order of Melchisedek" and not after the order of Aaron. But every one even of the former class does not know how significant each of these names are in themselves; indeed how wonderfully significant all the representative names of Scripture are.

Aaron as a high priest we are told served in his ministry "an inefficient law of works;" that is he enforced by precept and obedient example the service of a law that was ineffectual to save and that was not intended in itself to save, but to lead up to the apprehension of a law that is effectual to save. It was his duty and office to assert the majesty of this criterion of righteousness and thus to show the exceeding enormity of sin, and through the faithful performance of these duties to fix the eye of penitence and hope unwaveringly upon the mercy of God. His office rightly executed then would be constantly to impress the hopelessness of disobedience and an obdurate continuance in sin, as well as to encourage the hope that a finite obedience with the whole heart might be ultimately enabled in the divine purpose to become a complete and satisfactory one. Now the name itself is significant of this office. Aaron, derivation aour, root ur, meaning, to hurt, to damage, to err, to go astray; the hurt being primarily to the understanding or the senses or the reason; and moreh, root yare, meaning, to strengthen, to make strong, to confirm; whole meaning, to confirm the hurt, to make strong the error.

You see now why Paul argues as he does in Romans about the law. The law "finds him out," the law "slays him," the law makes his sin "exceeding sinful." In truth the Aaronic law is a law of admeasurement. We suspect an error. We apply the law or standard and it causes "the error to abound;" but Paul argues "I find another law" and according to this law "grace did much more abound." Now grace or favor is the law of mercy, and this leads to the consideration of the other significant name, which defines the official work of the Christ as a priest not after the order of Aaron, but of Melchisedek. This seems to be the derivative analysis of the word zedek, root of zedaw, to have a care for, to be thoughtfully careful of; zi, the letter y spelled out and meaning a symbolic mark. This use and meaning as old as any records or traditions of the human race. The cross as a symbol of anxious care and suffering I mean. Consult the antiquarians for confirmation of this statement.

Next in order in the analysis is the accusative of the personal pronoun "thee" and here the object of the verb zed the latter being modified by the adverb zi and next in order ek, the root or stem of the adjective ekron, verb ekmpsic to accept. The adjective ekron or ekiov is the old Levitical descriptive, liturgical word applied to a sacrifice such as God will approve when offered. The whole meaning put in good plain English is that such a priest or person is "one who hath a crucial care that you (you individually, not a general care, but a specific personal interest displayed) be acceptable."

Now contrast the two orders of priesthood as tried by the significant names of the two great representatives of the different orders and behold the manifest wisdom of God therein displayed. The one magnifies the importance of the standard of righteousness which is right and well as far as it goes, even as Paul argues; but the other magnifies the value of the person to be tried by this standard, and pleads the comparative importance of this value when viewed from the standpoint of infinite mercy and love.

To illustrate, you have assayed to build you a house in your ignorance and inexperience. The law of perfect admeasurement comes along and points out your incompetency in every law of beauty, harmony and utility violated. It says with inexorable contempt and derision, tear it down, get it out of my sight. You are in despair. Love and mercy is passing by and sees your distressful dilemma, and while it must in truth approve of all that law has said and is insisting upon, it smiles with benignant helpfulness and cries cheer up, your old house has subserved its end and object. "Let it suffice you to have thus far subserved the law of sin and death in your members." Arise and be "renewed" you and your house and everything that belongs to you. It is a day of "new things" even to a "new heavens and a new earth." "Behold I make all things new," and I, "the Melchisedek high priest" "am sent to preach an acceptable year of the Lord."

So Paul argues in regard to "the tabernacle of the body" when teaching the way of immortality. "For if the earthy (clay) house of our tabernacle (tent) be taken down (dissolved) we have a building (a way to be built) of God an eternal house (a spiritual body) in heaven."

But in the next verse he tells us that "we sigh to this, earnestly expecting to have our clothing clothed upon with our domicile from heaven, if indeed having been clothed (with the garment of justification) we be not found naked. You see that this clothing with a spiritual body is something that comes to us here, not something in heaven to which we go as naked disembodied spirits there, a distinction with a very important difference. The passage in which the name Josedek occurs is the following, which, like most of the Messianic prophecies, seems to have been tampered with in the early period of sectarian strife; Jeremiah xxiii. 6, "In his days even Judah will have been saved and Israel will pitch his tent in faith, and this is his name which the Lord will call him, Josedek among the prophets."

KIND WORDS.

"What silence we keep year after year
With those who are most near to us, and dear.
We live beside each other day by day
And speak of myriad things, but seldom say,
The full sweet word that lies just in our reach
Beneath the common-place of common speech."

How true the words! How little we know the hearts we meet day by day. How many a deep well of affection and sympathy lies hidden from our view; covered by the cold conventionalities of the world, and all ready to overflow at the slightest touch of the finger of love. Only a glance, a word, or smile may reveal its hidden depths to us; and the word or smile never comes, and yet the word or smile never comes, and she will lies silent and undisturbed. We shut ourselves up within ourselves; we burden our hearts with the weight of affection that others so much need; we hoard our rich treasures away from the common gaze. Bye-and bye, they become tarnished, and lose all their brightness. We mourn because we miss their beauty; and we do not understand that they need passing back and forth through the hands of affection, to some other heart, to regain their wonted brilliancy.

Pride tells us; 'tis foolish to be free with our love; but God's love is as free as the air that we breathe; "whosoever will, may come. But we, in our selfish pride hide it all away, and keep all our pleasant words, and loving thoughts out of sight; and never think of the gaping void they might fill; or the satisfaction bring to some hungry heart.

'Tis an inbred trait in human nature—this longing for sympathy; and sometimes there are loving, patient, sensitive hearts, who give their all—and never receive; and then, in sheer desperation they turn back and feed upon themselves, and sometimes, die!

And there come times, in these lives of ours when the heart is hungry for a word of love; a word of justice, or of praise. The times pass—the word unsaid—and the heart starves; starves for the want of a few kind words; words which would have repaid perhaps, the pain of years! How they might have changed the current of a life, have softened a hardening heart, and polished the way to God; how guided aright a faltering step. But, no! they were not said; the time is gone, and it may be that never again, will the heart respond, and the good which should have followed opportunity, be accomplished.

Ah! my friends, we little realize how much may depend on a few kind words. Perhaps the eternal destiny of a soul! Think! some human being going to that everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, because we, in our thoughtlessness, and selfishness, neglect to say a cheerful, comforting word to a fainting heart. 'Tis a fearful thought, and might well make us keep strict watch for our opportunities.

"Oft many a shaft at random sent Finds mark, the archer little meant.
And many a word at random spoken
May soothe or wound a heart that's broken."

Then scatter pleasant words, pleasant smiles; remembering how we crave them for ourselves. 'Tis only a little thing; so easy to do if we try; and it brightens our own lives as well; making us happier for having tried to lighten the burden of others.

Give praise for the simplest good deed done; 'twill encourage to greater deeds. Be helpful, zealous and true; following the Master's footsteps, and thus make your light so shine, that men may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. Open the gates of your heart wide, and let the weary in; and as Christ had enough and to spare for every one, so will we know no lack of love for any who cross our path. Like the widow's cruse of oil, it will always be full. We have only to cast our own selfish thoughts out, to be filled with this love for others; and in loving them we show our love for him who first loved us. The true, pure, unselfish love we give our friends, and call by the name of friendship, is like in kind to the love of Christ; and in giving it, our hearts grow larger stronger, and purer.

So, remember that every kind word is a seed sown in God's vineyard, and is the life-germ of countless other seeds, seeds which may sprout and grow and yield a bounteous harvest. And though we never know here the full measure of its fruits; in God's great eternity, we shall see each word, smile and glance, which we have sown, perhaps with an aching heart, multiplied ten thousand times ten thousand fold; for the influence of one little word, will pass from one heart to another, till no human brain can comprehend the magnitude of its results. Nothing is lost with God, and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly; but all our dearest hopes, our longing desires will he bring to us in his own good time; when he sees that to grant them will not do us harm. For every bright smile, every gentle word given to a weary soul, Jesus—our dear loving Jesus, will say to us: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Well, I am yet alive and able to tell the story. I left Chicago the 29th of Nov., for Eureka, Wisconsin. I had been invited to come and preach the gospel versus the law. I delivered fifteen discourses. The last five were intended to show that the letter of the law was not binding, but that the spirit of the same was continued in the present dispensation. That the ten commandments were the specifications of the Sinaitic covenant written first in the book of the law, called also the book of the covenant, the law of Moses, the law of God, and the law of the Lord. That eighty days afterward, Jehovah, the party of the first part of the covenant, delivered unto Moses the same specifications written on tables of stone, which were placed in the ark of the covenant. That these specifications had nothing appended in the form of a penalty, consequently could not serve as a law.

That the Seventh Day Sabbath was an ordinance and commemorative. That it was not set apart or sanctified at creation but twenty-five hundred years later, when the Lord separated them (Israel) from the nations and gave them the Sabbath. That the phrase "he had rested" showed that the resting preceded the setting apart, that he hallowed and set it apart just as the U. S. set apart and legalized the 22d day of Feb., not at the time of Washington's birth, but many years after the event, and that too because he was born on that day. So because God had rested on the Seventh Day he sanctified it at Sinai, and gave it to them as a sign of rest and deliverance. I then showed that the Sabbath, being an observance commanded was an ordinance, like the passover and circumcision, and with all other ordinances was nailed to the cross. There were many other strong points presented that we deem unanswerable by those who believe in the resurrection and immortalization of Moses. The gentleman who advocates the doctrine of the Seventh Day Adventists was present to take notes. He gave me an invitation to larry and examine the subject with a few friends at a private house, but the invitation came just as I was obliged to leave and take the train to reach other appointments. I pledged him that I would arrange in the near future. I wrote him January 10th that I would meet him in public debate between the 16th and 30th. I received a reply the 25th saying, that he would meet me the 27th. That was impossible, for I had appointments many miles away in an opposite direction only three days later, therefore I was oblige to postpone the matter indefinitely. I believe that the discourses have proved that a living Jesus is better than a dead Moses, that the spirit of the law of life makes us free from the law of sin and death, that the dead schoolmaster has quit teaching, the Great Teacher has taken his place.

Let us therefore listen to the great prophet that has been raised up like unto Moses. Hear him. A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another. Love is the fulfiller of the law. Love worketh no ill to its neighbor. Love never steals, never murders, never covets, except the best gifts. Amen. Let us love without dissimulation.

Thy Kingdom Come.

This is the cry of the pilgrim church. It has arisen alike from the city and the wilderness—from the vineyard and the desert. It has gone up from martyr fires and beds of suffering. It has been wailed out over the dying and the dead, but still the prayer remains unanswered. The golden wheels seem to tarry and the coming King to wait.

The old earth moves on her way. The curse still lingers on her landscapes, and sin walks her streets in gold and purple. Science has flashed her light into the darkness, she has refined and polished the baser metals, and her devotees imagine they are turned to gold. She has fertilized the soil and they dream that she can yet remove the curse. She has girdled the earth with iron and sent her strange whispers under the sea, but crime laughs at her achievements, and avails itself of her success. Moral reformers have agitated the great whirlpool, dreaming that purity may be found in its depths. They have changed laws and mustered armies, they have canvassed parliaments and legislative halls; they have stood in the forum and the pulpit, calling upon men to set up the standard of right, and unfurl the banner of truth; but human evil is too strong for man's unaided arm; and the tide of sin sweeps unchecked. Crime ignores the pleadings of humanity, and justice waits in vain for recognition even in her own halls. There are cries of peace and safety, while peace is taking her flight, and safety is found only in obscurity.

There is only one remedy for sin, and that is the cross—only one bright solution of earth's problems, and that is a kingdom of righteousness and peace. Six thousand years of toil, and sin, and suffering have rolled away, and still the Church waits. God's little ones are crying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true?" The petition, "Thy kingdom come" still arises from earnest, aching hearts. The answer has been delayed, but it will come in God's own time. Not one faint cry has failed to reach the Father's ear. Not one earnest petition shall lie unanswered. The prayers of the saints rest upon the golden altar before the throne, and soon the ministering angel shall pour upon them the fragrant incense and they shall be offered before the Most High. The answer shall not be long deferred, for the very fire from the altar shall be cast into the earth and there shall be "voices and thunderings and lightnings and earthquakes." A new power shall be introduced into earth's moral chaos, for the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. Oppression and wrong shall be swept from high places, for earth shall have a glorious King. The wilderness shall be glad, and the desert shall blossom as the rose, for the curse is forever cancelled by God's own hand. Our loved ones shall come again from the land of the enemy—ransomed by Him who holds the keys of the grave.

The feet that have trodden earth's rocky paths and rested only beneath her sod, shall walk on the banks of the beautiful river. The eyes that have been closed during death's long sleep shall gleam with immortal life. The hands that have been folded above the still heart shall carry the palms of victory, and the brow that hath borne the white soul of the conqueror, shall wear the crown of life, for there shall be no more death. No sorrow is known in the glorified earth. No sighs are borne on the fragrant breezes of Eden restored. There are no sad notes in the triumphant song of the redeemed.

Thy kingdom come! Then shall the glad earth welcome her King, and the Life-giver shall pour for us the wine of immortality. Then shall He bestow the crowns and receive the scepter of universal dominion, for God shall be all in all, and His "will shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven."—Mrs. H. V. Reid.

THE RESTITUTION.

H. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, March 11, 1885.

In our Literary Notices we call attention to two books differing in character but both worthy of praise. "The Handbook of Useful Information" is a small volume of 64 pages, elegantly bound in alligator leatherette, with gold side-stamp, and is a compend of facts for ready reference on almost every subject; and no work comes nearer being a multum in parvo—a miniature encyclopedia than this marvel of condensation. "The Errors of Evolution" by Dr. Patterson, is a beautiful volume of 270 pages, and is a work that will need no eulogy to any one who will give it a careful perusal, as it will commend itself to every unprejudiced reader. The Editor, H. L. Hastings, has prefaced the work with a terse[ly] written introduction, from which we quote an extract. He says: "The writer of this volume carries the war into Africa, and uses great plainness of speech, and it really seems high time that the battle be set in array, and that men find out who is on the Lord's side, and who is on the side of the devil and monkeys; and the less we have of circumlocution in the case the better. Of course, this style of warfare is not very popular among those who like to wear the honors and emoluments of Christianity while laboring to teach heathenism to undermine the gospel; but as this battle is not fought in the interest of the apes or their progeny, they cannot reasonably expect to direct the campaign."

UNKNOWN.

"Therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not."

If he had been known, his relations to men, his designs and plan might have been known. Human relations to the Father, possibilities and actualities, destinies and offered hopes, are all hid to men that know not the divine Fatherhood of God: and the great love he has bestowed on certain ones making them to be called his children!

Therefore they are strangers to the largest share of mankind, "unknown and yet, well known" to each other. "And some said, what will this babbler say?" "May we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest is? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know therefore what these things mean." In this populous city of Athens, all moderns confess that arts and refinements had reached a perfection not before attained by any people. And here were philosophers—investigators and searchers—Epicureans, Cynics and Stoics. And here in a shady grove Plato walked and read to students—the Academicians, his lectures.

But the people through great enquiries, going to the market place of public gathering, (to supply the place of newspapers,) to tell or hear of some new thing—something the philosophers had found out, or what visitors from foreign parts had to relate. And though all very religious they were far from agreement on religion. Every sect of philosophers taught a peculiar theory of the cosmos and the laws of the universe and had disciples. The city was all in ill, filled with idols and idolatry.

One morning as I suppose, a Jew stranger appeared in the concourse on the market, and using the privilege accorded to strangers began to talk to those present. Soon Epicurean and Stoic guardians of the public mind walked in and had a trial of his strength. It seems they made nothing. The cry—babbler, was raised. What next? "what will this babbler say?" Some others said, he seems to be a setter forth of strange, or a new race of gods. It looked as if he would supplant Jove, and all the subordinate gods of the general belief, and substitute a new dynasty of reigning deities. And as to the last part, the preaching of Jesus and the resurrection was understood. He who felt the faithfulness of the saying: "If we be dead with him, we shall also live with him. If we suffer, we shall also reign with him;" had made that doctrine so clear in meaning as to be understood by some, confused as it was with Polytheism in their perceptions.

Children of God by the resurrection; neither subject to human relations, nor can die any more, and equal unto the angels: "partakers of the divine nature." Strange things to pagan ears: incredible to human intuitions, and beyond the power of reasoning and intellectual discovery. For, "Eye hath not seen, nor [illegible] neither hath it entered the heart of man what God hath prepared, etc." Can we wonder at the mocking? the apparent nonsensing babbling, destitute of all sense and reason to men so far off from all divine illumination? To people that knew not the Christian's Father, how astoundingly strange it all was? Curiosity desired to hear more.

And now follows a grand opportunity, the philosophers brought the stranger to the rocky height of Mars Hill, the upper council composed of aged and wise men, whose dignity and silence and critical discrimination were sure. And what an oration? what eloquence? No Demosthenes against Philip, nor Cicero against Verres or Catiline. But Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ to the people of Athens. How bold and yet how respectful. "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are very religious. For as I passed by and beheld your devotions, I saw an altar.....to the Unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." Nobly began and nobly followed to the end. How clear and easy to comprehend by darkest pagan minds? The destitute of light—the religiously blind, could feel after the Father of all, and find him, as blind men search.

How appropriate the closing of the theme of instruction on the "God that made the world and all therein;" the end of the mystery of his doing? the climax of his plan of the world. Messengers sent commanding all men everywhere to repent. Because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world (Bible—ruling and judging, being one office,) by that man whom he hath ordained: whereof he hath offered faith to all men, in raising him from the dead. Jesus and the resurrection, the objective of hope. Jesus crowned Lord of all. The risen and living Salvation "prepared before the face of all people. A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."

"Awake to righteousness, and sin not: for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame." 1 Cor. xv. 34. Who were they? Were they not the "some," of the 12th verse, and the same of whom it was asked, "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Is it not obvious that the party were of the church—the "some of you"—who had dropped the resurrection.

Christ's and the resurrection of the faithful, had been preached by all the apostles. "Therefore" says Paul, "whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed." They had shamefully lost the knowledge of God they before had received. God cannot be known by those who deny his truth. When the resurrection is left out, or is shaken, the glory and power of Christ are not in view, and redemption is a myth. Erase it, and the sequence follows, "Then they also (as all others,) who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Hope we may: excluding the resurrection; but it will only reach to the end of this life and miserably leave us. The resurrection is our only hold on eternal life. The great Salvation, is to live again.

What manner of love the Father had bestowed on John the apostle and his brethren to call them children of God, was not understood by Jews or Pagans. These sons were "waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of their body." The manner of the Father's love is still much in the shade, much out of the public view. And therefore its subjects and their future, are not well known.

One of Chicago's respected D. D.'s was to preach on the theme: "What we shall be." For elucidation of his subject he selected 1 John iii. 2, "Beloved now are we the sons of God .....we know when he shall appear we shall be like him, etc." How will he deal with this text? was our thought. And as he stated in his preliminary,—"God has not told us in his word, any thing about the 'immortal soul'." Ah, he will give us John's assured hope now: was the next thought. But what a confession—What? So much from a high orthodox dignitary? What an unusual departure? But he quickly added the saving clause: "Nor need he, for it is clearly manifest." O, then how, where and when, will John's hope and expectation be realised, if he and his brethren must go to Jesus as naked, immortal souls? instead of Jesus coming to earth to appear again to make them like him, in glorious bodies.

The Doctor told the audience in his own way, [illegible] of moral likeness, free[illegible] from sin, and all evil, spirits pure and perfect. Such the likeness to him. Not a word of any bodily relationship, no likeness in bodily form to his glorious body.

In that very respectable Doctor [illegible]

SAVIOUR OF CHRIST RELATIVE TO HIS RETURN AND REIGN. NO. I.

Jesus said, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am ye may be also." Jno. xiv. 3.

He went away: he must therefore, return. He went up and a cloud shut him out of the view of his upward-gazing disciples. When it was said, by two men, (angels, Jesus' body-guard at the sepulchre) ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i. 11.

These were messengers sent down by Jesus, perhaps, from the cloud to satisfy those men of Galilee in regard to the certainty of his return, we have, therefore placed it among the Sayings of Christ. It will be readily understood that what Christ says relative to his return and reign, are prophecy: and the collection we shall term "Christ's Book of Prophecy." It will be composed of two parts: The first part will contain the predictions of Christ while personally present on the earth, as recorded by the four evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John: the second part, contains those sayings which Jesus Christ sent by his angel to John in the isle of Patmos, as written in the Apocalypse. The first part is composed of literal prophecies, as we shall prove: the second part is composed principally of symbolic prophecies. As our first number is introductory, it will be occupied by general remarks on the prophetic Scriptures, especially with the rules of interpretation of symbolic language. (1) Prophecy is history given in advance of time. God, alone, can dictate such history. (2) Every prophecy, therefore, when first uttered, has no past nor present, but is all future. So soon as its accomplishment begins and until it closes, is occupies the three great divisions of time, the past, the present, and the future. These questions must be in the minds of every student as he is investigating the prophetic Scriptures relative to every prophecy from the first in Genesis to the last in Revelations: (1) What is the scope of this prophecy? (2) Is it uttered in literal or symbolic language? (3) Is it fulfilled, in process of accomplishment, or wholly future? (4) If fulfilled where is the record, in sacred or profane history? (5) If in sacred history where? compare item by item: (b) if in profane history, give the author or authors, comparing item by item. (5) If in process of accomplishment, what is your authority? read and compare. (a) Where are we located in the chain? (b) how far does it extend? (6) if wholly future, how do you arrive at that conclusion? (7) Can you reach that conclusion intelligently without a very intimate knowledge of the past? how can this knowledge be obtained except from profane history? What are some of the general rules for interpreting symbols? What rules in this example? Repeat them. As an illustration we present two fulfilled prophecies; the one uttered in literal language the other symbols. The literal prophecy is concerning the flood, in the days of Noah. In the prediction and in the preparation required, the language is literal. In the language used to describe its fulfilment two word have a tropical or figurative form; viz., "Face" for surface; and "windows" (flood-gates, marg.) for clouds (almost) changing from dark cumuli into nimbi, or light-shaded storm-clouds deluging the earth with their rain-contents. These two tropical words have no effect to change the fact of a literal fulfilment of prophecy, or the literal history of its fulfilment. This, therefore, is a literal prophecy literally fulfilled, of which accomplishments we have the Bible, or inspired record. The prophecy is a plain historic narration of events, at that time future, and the fulfilment an equally literal history of the same events, after they had transpired. In this class of prophecies whose accomplishments is in the Bible, there need be no special difficulty.

Our second example is a symbolic prophecy whose fulfilment is also a Bible record. It is one of Joseph's dreams, and is duplicated. "And he (Joseph) said unto them (his brothers,) hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed: For behold, we (were) binding sheaves in the field, and lo, my sheaf arose, and stood upright; and behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf. And his brethren said unto him, shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dream and his words." This dream is duplicated as follows.—"And he (Joseph) dreamed yet another dream, and told it to his brethren, and said, behold, I have dreamed a dream more: and behold, the sun and moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me. And he told (it) to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, what (is) this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth? And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying." Gen. xxxvii. 6, 12. A symbol is an object selected to illustrate another object, either in itself, or in action. In this dream and its duplicate are these symbols; (1) the sheaves, (2) sun, moon and eleven stars; (3) the symbolic action is "making obeisance," or bowing down. Symbols usually have to be interpreted, or translated, since they are in an unknown tongue: but in the above instances, their meaning was too obvious to Joseph's brethren and father to require any translation.

These symbols were literally accomplished, as their literal records in Gen. xlii. 6, 9; xliii. 26; xliv. 14; l. 18; clearly demonstrate:—And Joseph's brethren came and bowed down themselves before him (with) their faces to the earth;" "Joseph remembered the dreams which he dreamed of them." Ps. 9.

"And (they, W.) bowed themselves to him to the earth." "And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph's house (for he was yet there;) and they fell before him on the ground." See also xlvii. 26, 27, 29. It is here that Jacob and his family make obeisance unto Joseph. In Gen. l. 18, it is thus written, "and his brethren also went and fell down before his face: and they said, behold we be thy servants. And Joseph said unto them, fear not: for (I am) (am) I in the place of God? But as for you, ye thought evil against me; [but] God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as [it is] this day, to save much people alive." We have now shown how a symbolic prophecy is literally fulfilled. The personification of the symbolic agents, "sheaves," "sun, moon and stars," does not change the literality of their fulfilment. The same agents are "sheaves," in the dream, and "stars," in the duplicate, but the action is the same in each, "obeisance." No "mystical interpretation [translation] here." Who ever saw a "mystical interpretation?" symbols require translations; literal, not "mystical," mystical is not in the Bible; what kind of a translation, is a Hebrew, Greek, or Latin "mystical interpretation?" It is not one that would very well suit a professor of these languages. There are "mysteries" in the Bible, but "mystical interpretations" [translations], would not clear up the mysteries. No person is an accurate and safe expositor of the prophetic Scriptures without he has a thorough knowledge of their grammar of symbols, and of the laws of interpreting tropical or figurative language. This you say, requires more time for investigation, than I am able to command. Admit it: then what? Must we trouble our readers with the results of little or no investigation? God forbid that I should presume to offer to the Lord, that which has not compelled me to "Search the Scriptures."

It requires no labor nor severe searching to say of any prophecy that its fulfilment is in the future, and quite another to trace its progressive development through sacred history, and down through the centuries of progressive history till its lengthening chain is seen to sink beneath the ocean of the coming age.

In the former case the assertion is simply a conjecture; in the latter, it has some intelligent and reasonable foundation. Now that we are upon the subject of Joseph's own dreams, which required no interpretation, let us follow him into Egypt and examine his translation of symbolic dreams, or, as they may be termed, night visions. Joseph, there, translated four symbolic vision dreams: giving the meaning of the symbols, and their fulfilment. We affirm this general position, that the Bible is its own interpreter. By this we mean, that there is no symbol, or figurative language in the Bible, that is not, some where in that book, translated. It has its own key.

There are four classes of symbols, each dream having its chief symbol. (1) In the butler's dream, it is three branches of a vine, which branches, Joseph says, are three days. (2) In the dream of the baker's vision, the chief symbol is three baskets, which Joseph translated into three days. And, within three literal (not "mystical") days each of their dreams was literally accomplished, as Joseph had translated, as to time, agents and actions. In these two visions time is symbolized. No one would contend that the time covering these visions is literal. The translations have literal (not "mystical") time—"days." The Bible, then, has symbolic time. Pharaoh's vision dream, like Joseph's, is duplicated. In the original dream, the chief symbol is a drove of seven well-favored, fat-fleshed, kine; and another drove immediately following, of seven ill-favored, lean-fleshed kine; in all fourteen in two divisions of one drove. In the duplicate vision, are seven plump ears of corn on one stock, and seven blasted ears; in all fourteen ears, of which, Joseph understanding his Father's (God's) language, translates as follows:—"The dream of Pharaoh (is) one: God hath showed Pharaoh what he (is) about to do. The seven good kine (are) seven years; and the seven good ears (are) seven years; the dream (is) one. And the seven thin and ill-favored kine that came up after them (are) seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine. This (is) the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: what God (is) about to do he showeth unto Pharaoh. Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt. And there shall arise after them seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land: and the plenty shall not be known in the land by reason of that famine following: for it (shall be) very grievous. And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; (it is) because the thing (is) established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass." Gen. xli. 25, 32. Here, kine and the corn, seven each, of each kind, are symbols of seven years each:—symbols of time, a kine a year, and an ear of corn a year. We have now six symbolic dreams: two by Joseph: and two by Pharaoh: one by the baker, and one by the butler. Those given to Joseph though in symbols, required no translation, because God is addressing his own family who understood his language, but the symbols were literally (not "mystically") fulfilled. When God addresses Egyptians, to whom that language was uttered in an unknown tongue, God provides an interpreter (Joseph) out of his own family. Joseph first translates the symbols; then shows their fulfilment. We have now narrated seven prophecies, one literal, (the deluge), and six symbolic vision prophecies, whose fulfilment constitutes parts of the Bible record. (2) We might name others, the chains of which begin within the Bible's sacred history, but which are admitted to extend beyond the sacred fulfilled history, and run down through profane history, to the present time and onward. Some of these prophecies are written in symbolic language, as the vision of the metallic image of Daniel ii., the four beasts of Daniel vii. Others are expressed in the language of literal history: such as Eze. last ten chapters; and xlth. and xlith. chapters of Daniel. These chains of prophecies, commencing their fulfilment in the times of Bible chronology, are still measuring out their unwound coils. These progressive fulfilments constitute the chief of the future unfulfilled prophecies. We call them fragmentary prophecies, because they are unaccomplished remainders. Remainders are obtained only by subtraction. They form a kind of negative. In every through line of prophecy, we find the not fulfilled, by subtracting the fulfilled part from the whole prophecy. The labor is in ascertaining the fulfilled part. Every through line must cover, and extend beyond, profane history. Without a knowledge of profane history, our knowledge of prophetic fulfilment must necessarily be very imperfect, since God's foot-prints are in profane history, as well as in sacred history.

Literary Notices.

We have just received from the publisher a handy little volume entitled, "Gaskell's hand-book of useful information." It contains calculations, trade secrets, rules, business forms, legal items, and statistical tables of practical value for mechanics, farmers, lumbermen, bankers, book-keepers, politicians, and all classes of workers in every department of human effort, from the household to the manufactory; and a compilation of facts for ready reference on almost every subject. It is in fact a portable encyclopædia. No more valuable book has ever been offered, as it contains so much information of practical value in every day life. It is nicely gotten up, and will be sent to any address by mail, post paid, on receipt of 25 cents, by Geo. W. Ogilvie, Publisher, 230 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

THE ERRORS OF EVOLUTION.

Readers who are interested in the strife between the word of God and its numerous foes, and especially those who are perplexed by the pretentious science of these days, which derives the universe from a cloud of gas, and the human race from apes and monkeys, will be interested in reading "The Errors of Evolution," by Robert Patterson of San Francisco, the well known author of "Fables of Infidelity and Facts of Faith." In a series of papers, the author discusses "Scientific Star-building," "Geological Evolution," "The Origin of Life," and "Darwinism," in a vigorous and masterly manner, puncturing scientific gas-bags, and exploding the absurdities that are palmed upon the ignorant for scientific facts. The work is a neatly printed volume of nearly 300 pages, price one dollar, and will be sent by mail, post paid to any address by H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

A NOVEL IDEA.

NEW YORK, February 27.—London cable dispatches announced this morning the determination of the English Government to run a pipe line across the desert from Suakim for the purpose of furnishing water to locomotives and troops. A New York firm has received the contract for the pumps, and sent the first pump off last Saturday by the Adriatic. The second will go to-morrow by the Germanic. One of the firm said to-day: "The work offers no extraordinary difficulties to us, owing to the long experience we have had in sending oil over much longer distances and under conditions ten times more complicated. The journey for troops from Cairo to Berber by way of the Nile is about 1,200 miles, and presents more difficulties than were supposed when it was undertaken by Lord Wolseley. From Suakim to Berber in a direct line across the desert the distance is not more than 200 miles, but the absence of water makes the journey an impossibility for a large body of troops. Even a railroad would be difficult to maintain, owing to the need of large quantities of water for the engines and for the guards along the road. Water must be had at any cost if the attack is to be made from Suakim. The plan now adopted is to run two four-inch pipes over the whole distance. Every thirty miles or so there will be a tank and two of our engines with a capacity for forcing water along at the pressure of 2,000 pounds to the square inch. Two pumps are used in case of accident to one. The pumping engines to be used are about fifteen feet long and require from 150 to 200 horse-power of steam. The pipes will be laid in a zigzag line to allow for expansion and contraction, and will be buried under the sand. With a sufficient force of men it ought to be possible to lay the pipe as fast as it can be furnished. The lengths are joined by a screw sleeve coupling. The English Government is now in consultation with an American residing there, who is thoroughly conversant with the methods of laying and working oil-pipe lines, and this gentleman will be called upon to advise the English engineers in making their preparations. Troops will be used to guard the engine houses at every station. If the Arabs tamper with the pipes it will be known almost instantly at the nearest pumping station, owing to the lessened pressure in case the pipes are broken, or to an increase of pressure should one of the valves placed at intervals along the line be maliciously closed."

Heavenly charity cannot be resisted. Pride melts away under its warm breath; selfishness disappears under its glowing influence; anger cannot stand before its gentle force. Whatever be the form of sin that offers resistance, it inevitably yields before love unfeigned, love out of a pure heart.

Consider yourself the guardian of the character of those who may be absent, as you would wish others to guard your character in your absence.

ATHEISM AND THEISM,

—BY JOHN G. WILSON.—

Mr. Wilson is the Editor of The Prophetic Times and Watchtower, and is well known as a clear, strong writer. This book contains about 350 pages, is neatly and strongly bound in cloth, clearly printed, and will be sent postpaid, for $1.00. Send to this office for it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

On a trying occasion, Peter asked his Lord an earnest business question. "We have left all and followed thee, what thou shalt we have?" Matt. xii. 27. Jesus in whose mouth was no guile, gave him an honest square business answer.—"Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Peter believed that Jesus was the King of Israel, that he would receive the throne of his father David, and reign over the house of Jacob, and restore the Kingdom again to Israel. Christ knew that Peter believed this, he knew also in what sense Peter would understand the words thrones, judging, and twelve tribes of Israel, therefore he meant what Peter understood him to mean. Please find enclosed Postal Order for my subscription for THE RESTITUTION. I have been lax in sending my subscription. Please excuse. May God aid you in giving meat in due time to the waiting household. Surely prophecy is fulfilling, before our eyes. May the Watchman give a certain sound to the Trumpet. It seems to me we live in a time when with the Bible in one hand, and newspapers chronicling daily events occurring in the ends of the earth, in the other, we may say indeed, this is that spoken of by prophets of old. May wisdom indeed be given to those appointed as Watchman over his people, that that day come not upon them unawares.

Yours in the blessed Hope.

Editor Restitution:

I have now great pleasure in sending you Post-office order, amount four dollars for THE RESTITUTION. I am glad to see the interest manifested in its pages. The importance of its subject matter, is daily becoming of increasing interest, and demands our fullest consideration. Trusting its circulation and influence will be very widely extended, and result (by leading to a correct and prayerful examination of the word of [illegible] freedom of many from [illegible] Egyptian darkness [illegible] society, [illegible] kingdom [illegible] is the earnest prayer [illegible]

Yours fraternally,

JOHN T. SHAPTER.

MARATHON, IOWA.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed please find $ 2.00 to pay for THE RESTITUTION another year. We like THE RESTITUTION very much, have taken it eight years, and though money is scarce we mean to try and take it longer. We long for the realisation of the word so full of meaning—Restitution—when the opening heavens shall reveal the glorious Son of God. When his waiting ones shall receive their reward—the crown of Righteousness—when the groaning creation shall be redeemed.

To this end we look with hope, and breathe forth that earnest petition, "thy Kingdom come," hastening toward the realisation of our hope.

DELL. HERRICK.

COLUMBUS, Neb.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find Post Office Order for $2.00 for my RESTITUTION for this year, and 50 cts. for some poor one, as money matters are a little close every where. Yet we cannot well do without our RESTITUTION, as a Weekly Visitor. We are always glad to hear the Good News of the Kingdom from the Brethren abroad.

If any one of our Brethren or Sisters come this way, they are welcome visitors, and will find shelter under our roof. As we only live a little over two miles N. West from Columbus, every body can find us.

Respectfully. JOHN W. SIEGLE.

"SHALL HE COME AND FIND ME WATCHING?" MATT. XXIV. 42.

Shall he come and find me watching
As the watchers watch for morn,
As the hour of midnight passes,
And the coming day is born?

Shall he come and find me waiting,
With my loins well girt about,
Staff in hand, the word to welcome,
Waiting without fear or doubt?

Shall he come and find me slumbering
From the unfolding joy apart,
Outside of Paradise and Jesus,
With a true and loyal heart?

Shall he come and find me faithful
To his truth, to words to me:
"I'll come—to receive preparing—
I will gladly take to thee?"

Shall he come and find me working
In the vineyard full of love;
Only working till the glory
Breaks upon me from above?

Jesus, let me thus be waiting,
Full of hope, and love, and zeal;
Let thy coming to my spirit
Be a hope divine and real.

THE DEAD MAN CARRIED OUT.

"Now when he came nigh unto the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out." Luke vii. 12.

The bare history of death is solemn and sad. It is indeed the saddest event in human experience. It is the closing scene in the drama of individual existence. The actor falls on the stage and the play stops short. I read somewhere, of an actor dying in a theater while playing the death-pantomime, so that what was designed for mere mockery, became an awful reality, casting a deep and solemn gloom over all, even the gayest of the gay. Few have the hardihood to laugh in the presence of death. "He is dying!" He is dead! In childhood how my mind struggled with the thoughts embodied in these short sentences when they fell on my ear from the lips of the messenger. They meant silence and darkness and stillness, and then a few handfuls of dust. Often on going to our village I met a funeral procession, headed by a hearse, bearing some one to his resting place in the cemetery half a mile out in the country. Though familiar with [illegible] and its usual accompaniments, [illegible] clouds my mind with solemn [illegible] and these thoughts [illegible] One other be- [illegible] to be a living factor in [illegible]ncerns of human life. Breathless and lifeless and thoughtless lump of clay, borne away from the noise and bustle of the living town, to the silent city of the dead, to slumber in unconsciousness with fellows mute as he! Will that be my destiny? Come Lord Jesus, thou Resurrection and Life, and baffle the "grim monster" in my case, and in the case of those I love. Hold back his icy hand that its touch chill not the warm currents of the living church. Let the mortal life join on to the immortal life! Let me and mine feel the deathless rapture.

"A man carried out" to burial. It might have chanced to be one without kindred of blood to follow in the foreranks as mourners. In such case no ties broken but those common to humanity. That were sad enough. But he is a son, I will say, of living parents, one of several sons. Then ties, tender ties have been rudely sundered. Ties fraternal and paternal, cemented by years of artless love and kindly deeds. Under such circumstances how the heart bleeds and the sealed fountains of other years break up and pour forth their tribute of tears. The only son of two living parents? Is this the touching narration? The rules of war spare such from the service of arms, but I have known death, cruel death, to take this one staff and support of declining years in spite of love and tears. It is even worse than this: The only son of his mother, and she was a widow! Oh, could bereavement fall with a heavier stroke—smiting a heart already crushed with many sorrows! Forlorn and desolate and woe-stricken widow! We pity thee, we pity thee! The climax is reached in these deeply pathetic words: "The only son of his mother, and she was a widow!" Yet I say happy and fortunate widow! Nain is to be blessed by such a visitor as it never had been blessed by before, and the widow is to be the first and special object of his power and beneficence. He who had been so tenderly touched by misfortunes far less had compassion on her. He touched the bier (coffin, margin). The pall-bearers stood reverently still. Awful moment of suspense, but it is soon broken by these words: "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" Oh, glad surprise. The bitter tears give place to tears of gladness. The mother embraces her living son.

JOHN L. WISER.

THEN, WENT ALL FLESH UNDER.

The wells of the great deep brake forth, the windows of heaven were taken out, and for more than a month and a half, rain poured continuously on the earth.

People forsook their dwellings, they gathered on the hill-slopes, they climbed up rocky, almost inaccessible steeps. Their beautiful jewels and gathered raiment were left behind: the murderous waters engulfed their flocks and herds. The day of wrath had come. They had despised the long and oft-repeated warnings of the servant of God. They had wasted the precious hours in riotous feasting. Mercy had stretched forth her hands, wisdom had cried aloud in their streets, love had pleaded, and hope pictured in vain, the rewards of faith and obedience. Now, their doom must be met. God had waited long. He was not willing that they should perish. He asked for their repentance, he desired their salvation.

But the alloted period ran out. Whiter and whiter grew the faces, and more fearful the wails of agony. "The words of God's servant were coming true, the waters were taking the upperhand." Higher and higher they went, until the boat that had so long been a laughing-stock to faithless man, was lifted high above the earth; the hill-slopes and the rocky steeps were overflowed. Fifteen cubits high over the mountains, went the waters of the sin-flood. "Then, all flesh went under."

The one upright man, the man without blemish, who walked a godly life in his time, was safe in the boat. Noah alone remained over, and those who were with him in the ark.

"All flesh went under!" What a fearful record! And yet, there was no need that they should perish; they might have been saved. They might have turned away from their sins, they might have believed God, but with insane folly they refused and chose to die.

Just so it is now. God has sent forth messengers to cry repent! repent! for the day of the Lord's anger is at hand. Over and over the cry is repeated, yet few turn aside from their pleasures to listen, and fewer still believe. Some day, it will be too late. Again will faces turn pale and wails of anguish resound. The rejecters of God's proffered mercy will call for the rocks and mountains to hide them from the fiercer wrath of the Lamb. There is hope now, there is a refuge now. Do not throw away the precious boon of eternal life. Come to the atoning blood, and be saved! S. R. WILCOX.

Editor Restitution:

I am teaching a large Bible Class here. I send you our lesson for Feb. 22. I don't shun to declare the whole truth, and they are getting much interested in the course I am taking, so I am in hopes it will do much good. I think a great deal of good might be done in this way by Brethren who can't preach, and the truth would spread faster. I don't think it will be long before we have an organization of believers in Andover, D. T., and we pray that the good work may go on here and in other places also.

I think if some Brother that is well posted would get up a lesson and put in every RESTITUTION, on the main subjects, it would be of great service in Sunday Schools, and be a means of doing much good.

WM. MILLS.

The following lesson was taught in a Bible Class at Andover, D. T., by Wm. Mills, Sunday, Feb. 22, 1885.

What were the promises made to Abraham?

Answer Gen. xii. 7, 13, 14; xvii. 15; xviii. 17; iv. 8.

And to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 2, 5.

And to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 10, 14.

And to Moses, Ex. vi. 8; Deut. xxxiv. 4. See Psalms cv. 6, 12.

Did Abraham received the promises in his life-time?

Answer Acts vii. 1, 7; Heb. xi. 8; xvi. 32, 40.

When will Abraham and his seed get their reward? at death, or at the resurrection? not at death.

Answer. Gen xxv. 7, 10; Acts ii. 29, 34. The dead know not anything, Psalms cxlvi. 4; cxv. 17; xvii. 40; xii. 15; Eccl. iii. 16, 20; ix. 4; vi. 10.

When then?

Answer. Acts i. 11; iii. 19, 21, 1 Thess. iv. 13, 18. Rev. v. 9, 10. Matt. xvi. 27. Rev. xi. 18.

Where will be the Capital or City of the New Jerusalem?

Answer. Jer. iii. 17; Mic. iv. 6, 8; Matt. v. 35.

How do we become Abraham's seed?

Answer. Acts viii. 12; Gal. iii. 26, 29.

Read at your leisure Rev. xx. 11, 15, 21. Matt. v. 5; and promises made to David. 2 Sam. vii. 12; Psalms lxxxix. 3, 4, 27, 29; and to Mary, Luke i. 31, 33; Acts xiii. 33, 40; i. 6, 12; Rev. i. 17, 19; and Dan. ii. 44, 45; vii. 26, 28.

Almost Spring-Time.

Almost time for the pretty white daisies
Out of their sleep to awaken at last,
And over the meadows with grasses and clover
To bend and to blossom and grow so fast!
Almost time for the buttercups yellow,
The ferns and the grasses, the roses and all,
To waken from slumber and merrily hasten
To gladden our eyes at spring's earliest call.

Almost time for the skies to grow bluer,
Breezes to soften, and days to grow longer;
For eyes to grow brighter and hearts to grow gladder,
And earth to rejoice with a joyous song:
Almost time for the sweetest of seasons;
Oh! nearer it comes with each new-born day;
And soon the sweet smile of the beautiful Spring-time
Will drive the cold shadows of Winter away.

Spare Moments.

A boy, poorly dressed, came to the principal of a celebrated school one morning and asked to see him. The servant eyed his mean clothes, and thinking he looked more like beggar than anything else, told him to go round to the kitchen.

"I should like to see Mr.— said.

"You want a breakfast, more like."

"Can I see Mr.—?" asked the boy.

"Well, he is in the library; if he must be disturbed, he must."

So she bid him follow. After talking awhile the principal put aside the volume which he was studying and took some Greek books, and began to examine the new-comer. Every question he asked, the boy answered readily.

"Upon my word!" exclaimed the principal, "you do well. Where did you pick up so much?"

"In my spare moments," answered the boy.

He was a hard-working lad, yet almost fitted for college by simply improving his spare moments. A few years later he became known all the world over as the celebrated geologist, Hugh Miller. What account can you give of your spare moments?

What Aim.

One evening in a parlor at a summer watering-place the young people were dancing. One young lady was not taking any part in the exercise. "Does not your daughter dance?" asked a lady of this young lady's mother. "No," was the reply. "Why, how will she get on in the world?" "I am not bringing her up for the world;" was the quiet answer. That young lady is now a woman, and the influence of her consecrated life is felt in many of the Christian interests of a great city. But, for what are you bringing up your daughters, dear mothers of other young girls? What aim have you for them? Are you bringing them up for the Lord, or for the world? What are your dreams and ambitions for them? What do you want them to become? Do you want them to shine in society, to "marry well," and live in wealth? Is that the vision that fills your soul when you think of them? Look on a little farther. Life is short. Suppose your dream is fulfilled—is it anything more than a dream? What lies beyond? The curtain is drawn and there is the hushed chamber of death. What do you want for your child then? The curtain is drawn again and eternity opens. What would your fond affections choose for her then? Is it better to think of matters of this kind through to the end.

My Dear Children:

In my last letter I endeavored to show you that the twin boys represented two nations, and it is written, By faith the Promised One blessed each concerning the things to come. Therefore the blessing could not have had its entire fulfilment during their life, or Paul would not have made mention of it so many years after. You remember the first-born was wandering, seeking for something he hoped would secure to him the blessing, during which time his brother whose right it was obtained it. As soon as the blessing was given, the firstborn came home from his wandering, but too late. He had implicit confidence in his brother's love for him, and felt sure the blessing would be his; but had his father given it to him he would have set no greater value on it than he had done as regards his birthright. Himself and household were adverse to God's ways. Therefore they are compared to stubble. When he entered the room where his sick father was, he said, Arise, eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me. His father trembled very exceedingly, because he knew the blessing had fallen upon the one who alone had the right, and when this was told to the firstborn, he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, and said unto his father, "Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me? hast thou but one blessing, my father? Bless me, even me also. O my father." And he lifted up his voice and wept. But his father could only give him one blessing, namely, the fulness of the earth, and the dew of the heaven from above; adding also to this, that by his sword he should live, and serve his brother. Paul, or "the Worker," calls him a profane person, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright, and afterwards when he would have inherited the blessing he was rejected, for he found no way to change his mind, (margin) though he sought it carefully and with tears. Therefore it is written, the youngest have I loved, but the firstborn have I rejected. This one act shaped all the circumstances of his life; and as he represented the Jewish nation, it points to things in the future. When the blessing was pronounced on the youngest his father said: Come near now, and kiss me, my son, and he blessed him and said, The smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed; therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine; let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee; be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee. Cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be every one that blesseth thee. When the firstborn perceived that he had lost such an unspeakable blessing, he hated his brother, and said he would kill him, thinking, no doubt, by this means he could get the inheritance. His mother heard the threat, and persuaded the youngest to leave his home, which he consented to do. And after his father had again blessed him, he departed. When he had traveled some distance, the sun went down, and the curtains of night were closed upon him, probably there was no house near where he could find shelter. How lonely he must have felt! his tender heart no doubt full of grief because of his brother's hatred, and to feel he was banished from his loving mother and kind father, must have been a sore trial. Perhaps it was the first night he had ever slept away from them, and every grief which separated them, would have added to his burden of sorrow, when no doubt he calculated great prosperity would befall him, for it was just at the time, when manhood's first dawn had come, when his buoyant mind would nurse hope, and gather strength in view of the bright future. In such lonely grief he could but dimly realize that time would unfold the wonderful purposes of God hid in all these circumstances. While wrapped in the bosom of slumber, his weary mind was impressed with a beautiful dream, as Job, or "the Weeping One" declared, In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumbering upon the bed, then God openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction.

By this you will understand God was speaking to one who was always listening to receive instruction. Although alone, the angels of God were encamping near him. He had no pillow but a stone, and sweeter rest never befell man than that which refreshed him. In his dream he saw a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it; and behold the Lord stood above it, and said, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed, or children, and they for multitude shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt break forth to the west, east, north, and south, and in thee, and in thy seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed." And God promised wherever he went he would go with him and bring him back to the same place, and he would never leave him until he had done all he promised him. And he awakened out of sleep and said, Truly the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not, and he was afraid and said, How dreadful is this place. This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven. You will perceive dear children, God was unfolding to his mind the glorious riches hid in the blessing which his birthright entitled him too. The ladder no doubt represented steps of time, which would continue during his long sleep of death. I would have you mark well, there was nothing in this dream that would give him one ray of hope in the heaven above the skies. His dream did not take his mind there, but God came down to earth, and seemed to dwell with men, for when he awoke in the morning, the spot which seemed so lonely when he fell asleep, was now the most heavenly place he had ever seen; he called it the dwelling place of Jehovah, and the gate of heaven. And when he awakes from his sleep in the dust, on the beautiful resurrection morning, he will indeed call it "the house of God and the gate of heaven," for then the will of God will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven; and the wonderful ladder that reached up to heaven will unite the two together This is the time which Jesus spoke of, when angels of God shall ascend and descend on the Son of man. O, how much this precious birthright secured, not only the fulness of the earth, but everlasting life was embodied in it But not until the prayer is answered "thy kingdom come," will the firstborn, or Jewish nation perceive their immense loss. They, like the firstborn of whom I am writing, will come with weeping and supplication, but will find to their bitter sorrow, they are too late. they lost it by wandering from the way of the Lord. But one blessing God will give them, they will have a place in the kingdom, but only as subjects, to be ruled over, even as it is written, "The elder shall serve the younger." So when Christ's kingdom is established on this earth, those who have obtained the birthright and blessing, will be kings and rulers with Christ. They being children of the resurrection will die no more. Can you marvel why a new name was given to him who obtained the blessing? Instead of "Supplanter" the name of "Prince," because he had power with God, royalty was blended with his rich inheritance. Ponder it well my children, what we may lose by indifference, having no respect for what God has promised. For eighteen hundred years God has been offering to the Gentiles the glorious inheritance which was Israel's by right of birth. Paul says they were cut off through unbelief, that we may be grafted into their hope. I want you to clearly see there is no promise of eternal life to the firstborn nation. They will be mortal in the kingdom of God, enjoying all the fulness the earth can yield, with heavenly dew.

Children beloved, in all your getting, get understanding how to secure the heavenly birthright, which will insure you the everlasting blessing. May the entrance of thy word give light, may it give understanding to the simple, is the prayer of your dear teacher. E. COFFMAN.

An Unsurpassed Hymn.

Troubling before thee, my God, I come,
O Lord! in dust my sins I own;
Justice and mercy for my life
Contend! oh! speak and heal the strife.

The Savior stills! upon my soul
New tides of hope in mildness roll—
His voice proclaims my pardon found,
Seraphic transports wings the sound.

Earth has a joy unknown in heaven—
The new-born peace of sins forgiven!
Tears of a love pure and deep delight,
Ye angels! never dimmed your sight.

No ray of gilt on cheek rise—
The penitent's pillow of the skies!
Ye know where mom exulting springs,
And evening folds her drooping wings.

Bright heralds of the Eternal Will,
Abroad his errand ye fulfill;
Or throned in floods of beamy day,
Symphonious in his presence play.

Lord! in the song—the heavenly plain
Is shaken with the choral strain—
And dying echoes, floating far,
Draw music from each chiming star.

But I amid your choir shall shine,
And fill your knowledge shall be mine!
Ye on your harps shall learn to hear
A secret chord that mine will bear.

When God has a great work for any one to do in the world, he usually gives him a peculiar training for it; and that training is just what no earthly friend would choose for him; and sometimes it is so long continued that there seems to be but little time left for the work.

Oh! blessed thought of comfort: each swift day
But brings me nearer to my heart's dear home!
Then shall the former things have passed away;
To that high noon no evening shadows come;
Pass on, brief earthly hours!—or dark or bright
I question not—the end is peace and light.

Sincere Christians walk the earth with calm and bearing of immortals, although the rays of spiritual majesty which stream forth from the burning spirit within, often do but illumine the weakness of the body which encases it. Of such it is literally true that whether they live, they live unto the Lord, and whether they die they die unto the Lord.—Canon Liddon.

As there are flowers that bloom unseen in solitary glens, watered by Him who forms the dew and sends the rain, so there are lowly children of the Most High, who, deprived of all human help and consolation, find their sufficiency in Him who supplies all their needs according to the riches of his glory in Christ Jesus; and so have a plenty in the midst of famine, and living water amid the desert sand.

Truth is said to be precious as a diamond; but it has a value that no diamond can have—the power of continually unfolding into new and higher forms. We cannot compute its worth and look it up like a precious stone; we may rather regard it as the seed that contains within itself the promise of continuous harvests for the ever-increasing needs of future generations. Frugally should we preserve it, liberally should we dispense it, prizing it for what it has been and is, but still more for what it is capable of producing.

What is the difference between a crystal and an organism, a stone and a plant? They have much in common. Both are made of the same atoms. Both display the same properties of matter. Both are subject to the Physical Laws. Both may be very beautiful. But, possessing all that the crystal has, the plant possesses something more—a mysterious something called Life. This life is not something which existed in the crystal only in a less developed form. There is nothing like it in the crystal. There is nothing like the first beginning of it in the crystal, not a trace or symptom of it. This plant is tenanted by something new, an original and unique possession added over and above all the properties common to both. When from vegetable life we rise to animal life, here again we find something original and unique—unique at least as compared with the visceral. From animal life we ascend again to Spiritual Life. And here also is something new, something still more unique. He who lives the Spiritual Life has a distinct kind of Life added to all the other phases of life which he manifests—a kind of Life infinitely more distinct than is the active Life of a plant from the inertia of a stone. The Spiritual man is more distinct in point of fact than is the plant from the stone.... The natural man belongs especially to this present order of things. He is endowed simply with a high quality of the natural animal Life. But it is Life of so poor a quality that it is not Life at all. He that hath not the Son hath not Life; but he that hath the Son hath Life—a new, and distinct, and supernatural endowment. He is of the timeless state, of eternity. It doth not yet appear what he shall be. The difference then between the Spiritual man and the Natural man is not a difference of development, but of generation. It is a distinction of quality, not of quantity. A man cannot rise by any natural development from "morality touched by emotion," to "morality touched by Life."—From Natural Law in the Spiritual World.

Strange Monument to Washington.

Among the many monuments to Washington is one which every visitor to the Cape Verde Isles will remember as one of the most colossal and marvelous freaks of natural sculpture in existence. Along the further side of San Vicente (the principal town) rises a bold ridge of dark grey volcanic rock, the crest of which forms an exact likeness of Washington lying face upward, as if in sleep or death. The hero's large, bold features, the backward wave of his hair, the sweep of his massive shoulders, and the very frill of his shirt are all reproduced on a gigantic scale with a fidelity worthy of the stalactite formations of the Adelsberg grotto or the Mammoth cave of Kentucky. This strange monument, sharply outlined against the deep rich blue of the tropical sky, is one of the first objects that meets one's eye on approaching the island, and presents, with the boundless ocean for its appropriate background, a tableaux of such overpowering magnificence as might well drive any sculptor to despair.

Principal Dawson has the following views of the natural force of prayer: "A naturalist" says he, should be the last man in the world to object to the efficacy of prayer, since prayer is itself one of the most potent and natural forces. The cry of the young raven brings food from afar without any exertion on its part, for that cry has power to move the emotions and the muscles of the parent bird, and to overcome her own selfish appetite. The cry of a lamb not only brings its dam to its side, but causes the secretion of milk in her udder. The cry of distress nerves men to exertions, and to brave all dangers, and to struggle against all or any of the laws of nature that may be causing suffering or death. Nor in the case of prayer are the objects obtained at all mechanically commensurate with the activities set in motion. We have all seen how the prayer of a few captives, wrongfully held in durance by some barbarous potentate, may move mighty nations and cause them to pour out millions of their treasure to send men and materials of war over land and sea, to sacrifice hundreds of lives, in order that a just and proper prayer may be answered. In such a case, we see how the higher law overrides the lower, and may cause even frightful suffering and loss of life, in order that a moral or spiritual end may be gained. Are we to suppose, then, that the only being in the universe who cannot answer prayer is that One who alone has all the power at his command? The weak theology which professes to believe that prayer has merely a subjective benefit, is infinitely less scientific that the action of a child who confidently appeals to a Father in heaven."—Christian Thought.

The melon shrub is one of the latest and most interesting importations from Central America. It is being successfully cultivated in California, both in Los Angeles and San Diego counties. The San Diego Union, in the course of an article describing the new shrub, says: "The fruit is of the size of a goose egg, and very much of the same shape. The color is lemon, or pale orange, with streaks of bright violet. The interior of the fruit, for it partakes of the nature of a muskmelon, but has a much thiner rind, is a solid pulp, similar to that of a pear, also of a pale yellow color, and in taste again resembling the muskmelon, but has besides a pleasing acid, said to be most wholesome and delicious that when partaken of on a very warm day it takes all the thirst away for hours. As it is an enormous yielder, the fruit pleasant and wholesome, and commanding a good price in the market, the melon shrub undoubtedly has a good future before it." Our contemporary is right in its prediction. When the broiling days of summer come upon us there will be no lack of purchasers for a fruit which "takes away thirst for hours." Neither nature nor art has offered such a boon to thirsty humanity before.

SMITH.—At Fennville, Mich., Jan. 29, 1885. Cynthia Stiles Smith, wife of Bro. Alvah Smith, aged 43 years.

Sister Smith has been for a year and a half a great sufferer from an internal cancer. She embraced the blessed Hope of the Savior's glorious appearing nearly 27 years ago, in company with many other young persons, at Jamestown, Mich. and was baptized into Christ by the writer. She removed with her family to this City, soon after the war commenced, her husband having entered the army. By her energy and unceasing toil she provided for her family. For several years she met with us in the meetings we held at different places in the City—sometimes in their own house. We trust that she continued to be a member of Christ's body and fell asleep in Jesus, and after the short night of death, she will awake in the morn of the first resurrection, in the likeness of her Savior, and appear with him in glory. She was brought from Minneapolis, where she had been living with her parents and sister, to the residence of her sister in Fennville, Mich., where after lingering two or three months she died. By her request, she was brought to this City (Grand Rapids) and buried by the side of her brother Millard. On Sunday Feb. 1st. her funeral took place at the residence of her brother in Paris. A large assembly of relatives and neighbors were addressed by the writer from the words of the Apostle to the Thessalonians, "If Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him."

"Unveil thy bosom faithful tomb,
Take this new treasure to thy trust;
And give these sacred relics room
To slumber in the silent dust.

Nor pain, nor grief, nor anxious fear,
Invades thy bounds; no mortal woes
Can reach thy peaceful sleepers here,
While angels watch the soft repose.

So Jesus slept; God's dying Son
Passed through the grave and blessed the bed.
Rest here blest saint, till from his throne
The morning break and pierce thy shade.

Break from his throne illustrious morn!
Attend, O earth, his sovereign word!
Restore thy trusts; a glorious form
Shall then arise to meet the Lord."

Appointments.

The Third quarterly meeting of the North Iowa Advent Christian Conference will be held at Greeley, Delaware Co., Iowa, commencing Friday, March 20, and continuing over Sunday. The public are invited, especially the brethren and sisters from a distance. All are assured of a home that may come. P. W. HOUGH.

To the brethren in Kansas. I intend to labor in Nebraska and Kansas during the months of March and April. I expect to be in the town of Wilmore, Gage Co., Neb., the last week in February. I wish the brethren in Kansas who wish me to visit them to write me at Wilmore, stating the town and county where they reside, so that I can make up my route, and take in as many places as possible. ## LOVELY VINE.

I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. John xv. 1.

The voice of the Lord sweetly saith to me,
The True Vine am I, and the branches are ye:
Abide ye in me, all ye branches Abide,
Abide, Oh! abide in the true living vine.

CHORUS.

Lovely vine, let thy life through us flow,
No life out of thee can we know.
Oh, love all divine flowing ever through the vine,
From thee will thy branches ever grow.

Thee Father all holy the husbandman art,
The branch without fruit will thy hand take away,
Thou all-seeing eye, rather purge thou my heart,
And let me dear Lord, from thee ne'er go astray.

Much fruit may we bear, to thy glory Oh Lord;
As upward we grow through the Vine unto thee:
Abiding in love and obeying thy word,
Thy branches forever and ever to be.

THE GOSPEL—"THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION."

For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, the just shall live by his faith. Rom. i. 16-17.

The power which inheres in the gospel excludes every other object and completely shuts us up to the faith of the gospel. No heathen dogma, or tradition of the so-called fathers of the Church, however pious or honest, can come in between us and the glorious gospel of the Son of God, which brought life and immortality to light by the preaching of Christ. "The glad tidings," the gospel, is the power. We wish now to consider briefly, the import of the term Gospel.

Christ says, The spirit of the Lord God is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor: he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. See Luke iv. 18-20, also Isa. lxi. chapter entire. It appears that the prophet carries us down from before the time of Christ's first to his second advent, and including the times of the restitution, of which all of the prophets have spoken. The doctrine of the restitution is declared by Paul to be the gospel. See 1 Cor. xv. 1. (please read the entire chapter,) and as if it does not completely refute the popular dogma of the immortal soul, going to heaven at death or subsequently. "The meek shall inherit the earth." Matt. v. 5, Ps. xxxvii; 3, 9, 11, 18, 22, 29.

This Psalm is descriptive of the destiny, both of the righteous and the wicked. The righteous to inherit the land and dwell in it forever, but the wicked to be cut off—consumed—destroyed (not preserved, or kept alive in misery), according to the old dogma, but now, thank God! it is an exploded one, for no one who values his or her reputation as a scholar, or a believer in Christianity—in a "God who is love"—can so stultify him or her self as to preach, or proclaim it, for the good reason, that the Bible is diametrically opposed to it.

The time has gone by when the hell fire, or eternal torment dogma, can be palmed off as "the gospel." for, if it ever had any power to convert a sinner from the error of his ways, it is now powerless for that purpose. But I am sorry to say, that still almost everything or device is resorted to for the conversion of sinners except the gospel.

"The anxious seat" is substituted for the "mercy seat," extatic joy instead of "the faith once delivered to the saints—without which it is impossible to please God."

The belief in the glorious gospel of the Son of God, will beget the faith that works by love and purifies the heart, and overcomes the world, also the hope which is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and that which enters in to that within the vail, where Christ our forerunner is for us entered,

Modern (so-called) revivals lack the all-important element—the power of God, which inheres in and only in, "the gospel," as proclaimed by Paul and the other apostles. Hear Paul, in his letter to the Galatians. I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you unto the grace of Christ, unto another gospel; which is not another, but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again. If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed. Gal. i. 6, 7, 8, 9.

And fearful responsibility rests on any one who attempts to teach that man's habitation is in the skies,—in heaven, or any planet away from the earth, or in any other locality, but that which was covenanted to Abraham, (the Father of the Faithful) and attempt to palm it off as a gospel, or worse still, as "the gospel;" as being the power of God unto salvation, in the face of what Paul has taught as "the gospel." I say, such one incurs a fearful responsibility. No amount of logical acumen can reconcile or harmonize the dogma of immortal-soulism, or immortality by the first Adam, which of course must exclude the resurrection, with Paul's statement, that "Christ hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." for before this announciation, history informs us that Socrates, Plato and others believed and taught this dogma of natural immortality.

Socrates, the true exponent of this dogma before Christ's day, and the Rev. Wilber Fisk, president of the M. E. College of Middletown, Ct., a true exponent of Methodism, stand on the same plane; both believed in the inherent immortality of man, and in his dual nature, i. e., soul and body, each as separate entities. The former when dying said, "You cannot bury Socrates for I shall go to the gods." The latter said to his weeping wife when dying, "Weep not for me, you cannot bury Wilber Fisk, my soul will be in heaven." The soul, he considered the man proper, and would still retain its consciousness; or in other words, could not die, as life and consciousness are of course inseparable, and of course the resurrection is ignored. But Paul says, "If the dead rise not, then they who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." But according to modern theology, heaven is attainable without a resurrection.

Take out the doctrine (alias dogma) immortal soulism, from Catholicism, and the invocation of saints, purgatory, and the worship of images, or Saint worship would immediately collapse. No one can dispute but this dogma is the chief corner stone of modern spiritualism. But without indorsing in the least their dogma, they are by far more consistent than most of the religious sects in Christendom. Their motto and watchword is, "There is no death."

In what is termed Riepel Cemetery, about three miles from where the writer resides, which was deeded by the owner, N. P. Talmage, formerly governor of Wisconsin, when a territory, and previously a U. S. Senator from the state of New York, who embraced spiritualism in 1852, and wrote quite a large book on the same. In connection with Judge Edmonds of New York.

Mr. Talmage and a large circle of relatives were buried there. The inscriptions on the marble slabs were all substantially like the following, after the date—Born to a higher life—

There is no death; what men call death is but the mortal struggle for immortality.

Other graves, the receptacles of the same faith interspersed throughout the cemetery. On their monuments they have similar inscriptions.

The logical conclusion is that death and consciousness at the same time would be a contradiction in terms, of which the spiritualists are well aware.

M. I. LEWIS.

THE REMAINS.

As I went in to attend the funeral services of an old friend, our good deacon said to me: Would you like to see the "remains," conducting me to the casket where my old friend lay "asleep."

That expression I dislike, it sounds unchristian. I like those old Bible stories. Abraham, after purchasing a burial place of the sons of Heth, buried Sarah his wife.

Deborah Rebecca's nurse died, and they buried her under the oak called afterward, "The oak of weeping."

In the account of Lazarus, his death and resurrection, nothing is said of his remains. Roll away the stone, Lazarus come forth; and he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave clothes. Loose him and let him go. Jesus met a funeral procession from the city of Nain bringing out for burial a young man, the only son of his mother, and Jesus said, Young man, I say unto thee arise, and he that was dead sat up. Devout men carried Stephen to his burial.

And the angel said to the women, Why seek ye the living among the dead. He is not here, he has arisen; come see the place where the Lord lay.

It would be a shame and crime for any one to substitute the phrase, "The remains," in any of these beautiful Scriptural accounts of the dead.

CHRIST: HIS LIFE AND WORK 1,800 YEARS AGO.

No subject is at once so intrinsically momentous and conventionally unattractive. We may dismiss the unattractiveness as the result of intellectual obfuscation in the unattracted. It is more edifying to dwell on the momentousness. This does not admit of comparison with the human importance of any other subject whatever. Yet one are the subjects that more or less command the homage or engage the interest of the more enlightened portion of mankind.

Astronomy appeals overpoweringly to our sense of the stupendous. the exact, the infinite: the face of the earth stirs a sense of the fair and the beautiful: the mystery depths excite our curiosity as to past conditions of the globe. Agriculture supplies us with the useful: chemistry with the theoretical; history, with the actual working of things among men in their present constitution. But which of these can throw any light on the overpressing problem of the meaning of existence and the destiny of human life? They are dumb as the stars; dark as the night; or incoherent as the roar of the storm-tossed waters on the desolate strand. They are all more or less interesting and important in the hour of health: but of what value in the certainly-coming moment to every man when the eye glazes and the hovering shadow of death compels a farewell to all we know and love?

This is just where Christ is of a value unspeakable. He is the solution of things touching the origin, nature, and destiny of human life. The review we propose in these chapters of the facts of the case will show that there is no extravagance in the words of David, which say prophetically to Christ: "Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips;" nor in those other Spirit-indited words, "One among ten thousand: altogether lovely." It is not without the highest reason in the nature of things that the ransomed assembly of the brethren of Christ in glory—(supported by "an innumerable company of angels") proclaim in rapturous anthems, that the Lamb that was slain is "worthy to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessing." It is not only as Pilate was made to record, that "there is no fault in him:" but as Paul declared, that "in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge:" that "in him dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily."

Men glory in men. They see and praise greatness in the successful leading of soldiers, as in a Napoleon: they admire the ability that can tell a graphic story, like a Dickens: or that can clearly delineate quick-eyed discernments and impressions of men and things, as a Shakespeare: they extol the capacity that can hold the political helm in stormy weather, like a Gladstone, or thread can jingle composition in measured cadences, like a Scott or a Tennyson. What is it all, but the exhibition of perishing mortal faculty, in picturesque relations—impressing human mentalities, tickling human fancies, flattering human vanities, but futile in the eternal issues of things? At the best, it is the exercise of creative gift,—like the strength of a horse, the constructiveness of a bee, the scent of a bloodhound, the instinct of a beaver. If we are commanded not to glory in man, it is reasonable we should not. Man is but a creature—a transient blossom of eternal power—no more to be adored for his qualities than a rose for its fragrance, a peach for its bloom.

But with Christ, it is otherwise. We are not only not forbidden; we are commanded, to glory in him. The very angels were ordered to do obeisance: "Let all the angels of God worship him." And the reason which tells us it is out of place to glory in men, tells us it is fitting we should glory in the Lord. The Father has planted in him intrinsic excellence, life, authority, and power; and where these are, the recognition of them in praise and deference, is reasonable. This is the perfect glory we have in Christ: that he is the head and deserves to be; that he is exalted to the position of power, and possesses the power to qualify him for the position; that he is offered for our obedience, love and praise, and has, in himself, every element that could constrain the compliance and enthusiastic loyalty of the highest intelligence.

Jesus, while upon earth said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Such words would be strange from the mouth of mere man; from the mouth of "God in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," they come with a sweetness and authority. They faithfully reflect the true state of man. "Seeking rest and finding none" is the universal notion. This is actual experience. The unrest of the unsatisfied human spirit is the lot of every man—especially a man that is a man in the sense of having an approximate development of the normal capacities and aspirations of the human species. Swine in the trough have a certain satisfaction; cattle in the pasture are not oppressed with any sense of ungratified faculty: and there be men—and these the majority—whom the Scriptures compare to such. But there be other men in whom the globistic image—faint and marred though it be—is not entirely obliterated: men who discern in the starry immensities around them the sphere of immeasurable aspiration—the potentiality of unattained heights of beauty and glorious life—yea, who looking into even themselves and out upon the face of the fair earth while they tread with its multitudinous manifestations of mysterious life, have their hearts drawn out into infinite longings which nothing in human life, as it now is, can satisfy. All men experience the vanity of life as it now is upon the earth, but none so keenly as these. They labor and are heavy laden: labor in the futile effort to grasp the reason of things: are heavy laden in the moral oppression which the immensity and the inscrutability of things brings upon their spirits. God in Christ says, "Come unto me;" "in me ye shall have peace," even as Paul expresses it, "the peace of God that passeth all understanding, filling the heart and mind."

In Christ, creation is delivered from the gloom in which it appears to merely natural eyes. If natural men say that there is no gloom to creation for them, it is the mere rejection of intellectual resentment, or the utterance of a crude experience which has not yet learnt the sadness of life as it now is—the sadness that inevitably waits when the effervescence of young blood has subsided, when the poetic ardours of fresh life have expended themselves, when business has lost its aim and its interest; and when mortal energy wanes, and man is forced to recognise in the encroachments of feebleness and disappearance of friends in the universal grave, the sad tokens of the truth that comes home at last, however long ignored in pride or silenced in the din of folly, that man is subject to vanity, and that human life is in darkness.

Light is best seen in darkness. So in the glory of Christ the most manifest when this vanity of human things is seen and felt. It is a poor estimate of Christ that gives him merely a place among other objects in the heart: a mere niche in a pantheon in which there are other gods. This is the place he receives at popular hands today—a name among names: a star among stars: a moral hero among many shining lights of fame. This is not his true place at all. It is not the place he will accept. To him every knee must bow. There are no greatnesses, and no lights beside him. "In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." No man has yet attained to a true knowledge of Christ, who holds back from this assessment of his excellence, or who would place any man, or order of men, in the same rank.

Paul had a reason for his emphasis. He hints at it in the words he immediately adds: "This I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words." There were men in Paul's day with enticing theories of things that logically undermined the position of Christ in the estimates and affections of believers. They either brought Christ down to men, or levelled men up to him, which had the same practical effect. There are men of the same stamp in our day. Nay, almost all public teachers, whether in the press, pulpit or platform, are of this stamp. There are scarcely found any to contend earnestly for the faith in this matter. Tennyson is lauded to the skies. Darwin worshipped: Dickens and Scott trumpeted to the world, and Shakespeare exalted to the position of scarcely doubtful equality with the Bible. Christ, the name above every name—with whom only is light and life for man—is patronised with a dim and distinct deference; or unblushingly dishonored by disparaging comparisons with modern celebrities. No sadder spectacle could the sun look down upon.

Christ differs from all so-called great men that have ever arisen among men, in that he has both dynamical relation to the universe, and an indefeasible title to possession, according to the strictest methods of legal construction. We are leaving out of account for the moment the disparity between them as to character. Even supposing it could be made out for a moment that their characters were equal, the difference referred to is an immeasurable gulf.

The brightest human intellect that ever dazzled mankind is but a burning taper in the wind, or, if you will, a glowing electric light on a spire-top. It is a thing of conditions. Take away the conditions, and the light is gone: and over the conditions the light has no control. William Shakespeare was a brain of certain organization: this brain has to be fed with the vital force which digestion extracts from food. Properly supplied thus, it has impressions and the power of representation: thoughts in terse words. It is no more than any other human brain, except in the larger development of specific departments of the brain. He cannot control or alter the laws that govern being, either for himself or others. He friends die and he cannot help them. he himself grows old and he cannot prevent it. The power he possesses is only such as exists in the imagination of his admirers. The Marquis of Hertford sinks: the Queen can only send a message of sympathy. The Queen would feel mocked if the Marquis were to say, "Speak the word and my servant shall be healed."

With Christ, how different! The eternal and fundamental force of the universe (the Spirit of God) is in his hand. "Power over all flesh" is the Father's gift to him—"all power in heaven and in earth." What he can do in the exercise of this power has been illustrated. He can stop a storm: he can produce bread from the abstract elements, without the circuitous process of agriculture. He can discern the secrets of the human mind at any distance: he can make the dead alive again. All this he did when upon earth. Greater marvels wait, as his attested promise declares.—Robert Roberts in Christadelphian.

Hebron and Abraham's Burial Place.

Hebron is doubtless the oldest city in Palestine, perhaps as old as Damascus in Syria. It was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt, we read in Numbers xiii. 22; but alas, no one will tell us when Zoan was founded. The cave of Machpelah is the principal attraction to tourists in Hebron; and yet nothing could be more inaccessible than this same cave. Backsheesh, that all-conquering power, has opened the mosque of Omar, the Consulum and other biblical places of interest that are in the hands of the Moslems; but this wonderful cave is forbidden to the infidel Frank, despite all solicitations. This is the more to be regretted, inasmuch as it is at once genuine, and boasts of an authority far antidating the Christian era. The cave is covered by a huge mosque, 200 feet long by 115 feet broad. The foundation stones are some of them 20 feet long, and bear the ancient Jewish bevels. The cave itself, away down beneath even the basement, is studiously guarded even from the indiscriminate gaze of Moslems. The accounts published from hearsay are confused and contradictory. Sooner or later Mohammedan fanaticism must yield, and then will there be some important revelations in the way of discovered antiquities. The Jews love the very dust about this spot, and repair to the stones in the venerable walls to weep, chant, lament, and deposit written Hebrew prayers in the deep seams between the rocks, just as they do at the famous Wailing Place at Jerusalem. I secured one of these prayers as a souvenir, and then passed around to the rear of the mosque to view some subterranean cavities above and around the real Machpelah.—Palestine letter in New York Evening Post.

It has been a long time since I have given any report of my labors in my Master's cause. I left home December 9. The first place I held meeting was at Schoolcraft, Ind. Was there one week and had some good meetings. I closed with a temperance lecture. From there I went to the Plummer school house where I remained over two weeks. Had meeting a part of the time and had a good visit with the brethren. I first preached in this part of the country in May, 1864, twenty years ago and over. From there I went to Brother Boyd's, near Colfax. Had meeting about ten days which the brethren and myself enjoyed well. We held the most of our meetings at Bro. Boyd's house on account of bad weather, but there was a good interest taken by the few that came out.

From there I went to visit my married daughter, Mrs. Zachary, near Crawfordsville, my former home, and while there I held meeting at her house. She went out and invited in some of her friends. Her nearest neighbor had told her several times when I came out there, he wanted to hear what kind of doctrine I preached. He did not come out the first night, so she went and called on him and invited him out that night, and he told her no, he did not want to hear a soul sleeper, and talked quite insulting to her. So it is, some will hear and some will not. But still we had a good meeting. May the Lord bless his word to the good and honest heart, and may it bring forth fruit unto everlasting life. I was gone about six weeks. Returned home and found all well. Found a letter from Lenark, Ill., inviting me to come out there, but the weather was so bad that I did not go, but will perhaps this spring. I go to Mendon, Mich., in a few days, and from there to Pine Creek to hold some meetings. There is great need of sounding out the word of the Lord. The Lord will soon come.

Editor Restitution:

I would like to say to the readers of THE RESTITUTION, that Brother B. W. Woodward of Dutton, Michigan, closed here last Tuesday evening a very interesting meeting. We got the use of a good comfortable meeting-house three quarters of a mile west of town, which is free for all religious denominations, when not in use by the Protestant Methodist friends. The attendance was good and the interest splendid. Although our views were quite new to most of the people, yet they gave the best of attention, and I trust that the truths of the gospel have found an abiding place in the hearts of many of the good people of this vicinity.

Brother Woodward is a workman that need not be ashamed. While he presents the gospel in a clear, forcible manner, yet he does it in such a kind way that it causes but little or no offense. And right here let me say, that I think that many of our preaching brethren might do much more good if they would follow Brother Woodward's example. The attendance at our meetings was composed mostly of people that have never made any profession of religion, many of them being wealthy farmers.

Some said that Elder Woodward preached a kind of business religion, something that they could comprehend. While only one confessed openly his faith in the gospel, yet I think that many are convinced of the truth as presented, and I hope are long to see quite a little band of believers gathered together here at Mentone. I hope that our good brethren and sisters in Michigan will spare Brother Woodward to come back here before long and finish the good work commenced. Your brother in the gospel faith and waiting for the Master to come to reward all of his saints. May it be ours to be ready.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint rulers with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion are prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life are essential for final salvation.

"THE FOUNDATIONS"---FIRM.

Your intelligent correspondent of THE RESTITUTION, Carrie Williams, has made the article on God's kingdom a fundamental point of truth. The household of faith, should not fail to see it. Having no prejudice or purpose to warp my mind, her facts, proofs, and conclusions are to me unavoidable and absolute. She takes only established data, and the outcome of the argument is as clear and certain as it is sure and fundamental.

Please observe. Neither David himself, nor Abraham his ancestor; nor Solomon his son, or any one of the Davidic dynasty—however honored,—was "the seed" of covenant promise and oath; because the promise did reach on to "The Lord Jesus"—the Christ! Hence, He Jesus, must have a higher paternity, than that of Solomon from David, in order to hold and assert a higher claim to be "The son of the Father in truth and love." John v. 20, 30; x. 36. "I am, he said, the Son of God." Again. The headship of Israel over the nations,—like appointment of Saul to be their king—was provisional and designed with the law to lead on to Jesus. Gal. iii. The entire system by "Moses and the prophets" was preparatory to that of "the gospel of Christ and his kingdom." Furthermore, the Bible range of this subject is wider and higher still. "The kingdom to come" is to be "the first dominion." Paradisaic sinless state,—above and before, a single son of our fallen race, was born. Micah iv. 8. Then Adam also, was of God! Luke iii. 38. Thus of the future, "he that sat on the throne said: behold I make all things new!" Rev. xxi. 5.

"The first man Adam" was altogether of God, and all that pertained to his "creation!" "All ways of God. Now "the last Adam—the second man—the Lord from heaven—having in all [relations] the pre-eminence"—must be "a greater than Solomon," and in advance of Adam! "The everlasting King" of creation.

The virgin's son, the new thing in the earth. The son of Mary divinely begotten and heir to his "father David's throne," [by her lineage from David] must be on the new line of God's purpose. Rom. viii. 20.

"The firstborn among many brethren." These brethren being themselves begotten again by the incorruptible seed, the Word of God. Thus they themselves are "the church of the firstborn," and Jesus "The head" of that "body the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Eph. i. 23.

No mortal of the chosen nation, by natural descent could have been David's Lord! No, No, No. Ps. cx. Matt. xxii. So, no one can be numbered with the church, the many brethren of whom Christ is "The First Born" except as they, themselves shall be "born again—begotten of God," and "renewed into his image" on the gospel plan of the new man, and all things new. Amen! Much of detail must be omitted. Some write on, and on, as if the readers of THE RESTITUTION were children who had no other reading, our paper is dear to us, and its readers advanced—needing only the main truth, in hand.

But all need to know that adding to, or taking away the word; especially to disparage the record that God has given of his son" is noted, with its results. 1 John ii. 21, 23; and v. 10, 14; xvii. 22; 2 Pet. ii. 10, 11; Rev. xvii. 14.

The pride of opinion involved may not be exceeded, except by the presumption! Did Israelites speak against Moses with honor or safety, to themselves? Num. xii. 8. No, indeed.

Then, who can fail to see the sin and shame incurred by arguing against the fundamental facts and terms of relation that confirm the superhuman the Divine Fatherhood, and sonship of Jesus!

Note the baptism of John. The prophecies of Mary, Zacharias, and Simeon!—The angel anthem, "glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men!" The gospel of the kingdom—The Pentecostal out pouring, and the high calling of God: that has reached on to us, have their root and worth in the miraculous birth and life of Jesus. Then a thousand considerations come in here to sustain "the record." Amen and Amen!

Fraternally to all, but faithfully in the confession of "Jesus, the only begotten of the Father."

J. B. COOK.

WHAT IS THE DIFFERENCE?

Over and over, do we hear it asserted, "that it makes no difference what a man believes, nor how he evades the commandments of God, it will be all right in the end." He is "resting in Jesus," and that is enough.

"It makes no difference where the promised inheritance is to be, nor what direction he may take, he expects to get there. He thinks, it is in heaven, and believes with all his heart that he will go there immediately, when he dies, to sing with happy throngs of angels around God's throne. Yet, when he is confronted with what God says about it, that "the meek shall inherit the earth," and that "the dead know not anything," "it makes no difference," "it is only a matter of opinion anyway."

Yet, is there no difference? Does it matter nothing to us whether we believe truth, or falsehood? Mohammed or Christ, Socrates or David, Satan or God? Will it make no difference in our destiny, whether we accept the word of God, or "the traditions of men?" whether we "keep the sayings of Jesus," or "the commandments of men?"

For myself, I have reached the solemn conclusion that it is utterly impossible to please God without faith, and that that faith must be "in the things not yet seen," in "a city that hath foundations," in "the promises made of God unto the fathers," in "the resurrection of the dead" in "a kingdom promised to all them that love him," in "eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," in "the kingdoms of this world becoming the kingdom of our Lord," and to his future "dominion being from sea to sea, and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth."

Faith, was the one element, that was lacking in the conduct of Cain. Judging from the law of sacrifice, afterwards given in Leviticus, the meat-offering that he brought to the Lord was all right as far as it went. Bread, or rather cakes, broken in pieces, with oil poured thereon, was one of the offerings of the Israelites; or, the oblation might be corn beaten from the ears, with oil and frankincense. But from Num. xxviii. and xxix. it would seem that some slain victim must always accompany the meat-offering. The broken cakes might represent the broken body of the coming crucified One, but, in that bread there was nothing to typify the atoning blood. The law of sacrifice was disregarded—"without shedding of blood there is no remission." Cain presented no kid of the goats, nor bleeding lamb, as evidence of his faith in a future Redeemer.

Yet he was angry with God because his offering was not accepted, because mercy was not extended and his sins pardoned.

No doubt he said, "I have done enough," the rest is non-essential." But was it? Did it not make some difference in his case, that he did not believe God, did not fulfill the law to the letter? The name of Cain is not on the roll-call of the faithful in Heb. xi. He is not counted among those that are to be made perfect with us, in a final day.

It made some difference with Noah. He believed God and did just what he was told to do and was saved. The unbelieving disbelieved multitude were drowned.

The sons-in-law of Lot laughed when they was told that Sodom was to be overthrown that very day; a few hours later and they had perished.

It made some difference with Abraham. Because he believed and obeyed God, he was promised the eternal tenure of the earth, and that a Son—the Savior should come of his line in whom all generations should be blessed.

Moses chose "the recompense of reward," rather than the honors of an Egyptian crown, and is counted among "the jewels" of Jehovah.

Nadab and Abihu did what they were commanded not to do, and they died before the Lord. Saul lost the kingdom and a future life by unbelief and disobedience.

So runs the record from Genesis to Revelation. Faith, is made perfect in obedience, and obedience is counted as righteousness.

God set life and death before men in former days. And he sets life and death before men now. It is, "Do this and you shall live, or refuse to do and die. The message to us is, "He that believeth the gospel and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Believe and be saved, or refuse to hearken and die. S. R. WISER.

Selections.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

In our news column we have endeavored to keep our readers acquainted with the progress of the remarkable war the British Government is now waging in the Soudan. A brief recapitulation, therefore, is all that is necessary here. Originally, the Government decided to abandon the Soudan, concerning themselves with Egypt proper. Egypt itself they have again and again declared they do not intend to hold permanently, but only to occupy until its government is well established and its finances adjusted on a prosperous and efficient basis.

It was found, however, that the Mahdi intended to overrun Egypt. He believes himself, or rather represents himself (for we do not know what he believes), as the successor of Mohammed, commissioned to extend the Mohammedan faith over the whole world. Egypt could never be secure with the Soudan on its borders boiling over with fanaticism, and therefore it became necessary to commence a campaign in the Soudan. Peaceable measures were tried first. General Gordon, who had once, under the former Viceroy of Egypt, held the position of Governor of the Soudan, and was very popular with the people, was sent to assure them that England was desirous only of their welfare, and wished them to establish a government of their own. The Mahdi had, however, aroused the fanaticism of the people, and they hesitated whether to trust to General Gordon, or to join hands with the Mahdi. Finally, General Gordon was surrounded in Khartoum by the Mahdi's forces. His appeals to England for assistance were disregarded until it was too late to rescue him, and he is believed to have fallen a victim to treachery.

The army sent to the relief of General Gordon has undergone severe privations, and has fought several desperate battles. On the first page of The Christian Herald this week are portraits of some of the men who have distinguished themselves in the campaign—men whose names figure prominently in the cable dispatches our daily journals are publishing, and with whose features our readers may like to familiarize themselves.

GEN. LORD WOLSELEY, COMMANDER OF THE GORDON RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Lord Wolseley, better known by his former title of Sir Garnet Wolseley, is descended from a family originally belonging to the Country of Stafford, where they had been settled from before the Norman Conquest in 1066.

General Wolseley is fifty-two years old, having been born in Dublin on June 4th, 1833. He was educated at a private school and under tutors. He entered the army as an ensign in the Twelfth Foot, in March, 1852, but on the 13th of the following month was transferred to the Eightieth Regiment.

His first military service was in the Burmese War of 1852-53, for which he received the medal for Pegu, and he was with the expedition under Sir John Cheape, against the robber chief Myatteon, being severely wounded in the attack on that chief's stronghold. Landing in the Crimea, with the Ninetieth Light Infantry, in December, 1854, he was employed in the trenches as acting engineer until Sebastopol was taken, being severely wounded in a sortie, and several times mentioned for skill and valor in dispatches. For his services he received the medal with clasp, and was made a Knight of the Legion of Honor, received the fifth clasp of the Medjidie and the Turkish medal.

In the Indian mutiny he served with distinction against the savages for the rescue of the besieged garrisons. He was repeatedly mentioned in dispatches and received the rank of Lieutenant-colonel, and the medal with clasp. In the war of 1860 in China, he served upon the quartermaster-general's staff, and was present at the assault of the Taku forts, and in all the engagements throughout the campaign, receiving another medal with two clasps.

Ten years later he commanded the expedition sent from Canada to the Red River territory for the suppression of the rebel government established at Fort Garry, and was created a Knight of St. Michael and St. George for his services upon that occasion. He was governor and commander of the forces on the Gold Coast during the Ashantee war of 1873-74, and for his services then was promoted to be major-general for distinguished service, nominated a Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George and Knight Commander of the Bath, and received the medal with clasp.

In the last-named war he was dispatched to Natal to administer the government of that colony from November, 1875, till November, 1876, was inspector-general of the auxiliary forces at the headquarters of the army, at the latter date was appointed a member of the Council of India, and in 1878 High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Cyprus. In June, 1879, he was sent to South Africa as High Commissioner and Governor of Natal and the Transvaal, to reorganize the affairs of Zululand, and on that occasion conducted the operations against Secocoeni, whose stronghold he destroyed. Returning in May, 1880, he was appointed quartermaster-general at the headquarters of the army, and succeeded Sir Charles Ellice as adjutant-general of the army. He was appointed general officer commanding-in-chief, with temporary rank of general, of the expeditionary force proceeding to Egypt in 1882. His smart and masterly conduct of that campaign won for him his peerage and the pension of $125,000.

In September, 1884, he was authorized by the government to organize an expedition for the relief of General Gordon, who was then in a perilous condition in the besieged city of Khartoum, and on the 9th of the same month he arrived at Cairo. He got together a sufficient number of camel and other corps for his purpose, and on Saturday, October 4th, commenced his forward march into the Soudan, via the River Nile, with Khartoum for his destination. His headquarters are at Korti, on the edge of the Soudan desert.

Lord Wolseley is an earnest advocate of total abstinence principles, and in his "Soldier's Pocketbook for Field Service," published in 1869, he strongly inveighs against the serving out of grog to soldiers, and inculcates upon them habits of temperance and self-control.—Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

Kissed by Washington.

The death of Mrs. Hannah Swasey, who died in Alameda on Thursday last, at the advanced age of 101 years and 6 months, is worthy of more than passing notice. She was the granddaughter of Lord Plunkett, who left England on account of religious persecution, his property being confiscated. He settled near Dover, N. H., where Mrs. Swasey was born. General Washington drilled his men on her father's farm, and in passing on one occasion he took the little girl in his arms and kissed her. Mrs. Swasey was very intelligent and attractive, and beloved by all who knew her. She retained her mental faculties unimpaired to the hour of her death, and to the last spoke cheerfully to those around her. She was also remarkably active, and attended to her household duties up to ten days before her death. She made the trip across the continent twice after she was 80 years of age.—San Francisco Chronicle.

"SCATTERED AND PEELED."

During the past few months little information has appeared in the daily journals respecting the condition of the Jews. The shocking outrages which occurred in Russia two years ago brought into unusual prominence the miseries endured by God's chosen people. The silence now observed respecting them might lead to the inference that persecution has ceased. The following survey, however, of their condition throughout Europe, written by a Christian lady whose work among the Jews, is indefatigable, shows that they are still enduring terrible hardships and are yet a nation "scattered and peeled" Isa. xviii. 8.

Persecution is still active, and is increasing. The Jews in Roumania are suffering under the oppressive laws recently brought to bear upon them in that country. The unfortunate people are driven out of every industry by which they could earn their bread, forbidden to live in rural districts, precluded from working as artizans or trading in the towns. The following cases show the brutal manner in which the law is carried out. Here is a recent incident.

A Jew was lately murdered by a native Christian. The criminal was brought to trial. His advocate pleaded that the man ought not to be punished, though proved to be guilty, and urged that as every Jew kills the souls of Christians [whatever that may mean], it is not wrong for a Christian to kill the body of a Jew! The murderer was acquitted!

The Jewish Chronicle of January 9th, 1885, gives the following appalling account: Two alleged cases of cattle disease having broken out at Darabani, the Prefect of the district instituted the local Commissary of Police, Filipescou to take the necessary measures for preventing the spread of disease. This [illegible] out his instructions [illegible] ordinary mourning of loved and loyal Jews to be seized, and forced them, by dint of most inhuman treatment, to erect a wall around the town, although they knew nothing of building operations. Day and night, in storm and rain, they were mercilessly kept at their work by their taskmasters, a la Pharaoh, until at length a veterinary surgeon was induced to intervene, and advise that the construction of the wall might be discontinued as the murder-pest did not prevail in the place. So harshly were the Jewish laborers, among whom were several aged men, dealt with, that they were even compelled to work on the Day of Atonement. On the Feast of Tabernacles the synagogue was actually closed, because all the men were at work.

Perhaps still worse was the treatment which the Jews who were spared from the work in the fields had to endure on the Day of Atonement. Scarcely had the thinned congregation assembled within their synagogue when Filipescou arrived with several policemen, and having posted them at the several exits, in order to prevent any egress from within, he caused a quantity of sulphur to be burned inside the building, in order, as alleged, to thoroughly disinfect the place. The unfortunate worshippers were almost suffocated; women fell to the ground unconscious, and it was not until the tyrannical Filipescou perceived that it would be dangerous to prolong his amusement that the doors were opened and the prisoners liberated. Meanwhile terrible scenes were being enacted in other parts of the town. Bands of ruffians broke into houses inhabited by Jews, destroyed and plundered everything on which they could lay their hands, and ill-treated the persons, mostly women, whom they found in the dwellings. These barbarities were continued on the following day, although a number of Jews had fled from the town during the night. The results of these atrocities were of a fearful character, and women died from fright.

In addition to these gross persecutions, the Jews were also exposed to various annoyances of a more or less vexatious character. The slaughtering of animals was absolutely forbidden; but the poultry which the Shochet was allowed to kill were rendered unfit for consumption owing to all the birds being immersed in a solution of sulphur and carbolic acid. When the men who had been engaged in building the wall were released from their involuntary labor, they were sprinkled by some officials with carbolic acid. So roughly was this done that several of them were severely burned.

At Odessa the Jewish merchants have suddenly received notice of expulsion at the new year unless they pay the fee of one thousand roubles [about five hundred dollars] annually for license as first-class merchants. The date is purposely fixed to interfere with the usual getting in of the trade debts at the end of the old year. The Jews will have to go—pay all their debts, sell off at a loss, and leave before getting in the payments due to them. In two provinces a cruel law of Emperor Nicholas is now revived, driving all Jews near the frontier into the interior. All this in the depth of Russian winter!

Matters are not much better in Austria. There has been a serious outbreak, with loss of life, at Cracow. In Hungary outrages still continue; and though the Austrian Government is by no means unfriendly, local judges and officials join actively in ill-treating Jews.

Mr. F. D. Mocatta reports that in the capital of Bulgaria, where the Jews till lately have been at peace, they are now in fear of disturbances, on account of Russian and German influence. He adds that the position of Jews in Servia and in Turkey is everything that can be desired. In Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia there is nothing to be complained of, so far as the law is concerned; but the pamphlets industriously circulated, often with sensational illustrations about the "blood accusation," are doing much harm, and the Jews are very much depressed about their future.

In Germany the anti-Semites are going with active propaganda against the Jews both there and abroad.

A terrible persecution has long been going on in Morocco unchecked. Emigration is the only resource left, but whither shall Jews go? Most European States, as well as America, now refuse to admit refugees unless they bring funds with them.

Turkey and the land of promise are again open; thither the homeless wanderers must and will assuredly turn their steps. Many have already gone there. There are now many refugees in Galilee and also in Jerusalem, where among the eighteen to twenty thousand Jews, mostly destitute, are many refugees from Europe, Arabia and Africa.

During the last two years we have been enabled to help in various places, and many ways, a very considerable number. We feel assured that Christian sympathy with persecuted Jews will not fail; and that, in view of the increasing distress, increased help will be afforded.—Christian Herald.

CONSISTENCY.

A political paper recently made loud lamentations over the confiscation or destruction of so much valuable property invested in the liquor business in Iowa. In the same number of that paper was an account of a man who returned to his home in a drunken condition, where he found that his neglected and abused wife had been delivered of a dead child. Seizing the child, he beat the helpless mother to death with it! Oh, yes; by all means license the liquor traffic. Defend it by law; it is a "legitimate business" in its way—and its way is to make maniacs and murderers; to abuse the suffering and the helpless; to fill jails; to support criminal lawyers; to make taxpayers bear the load of criminal trials; to increase the necessity for insane asylums and the State prisons. License it, and defy the word of God, which has pronounced a curse upon he that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips. Can a man have the welfare of society at heart, and say a word in favor of the liquor traffic?—Signs of the Times (Oakland, Cal).

Polished steel will not shine in the dark; no more can reason, however refined and cultivated, shine effectively, but as it reflects the light of divine truth shed from heaven.

ELOQUENCE OF THE PASSIONS.

Cromwell was one day engaged in a warm argument with a lady on the subject of oratory, in which she maintained that eloquence could be acquired by those who made it their study in early youth, and their practice afterwards. The Lord Protector, on the contrary, maintained that there was an eloquence which sprung from the heart; since, when that was deeply interested in the attainment of any object, it never failed to supply a fluency and richness of expression, which would, in the comparison, render vapid the studied speeches of the most celebrated orators. It happened, some days after, that this lady was thrown into a state bordering on distraction by the arrest and imprisonment of her husband, who was conducted to the tower as a traitor to the government. The agonized wife, flew to the Lord Protector, rushed through his guards, threw herself at his feet, and with a most pathetic eloquence pleaded for the life and innocence of her injured husband. His highness maintained a severe brow till the petitioner, overpowered by the excess of her feelings, and the energy with which she expressed them, paused; then his stern countenance relaxed into a smile, and extending to her an order for the immediate liberation of her husband, he said, "I think all who have witnessed this will vote on my side of the question in a dispute between us the other day, that the eloquence of the heart is far above that mechanically acquired by a study."

Ancient and True, but Forgotten and Rejected.

Brother J. Richards, of Montgomery, forwards the following extract from an article in the Family Herald, which appeared forty years ago:—"There is one division of the future which is distinct from all the rest, and which seems to have had very little encouragement given to it since the world began. The Greeks and Romans knew nothing of it for natural ages; and when they first heard of it in later times, they laughed at it as the frenzy of a weak understanding. The Christians evidently began with it, but very soon rejected it entirely. The Jews also began with it, and it forms the fundamental principle of their faith; but they also cast it off, and took up the prevailing notions of the nations around them—the metaphysical abstractions of clouds and ether. This one solitary, almost unknown; and unheard-of vision of the future is, notwithstanding, the parent of European civilization. It is the germ of Judaism and of Christianity. It is the first article of faith in the history of the Church—the faith of Abraham—that the earth or the world would be given to him and his seed for ever. It does not appear that he was promised any other world than this, or had an idea of another. Moses never speaks of another, not even once, nor does he make the most distant allusion to one; but he promises an inheritance forever in this world, to the people that he brings out of bondage."

Christ the Center.

As the sun is the center of our solar system, so Christ is the Christian's sun and center of desire. As gravitation holds the planets in their proper orbits, so love holds the trusting heart in the pathway of willing obedience. As in completing the solar circuit the earth receives the pleasing variety of seasons adapted to beauty and health, and so promote all organic life, so in our loving service of Christ, there is a pleasing variety of gracious and profitable experiences. Sometimes fierce storms sweep over our pathway to drive us into the shelter of his promises of grace. Sometimes the cold, inclemencies of the world's unbelief and sin, chills us like a winter's blast, driving us to the central, steady sunlight of a Savior's constant love, causing aspirations to burst forth in the Christian's heart, and bursting buds of developing faith and love to expand into the fruits of Christian grace. But there is no winter in the sun; and he who has the sun of righteousness in his heart will have constantly the spring-time of his abiding love.

THERE seems to be a growing belief that war is imminent between Russia and England on account of the state of affairs in Afghanistan. In diplomatic and military circles the outlook is regarded of the gravest character. We live in an eventful time, which we and pray should be our motto.

THE HEBREW PROPHETS AND THE MONUMENTS.

This is the title of the last British Museum Lecture on Assyrian and Babylonian Antiquities, recently delivered by Mr. St. Chad Boscawen. The following summary of its purport may perhaps be of interest to readers of these pages:—

He commenced by saying that to understand the real importance and bearing of the Assyrian historical inscriptions upon the annals of the Jewish kings and prophets, it was necessary to grasp thoroughly the importance which Palestine derived from its geographical situation. Occupying a large portion of the seaboard of Western Asia, through which passed the road way connecting the two empires of the East—Egypt and Assyria—it was [illegible] bone of contention between these two great Powers. It was the varying supremacy, first of the African and then of the Asiatic power, which gave so much importance alike by the historical and the prophetical writings of the Jews. There were many points in these books which had hitherto been obscure, and which now, by the fresh light from the monuments became clear and valuable evidences of the historical accuracy of these writings.

It was also necessary (the lecturer said) to distinguish between the various classes of prophets which the Bible narrative brought before us. In this we were helped very considerably by the Assyrian inscriptions. The first—the man of God—occupied alike the position of priest and adviser, and corresponded to the large class of "wise men" mentioned in the Chaldean inscriptions. The association and friendship between Saul and Samuel was illustrated in a remarkable manner by the friendship and companionship of Ishdubar and Heabani. The latter warned his master of his death, interpreted his dreams, and assisted him in many of his labors, and was no doubt a representative of the seer or "wise man" who attended every Babylonian king. The schools of the prophets were common all [illegible] to Judea and Chaldea, and the [illegible] lives led by such religious prophets as Elijah and Elisha were not without a parallel in the legends of Chaldea. It was, however, when we came to the lives of such great leaders and political prophets as Isaiah and Jeremiah—men who (Mr. Boscawen said) might fitly be styled the Richelieu and Mazarin of the Hebrew kingdom—that the Assyrian monuments afforded a mass of evidence which caused us to see for the first time the vast knowledge which these men possessed of the politics and diplomacy of western Asia. It was the study of the Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions that brought out the firmness and foresight of the writings of Isaiah, and the comparison of the Book of Jeremiah with the cuneiform writings revealed to us the many bitter and pointed sarcasms of that writer.

From the time when Ahab joined the Syrian alliance against Shalmaneser III., B. C. 853, until the return of the Jews from Captivity in 537, their [illegible] now a formidable series of synchronisms between the Jewish and the monumental writings. After briefly referring to the points of contact during the twelfth and early part of the eighth century, the lecturer proceeded to show how very valuable the inscriptions were in clearing up the obscurities surrounding the siege of Jerusalem by Sargon and Sennacherib. In B. C. 722, Sargon [illegible] Samaria. The [illegible] Hezekiah [illegible] upon the throne of [illegible] Sargon [illegible] was by means of a [illegible] was finished and the [illegible] was that [illegible] Hezekiah had [illegible] to secure very nearly the [illegible] siege of Jerusalem [illegible] history of Tirhaka [illegible] Sennacherib. W. Boscawen then went on to show how it was now possible to arrange the chronology of this period [illegible] striking approximate accuracy.

We [illegible] the publication of Rawlinson's volume of Inscriptions [illegible] Assyrian Canon, [illegible] Sennacherib [illegible] Babylon [illegible] Esarhaddon [illegible] Assurbanipal [illegible] Nineveh [illegible] Nabopolassar [illegible] Nebuchadnezzar [illegible] Evil-Merodach [illegible] Neriglissar [illegible] Nabonidus [illegible] Belshazzar, the son of Nabonidus, was celebrating the marriage feast of the great Babylonian goddess. Mr. Boscawen then went on to indicate how strong a reason there was to identify Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, who was appointed Governor of Babylon, with Darius the Mede. He next proceeded to show what [illegible] new and startling insight the recently-found inscriptions gave of the character of Cyrus. Instead of the monotheist and iconoclast that we should have expected from the words of Isaiah xlvi. 1, 2, we find the conqueror appearing tolerant, and even conforming to the idolatrous creeds of Babylonia. The following passages taken from the cylinder inscription of this king would seem to be a direct contradiction to the words of the Hebrew prophet: "Merodach, the great lord, the restorer of his people, beheld with joy the deeds of his appointed one, who was righteous in hand and heart.... whose rule was beloved by Bel and Nebo, whose sovereignty they cherished according to the goodness of their heart.... In the goodness of their hearts may all the gods daily [illegible] from Bel and Nebo.' In the face of this evidence, the lecturer said, we must regard the statements of the Hebrew prophet as figurative, and consider Bel and Nebo as representing the Babylonians, of whom they were the chief deities. In concluding, Mr. Boscawen said that the resume which he had been able to put before his audience in these lectures, startling as it was in character, glowing as it was with the far-penetrating light which illuminated the obscure portion of the world's history, and brought the past, the true key to the present, within measurable distance, represented but a tithe of that golden harvest which the explorers had gathered for us beneath the dust of ages.—Messenger.

A word spoken pleasantly is a large spot of sunshine on a sad heart; and who has not felt its effects? A smile is like the bursting out of the sun behind a cloud to him who thinks he has no friend in the world.

WHERE IT BREAKS DOWN.

We supposed it would come, we knew it must come, but we did not think the time would come so soon when Max Muller would write as follows:

"Most ethnologists used to hold that, as each individual begins as a child, mankind also began as a child; and they imagined that a careful observation of the modern child would give them some idea of the character of the primeval child. Much labor has been spent on this subject since the days of Vedas and many a long book have been the result, till it was seen at last that the modern baby and the primeval baby have nothing in common but the name of human being or name.

It was chiefly due to Darwin and to the new impulse which he gave to the science of religion that this view of the matter was abandoned. Superficial [illegible] published [illegible] which [illegible] Darwin [illegible] Lubbock [illegible] represented the human baby as the child of such-and-such parents. A [illegible] on the position of this hereditas in utero genus which the great leader of Darwin's followers stream [illegible] days what should we gain by the [illegible] purpose—namely, to know the primitive state of man, the earliest beginnings of the human intellect? Our difficulties would remain exactly the same, only pushed back a little further.

Disappointing as it may sound, the fact must be faced, nevertheless, that our reasoning faculties, wonderful as they are, break down completely before all problems concerning the origin of things. We may imagine, we may believe, anything we like about the first man; we can know absolutely nothing. If we trace him back to a primeval cell, the primeval cell that could become a man is more mysterious by far than the man that was evolved from a cell. If we trace him back to a primeval pro-anthropos, the pro-anthropos is more unintelligible to us than even the prot-anthropos would be. If we trace back the whole solar system to a rotating nebula, that wonderful nebula which by evolution and revolution could become an inhabitable universe is, again, far more mysterious than the universe itself.

The lesson that there are limits to our knowledge is no old lesson, but it has to be taught again and again. It was taught by Buddha, it was taught by [illegible] taught for the celebrated hundred days in the assistance of [illegible] powerful manner [illegible] has been called [illegible] knowledge: it [illegible] truly the knowledge of our ignorance, or, to adopt the more modernate language of Kant, the knowledge of the limits of our knowledge.—F. Max Muller."

Max Muller teaches men of learning and thought a great lesson when he thus frankly tells them that evolution has no reach at its basis or beginning. We who know that God is, and that he has told us how things had their beginning, have no trouble on this subject. Max Muller well says that "our reasoning faculties break down completely before all problems concerning the origin of things." Reason cannot explain. "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God."—N. Y. Observer.

Evening Thoughts.

Time, unmindful of waning beauty, withering flowers, "hopes deferred" or human struggles for distinction, wafts us on swift and noiseless pinions to final destination.

If, with a sacred and lofty purpose, we perform our part in Life's grand drama, it is well;—if not there is no returning path, by which we may retrace our steps, or mend what we have done amiss. Time lingers not for the nature to learn what should have been gathered to the garner house of Intellect in childhood. Youth is the season in which to gather the sheaves of golden grain from earth's abundant harvest fields,

"When the harvest is past and the summer is ended" we may not sow the seeds that the neglect has left to mold. The ground work of education must be laid on a firm basis, to be lasting. It is folly to expect to finish a structure with granite, whose foundation is of cobble stones and sand.

How infinite, then, should seem the importance of improving carefully the golden moments, laden with good and blessing as they pass with arrowy swiftness, never to return! The sources of intellectual culture are as numerous, and varied as intellect itself. The earnest soul may drink at the overflowing fount of knowledge, without fear of satiety, since wisdom hath no limits, and its depths are unfathomed still. There is no climax to human acquirements. Every day develops new sources, discovers new fields, and if we have on with the speed we may, we do better.—Though there are obstacles in the way, there is no excuse for neglecting the culture of the mind. We may, at least, turn our thoughts to good account, since the thoughts are the motive power that moves the vast machinery of life.

Shall we fold our hands, and resign ourselves to hopeless imbecility because another seems to have talents or genius that we are not conscious of possessing? To complain of our want of capacity is to question the Imparitial giver!

There is no person so dangerous in society as a man with a vast, unoccupied mind. There are no so overtaxable as those old in years, and weak in understanding, while all the glorious crown which brightens age cannot decay.

[illegible] cannot wither, age cannot stale, [illegible] Riches [illegible] corroding cares and [illegible] ing the life of [illegible] reaper of Eternity; because it [illegible] fame is an empty bauble and subsist a [illegible] while [illegible] is a [illegible] the soul's [illegible] treasure worth [illegible]

It is a truth that lights up all the darkness of life's devious way. Even through the dark valley of death, up to the gates of Paradise.

Of mighty voyages over the surging billows whose fury oft threatens the trail bark with destruction, get wisdom, get understanding.

Miscellaneous.

An agriculturist at Oakland, Cal., is making a determined effort to introduce the cultivation of tea in that state. He has over 2,000 tea plants in a very thriving condition, and when they arrive at the age of four years he will obtain Japanese help and pick and cure. He does not entertain a doubt of success. Knowing [illegible] and will now [illegible] part of my travels [illegible] June January 7, 1880, for Stockton, where I met my long-lost and beloved Brother and Sister Steward. Stayed at that place over two Sundays, had some very interesting meetings, but on account of the bad weather and bad roads the attendance was not as large as two years ago. Brother Steward says that the church is in a very prosperous way and it would appear so, as they seem nearly all of them to be preachers. All of them are also instructors. I left them with the promise to return in June next. From there I went to Columbus where I visited old time friends for a few days and had a good time with them. From there I went to Mary. In [illegible] where I met with my dear old [illegible] there. She was eighty-three years old the 19th day of February, 1880. Had a very good time in the proclamation of the word. Met with my oldest brother from Ohio, who also was there on a visit. Had a good time with my relations and old time friends, brethren and sisters in the church, and in singing hymns of praise to God and the Lamb. On Saturday before the first Sunday in February, I was called on [illegible] to preach the funeral sermon of Clara [illegible], [illegible] daughter of Eli and Lucina Alspach. She was born in Perry County, Ohio, May the 1st, 1813, died January 31, 1880, aged 66 years, eight months, and 20 days. She leaves a husband, nine children and a father to mourn their loss. Thus death has laid low Brother Eli Alspach's two daughters, and a dear wife and mother to five children. Oh, how true it is,

"[illegible]
[illegible] the vapor flies,
Mankind is tender, transient flower,
Just to be trampling clay."

The funeral discourse took place in the car of Mary in the Christian church. The house was full of people of all denominations, among whom was an old Methodist clergyman who used to hear me talk about the good going to heaven at death. But when I had to tell them that Clara was in the coffin, and that she had not gone to heaven. Subject: Job's question, "If a man die shall he live again." (Job xiv. 14). Oh, what nonsense is Job's language if the real man does not live. I think that I have left a lasting impression on the minds of the thinking citizens of Mary. I had one hour and 27 minutes till train time to preach and got to the station to start for Antioch. So I bid them all good-bye and started to the station. I got on board of Nahum's chariot and whizzed away for Argos. As I landed at Argos I met my old Brother Hi Railsback. He conveyed me to his home where I met Sister Taylor and Sister Railsback,—partook of refreshments and went to the church. Here I met with quite a number of brethren and sisters. Among them was Brother and Sister Roberts, Sister Van Vactor and some of the Logan brethren, and Bro. and Sr. Cordill from Plymouth—that being the first Sunday in February. Had a good time there preaching the word of life and hearing some few of them talking of their hopes and prospects of reaching the home of the blessed, when Christ shall come.

On Monday I went to Plymouth, where I made the Editor of THE RESTITUTION a flying visit. I also met with Brother Underwood and passed a few words of cheer with him. I visited Brother A. Hersh, and our dear Bro. and Sr. Tuttle, took dinner with them, and had some good cheering words with him of the blessing of all nations through Abraham and his seed. Oh, how I long for that time to come when Christ and his bride shall take the throne and kingdom, and the regeneration and new order of things begin. In haste I bade them all adieu and left for Brother Logan's, and from there we hastened back to Antioch again and had a good time.

Next day I visited at Argos with Brother Nathan, William and Robert Railsback, and Brother and Sister Oppy and Brother and Sister Oppy are all well. That night we [illegible] in Antioch, till the northern and eastern [illegible] and left for Logan's, where I met with my dear old [illegible] there. ### CHEYNE'S TRANSLATION OF PSALM XC.

1 Lord, [illegible] shelter in [illegible] generation to age,
2 Before [illegible] the mountains were born,
or [illegible] the earth and the world were brought forth,
[illegible] [illegible] on thereof—
Thou [illegible] mortals back and say,
[illegible], Return, ye sons of [illegible]
3 For a thousand years are in thine eyes
[illegible] yesterday when it is passed, and a watch in the night.
5 Thou [illegible] of them [illegible] become as a sleep;
in the morning they are as grass which [illegible]
6 In the morning it flourishes and [illegible] again;
in the evening it is cut down and withers.
7 For we are wasted away through thine anger, and [illegible] by the wrath have we been [illegible] confounded.
8 Thou [illegible] our iniquities before thee,
our [illegible] in the shining of thy countenance.
9 For our days have all died away in thy anger,
[illegible] we bring our years to an end like a sigh.
10 The days of our years are threescore years and ten, or, if we are of full strength, then fourscore;
and their proud boasting is travail and vanity,
so quickly is it gone by, and we take our flight.
11 Who [illegible] hath learned the strength of thine anger, and, according to the fear of thee, thy fury?
12 Thus teach us to number our days,
and we shall [illegible] a wise mind in our heart.
13 Return, Jehovah, how long!
and relent over thy servants.
14 Satisfy us with thy lovingkindness in the morning, and we will give a ringing shout of joy all our days.
15 Make us to rejoice according to the days in which thou hast afflicted us, the years wherein we have seen adversity.
16 Let [illegible] be manifest to thy servants, and thy majesty unto their children.
17 And let the pleasantness of Jehovah our God [illegible] be upon us, and the work of our hands [illegible] prosper thou over us, yea, prosper thou our handiwork.

In the Cesnola Collection at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, are sundry biblical illustrations which are worthy of wider attention than they have yet received. A long Greek inscription, found at Curium, mentions the name of Quintus Cœlius Honoratus as an ἐπάρχος of Cyprus; the same title that is given to Sergius Paulus in Acts xiii. 8, 12, and which has been for generations regarded as one of the "undesigned coincidences" which so strongly evince the minute truthfulness of the Book of Acts. Though the date of Quintus Cœlius Honoratus as proconsul of Cyprus cannot be assigned. It adds one more to the very fragmentary list of the proconsuls of Cyprus. The inscription shows that he had been, or was, legatus (ἀντιστράτηγος) of the Roman people to Sicily, and also to Pontus and Bithynia.

Another of the Cesnola inscriptions, of other date than the preceding, and somewhat corrupt in its forms, shows the presence of Christianity in the middle period of the Roman Empire. It reads: "One God (there is) whose most great and glorious name helps all in need."—N. Y. Independent.

True repentance consists in the heart being broken for sin and broken from sin. Some repent, yet never reform; they resemble a man traveling in a dangerous path, who frequently starts and stops, but never turns aside.

SUNLIGHT TEACHING.

O Summer sunlight, filling earth with splendour,
And bearing beauty on thy golden wings!
We listen, as we settle in thy radiance,
To what thou teachest of celestial things.

O thou ray of light! wherever'er thou shinest
[illegible]
Within our souls may we [illegible] journey,
The God we seek [illegible] life's day!

O, pilgrims to the light! how the world would mourn then
If that which [illegible] more to grow!
[illegible]
As one [illegible] by a voice Divine!

O loyal to the [illegible]

DR. R. K. BOOTH IN EGYPT.

CAIRO, Feb. 7.—Two months have passed since I wrote you from Dresden, and we are now in Cairo. If I should send you a full narrative of our experience since that time I should require many sheets, but the events which are now passing in Egypt and the Soudan are of such great importance that I feel that I ought to send you some account of them without delay. As for the recent experiences, let it suffice to say, that after revisiting Vienna, crossing the Semmering Alps, we followed by rail the valley of the Danube to Agram, the capital of Croatia, a city of considerable local interest, but rarely visited by tourists; and then crossing the Dinaric Highlands and skirting the Province of Bosnia, we descended to Fiume, on the Adriatic, which we found to be a fine city with a fine climate. It is the only seaport of Hungary, and vast sums of money are now being expended in the improvement of the port. From this place we intended to visit the Dalmatian cities, but finding the weather unfavorable, we deferred that trip and sailed directly for Corfu, the most northern and most important of the Ionian Isles. There we had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Conkling, of New York, just as he was leaving the opposite island.

We passed two delightful weeks in this genial climate, which at this season corrieles Corfu with the verdure and fruitage of the early summer, and then sailed by Greek steamer, which was first class in all its appointments, through the Gulf of Lepanto to Corinth. The Isthmus is now crossed by the railway, which is being continued to Athens, and the work on the canal is progressing rapidly, under the management of a French company.

After two weeks in Athens, we sailed in an Egyptian steamer for Alexandria, which we reached in two days. Alexandria still presents many traces of the work of devastation wrought two years ago, and yet the rebuilding is advancing far more rapidly than I had anticipated, and when completed the result will be a very beautiful city. There is an English garrison there of two regiments, which is believed to be adequate to secure order, but I was struck with the youthful look of the troops, who seem to be regarded with no great respect by the natives.

I found Cairo a different city from what it was twenty-five years ago, the material improvements have been immense, and the blending of European luxury with the quietness of Oriental life makes its panorama one of the most interesting and effective in the world. Moreover the streets are admirably policed by the Khedive's gendarmes, and public order seems to be as perfect as in any European city. We have already made various excursions, the most interesting being the drive to the Pyramids through the long Acacia avenue. These structures seem more impressive than on my first visit, more than thirty years ago, and I cannot but feel that Piazzi Smyth had strong reason for some of his conclusions in regard to the great pile which bears the name of Cheops.

While on the ground we met the Canadian boatmen, nearly three hundred in number, who had just come down the river after piloting the British troops up to Dongola. It was most interesting to talk with these fine fellows, and they seemed heartily glad to look upon some American faces. They report the ascent of the river much more difficult than they had anticipated, much more so, in fact, than any of the Canadian rivers. I am sorry to say also that they report a good deal of sickness among the troops up the river. They lost by drowning eighteen of their number, and seem to be glad to be on their way home. But the great interest in Cairo now centers in the sad news which comes day by day from the Soudan. Probably the rumors are worse than the actual facts, but these [illegible] The standard of Mahdi rules over Khartoum, which was captured forty-eight hours before Sir Charles Wilson reached the place with a detachment of troops. The forces of the Mahdi are supposed [illegible] fifty thousand [illegible] Spain J. The [illegible] the number of loyal [illegible] cannot be at most exceed eight thousand men scattered at different points along the river, and much [illegible] large and diverse. Certainly [illegible] must be shut by [illegible] the army can extricate itself from peril.

The Khedive estimates that thirty thousand Egyptian troops have fallen victims to the encroachment of this dismal and fatal power, he is of the opinion that such a growing power of the Mahdi is stayed it will threaten not only Egypt, but India and Turkey. This is in fact, the aspect of the case which makes the present situation so threatening for England. She has certainly lost prestige immensely in Egypt, and outside of the English circle no one seems to grieve much over the fact. There are about two thousand English troops now in the city, but probably many more are on the way, and the quiet and order of the city are all that could be desired. I dare say that much of this may come to you as stale news, but on the chance of its being interesting to some of your readers I send it just as it stands.

The climate of Cairo now is simply perfect, and the new hotel where we are staying is as comfortable a home as one could desire. Just before the rise from Khartoum arrived Dr Conkling and Mr. Fleetmor, of Naples, had gone up the river in one of the Khedive's postal steamers, but all is quiet so far as their trip is likely to extend.

Beautiful Home.

What a hallowed name! How full of enchantment, how dear to the heart! Home is the magic circle within which the weary spirit finds refuge. It is the sacred asylum to which the care-worn heart retreats to find rest from the toils and inquietudes of life.

Home! that name touches every fibre of the soul and strikes every chord of the human heart, with its angelic fingers. Nothing but sin can break its spell. What tender associations are linked with home! What pleasing images and deep emotions it awakens! It calls up the fondest memories of life and opens in our nature the purest, deepest, richest gush of consecrated thought and feeling.

Some years ago some twenty thousand people gathered in the old Castle Garden, New York, to hear Jenny Lind sing as no other songstress ever had sung the sublime compositions of Beethoven, Handel, etc. At length, the Swedish Nightingale thought of her home, paused, and seemed to fold her wings for a higher flight. She began with deep emotion to pour forth "Home, Sweet Home." At once there was an uproar of applause that silenced the song. Tears gushed from those thousands like rain. Beethoven and Handel were forgotten. After a moment the song came again, seemingly as from heaven, almost angelic. Home, that was the word that bound as with a spell twenty thousand souls, and Howard Payne triumphed over the great masters of song. When we look at the brevity and simplicity of this home song, we are ready to ask, What is the charm that lies concealed in it? Why does the dramatist and poet find his reputation resting on so apparently narrow a basis? The answer is easy. Next to religion the deepest and most ineradicable sentiment in the human soul is that of the home affection. Every heart vibrates to this theme. Home has an influence which is strong-er than death. It is a law to our hearts, and binds us with a spell which neither time nor change can break. There childhood nestles like a bird which has built its abode among roses; there the cares and the coldness of earth are, as long as possible, averted. Flowers there bloom or fruits invite on every side, and there paradise could indeed be restored, could mortal power ward off the consequences of sin. This new garden of the Lord would then abound in beauty unequilled, and trees of the Lord's planting bearing fruit to his glory would be found to plant) there.

Home of my childhood! What words can utter all the emotions that swell the heart at the mention of thy name! Thou art the magic circle within which all my affections are centered. Thou art the sacred asylum to which the weary heart retreats to find rest from the toils and inquietudes of life.

Home can still be often the commission of crime is prevented by such memories. If these, the spell of home is so powerful, how important it is to make it pleasant and lovable! Many a time a cheerful home and smiling face does more to make good men and women than all the learning and eloquence that can be used. It has been said that the greatest words in our language are "Mother, home, and Heaven;" and one might almost say that the second home includes them all, for who can think of home without remembering the gentle mother who sanctified it by her presence? And is not home the dearest name for heaven? We think of that better land as a home where brightness will never end in night. Oh then may our homes on earth be the centers of all our joys! May they be as green spots in the deserts to which we can retire when weary of the cares and perplexities of life, and drink the clear waters of love which we know to be sincere and always unfailing.

Home's not merely four square walls,
Though with pictures hung and gilded:
Home is where affection calls,
Filled with sunnes the heart hath builded.
Home! go watch the faithful dove,
Sailing 'neath the heaven above us;
Home is where there's one to love!
Home is where she's one to love us!

Home's not merely roof and room,
It needs something to endear it:
Home is where the heart can bloom,
Where there's some kind lip to cheer it;
What is home without a mate
More to meet, more to greet us,
Home is sweet, and only sweet
When there's some we love to meet us.

Father and Son.

I never look to the sheep in the fold,
Now the cattle are fed and warm;
So dark tell me not to wrap you well,
You may go with me over the farm.
Though the snow is deep and the weather cold,
You are not a baby at six years old.

Two feet of snow on the hill-side lay,
But the sky was as blue as June;
And father and son came laughing home
When dinner was ready at noon—
Shaking the snow from their weary feet,
Rosy and hungry and longing to eat.

"The snow was so deep," the farmer said,
"That I feared I should scarce get through,"
The mother turned with a pleasant smile:
"Then what could a little lad do?"
"I trod in my father's steps," said Jack;
"Wherever he went I kept his track."

The mother looked in the father's face,
And a solemn thought was there,
The words had gone like a lightning flash
To the depth of a mother's care.
"If he tread in my steps," then day by day
How cheerfully I must choose my way.

"For the child will do as the father does,
And the feet be like I leave behind,
If it be firm, and clear, and straight,
The feet of my son will find.
He will tread in his father's steps and say:
'I am right, for this is my father's way.'"

Oh! fathers, leading in life's hard road,
Be sure of the steps you take:
The sons you love, soon gray haired men,
Will tread in them still for your sake,
When gray-haired men to their sons will say:
"We tread in our father's steps to-day."

I Can Let It Alone.

"I can do something that you can't," said a boy to his companion. "I can chew tobacco."

"And I can do something that you can't," was the quick reply. "I can let tobacco alone."

Now, this is a kind of a boy we love to see. The boy who has the back bone to refuse when asked to do a foolish or wicked thing is the one of whom we are proud. It is an easy matter to sail with the wind or float with the tide, and it is easy enough to form bad habits; so that none can boast over the power to do that. It is the one who can let it alone that is worthy of praise. And the best time to let tobacco alone is before the appetite for it has been formed. There is nothing inviting about it then.

Don't use it boys. It is filthy, poisonous, disgusting stuff at the best.

Be men enough to let it alone. Hold up your head and say that you are its master, and never intend to become its slave.

The Work of a Song.

I remember going to the Great Exhibition in London in 1862, and in the Roman room there was one particular piece of sculpture which I liked to see; but it was not easy to get near it, as there were so many that wanted to see it. It was really an American work, that is, it was done by American fingers, though it was in the Roman room, because it was carved in Rome. It was called, "Libit! oh, libit!"

The story was that a number of red men had made a raid into the United States, and had burned a village and tomahawked many a poor creature, and slain and quartered many more. And then they stole a little white maid. I need not tell you how the poor mother's heart was broken when she had lost her child: and there was no day, and no month, and no year, but she was pursuing the question, "Where can I find my lost child?" At last, after many years had passed, a report reaches her, "There is a white maiden among the red people yonder, nearly a thousand miles away." There was no rail, no road; but off set the mother, and she went over prairie and marsh and moor and river, and at last after many a toilsome day, she arrived where the white maiden was.

She thought, "Oh, that is my child!" The face was much altered; it had become Indianized. There was the mark that the child had come from the white race, but it was Indianized. Its language was Indian now, and the maiden had quite forgotten her mother. All her love now was given to the red squaw of the woods that had brought her up. When the mother tried to go near her, the young woman repulsed her; and the poor heart-broken mother knew not what to do.

At last, a good thought struck her. She sat down and began to sing a sweet lullaby song that she had always sung her little one to sleep with. At first she listened listlessly; but in a little while (you know how an old tune will fetch up an old thought) the maiden began to listen, and she stood as if all her soul had got into her ears. It was in that attitude that the sculptor carved her—listening; and the story went on to say that, after a little listening, it seemed as if the lullaby had unlocked the cells of old memory, and in a little while the poor maiden was in her mother's embrace.

Ah, friends, let the melodious song of Christ's love and atonement for your sins speak to your hearts, awakening in them the long-forgotten melodies of God's love! Let your Savior woo and win you back, that there may be joy in your father's house.—S. Coley.

Dear Children.

In this letter I want to give you a glimpse of a beautiful City; its name once signified, "perfect peace," for a King who was Priest of the Most High God, King of righteousness, and King of peace, dwelt there. Soon after this it was occupied by a wicked people, whose name signifies, "Those who tread under foot." Most of it was given to the tribe of Judah in the time of Joshua, and the sweet singer of Israel who was of this tribe, told his warriors if one among them could climb the wall, and take the tower he should be the captain of his army, this was accomplished, and from this it took its name, which was "The city of the beloved." In this famous city was born a Savior, which is Christ the Lord. While he sojourned here, he wept over it, knowing it would soon become a scene of terrible desolation, not even one stone left on another, and for hundreds of years, he trodden down under the feet of the Gentiles, and become heaps upon heaps. The ruin of many generations, because they had killed the prophets, and stoned them whom God had sent. But there is a time to break down, and a time to build up, "a time to cast away, and a time to gather again, and the time is very near when Jehovah will say to his chosen City, which now seems to be asleep," Awake, awake, put on thy strength, arise, stand up, shake thyself from the dust, put on thy beautiful garments, for glorious things are spoken of thee, thou City of God, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is this City of the Great King, a City of truth, a City of righteousness and faithfulness, no tempest will ever be able to shake her sure foundation, which will be laid with gems of exquisite brightness, for from that day, she shall be called, "The Lord is there," for his throne shall be established in her. No evil doer will be permitted to live there, but the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and all the kings of the earth will bring their glory and honor into it. The flowing river of life will make glad this peaceful City of God, and on both sides of this river will bloom again the Tree of Life, and the leaves will be for the healing of the nations. Then it will be called, New Jerusalem, for God hath declared, I will make all things new. For the things which exist will pass away, and be remembered no more. It is also testified of this holy beloved city that boys and girls will play in the streets, and none shall make them afraid, also old men and old women resting on a staff for very age, shall dwell in the streets thereof. Dear children, each one of you can stand within her gates, in the glorious Day of the Lord, by walking in the narrow way which leadeth unto life, it is only the obedient who will have right to the tree of life, when a glorious song will be sung. "We have a strong City, salvation will God appoint for walls, and bulwarks. Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in." Remember the sweet prayer which Jesus taught. "Thy kingdom come."

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

The Unfailing One.

He who hath led, will lead
All through the wilderness;
He who hath fed will feed;
He who hath blessed will bless;
He who hath heard thy cry
Will never close His ear;
He who hath marked the faintest sigh
Will not forget thy tear.
He loveth always, faileth never;
He rest on him to-day, forever!

He who hath made thee whole
Will heal thee day by day;
He who hath spoken to thy soul
Hath many things to say;
He who hath gently taught
Yet more will make thee known;
He who so wondrously hath wrought
Yet greater thing will show.
He loveth always, faileth never;
He rest on him to-day, forever!
—Frances Ridley Havergal.

The problems of Christianity may seem great and deep; but the problems of unbelief are greater and deeper still. And not the least problem is the impossibility of answering the question, "Shall I find elsewhere any real peace or rest of soul, if I leave Christ? To whom shall I go? Where in all the world shall I find a more excellent way than that of faith in Jesus? Where is the personal friend who will supply his peace?" Give me a thousand times rather the old evangelical Christianity, with all its difficult facts and doctrines,—the incarnation, the atonement, the resurrection, the ascension,—than the cold, barren creed of the Socinian or the deist, or the shoreless negations of modern unbelief. Give me the religion of texts and hymns and simple faith, which satisfies thousands, rather than the dreary void of speculative philosophy, which thoroughly satisfies none.—Bishop Ryle.

[illegible] AT VIENNA.

The tender longing of loved and loving friends to lie together in their last long sleep is deeply affecting and full of significance. Some days ago the writer spoke the last words over the coffined remains of a man which had been brought back for burial to his former home—a journey of nearly four thousand miles. It was his wish to sleep beside his father and mother, that they might arise together in the morning of the resurrection. And it had been the desire of the parents that their scattered children should be brought together at the last and rest side by side in the same burial-place. A sorrowing wife had accompanied the lifeless body of her loved one on the long and lonely journey to his grave. On the same train six widows each with the remains of a husband, on their way to the burial place of their Eastern homes. Oh the tender, pathetic yearning of loving hearts for companionship even in the grave—how it speaks of deathless love and immortality!

The pilgrim at his journey's end needs but little room and little care. "Man's final requirement of man is a grave." This is the terminal point of the pilgrimage of the body until a new order of things shall begin. We are all on our way there. The shadow lies along the whole way of life.

"From the stars of heaven, and the flowers of earth,
From the pageant of power, and voice of mirth;
From childhood's song and affection's vow,
From all we love that ever which the soul hath sung,
Breathes but one word—Passing away!"

But the grave is only the halting-place. It is an inn where the tired traveler sleeps until the morning. He lies down in hope, with the love-fire unquenched and the blossom and fruit of grace untouched by decay. Very touching and very beautiful in its truth and its simplicity is the following epitaph on the crumbling tombstone of a dear one in the rural cemetery of our childhood's home: "A little while he shall lie in the ground, as the said lies in the bosom of the earth, but he shall be raised again, and shall never die any more" Twenty-five years ago this was graven in the marble over the dear one's grave, and still he sleeps on. But it is written in the word, "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." And the poet sweetly sings the same hope that speaks in the words of the epitaph and the Book:

"Beyond the smiling and the weeping,
Beyond the waking and the sleeping,
Beyond the sowing and the reaping,
I shall be soon.

Beyond the parting and the meeting,
Beyond the farewell and the greeting,
Beyond this pulse's fever-beating,
I shall be soon.
Love, rest and home!
Sweet hope!
Lord, tarry not, but come!"
—Evangelical Messenger.

HOLINESS.

Some pray for holiness as if it were something entirely apart from their every-day life, something that had nothing to do with their conduct in their domestic, social and business relations. They sing, "Nearer my God to Thee," with glowing fervor, but never think that the prayer can be answered only by the uplifting of their own lives to the plane of God's requirements. Holiness is not a mere sentiment, not a vague vision of glory overhanging us like a silver cloud, not a rapture nor an ecstasy, not something that God sends down to wrap us like a garment in its radiant folds. If being holy means anything at all, it means being true, honest, upright, pure, gentle, patient, kind and unselfish. We really have no more religion than we get into our every day practice. Wherein our devotion is higher than our living, it counts for nothing.—S. S. Times.

Communications.

AUGUSTA, WIS.

Sister Wilkinson:—

If your health and that of your daughter will permit it, I desire to renew our controversy on the Sabbath question.

There may be no occasion for it: for it may be just possible, that you have in your wisdom, changed your views in the matter.* If such is the case, I congratulate you, and admire your judgment. I think that the Sabbath question is one of the easiest of solution in the field of controversy; if we will let evidence silence our opinions. Let us cease to put our constructions upon evidence adduced from the word: and then we are in a position where we can learn; or receive evidence unprejudiced, and be gainers thereby. To illustrate—The Bible says: "Shall mortal man be more just than God?" We argue from the phrase, mortal man, that man is wholly mortal; subject to death, etc. But our opponents demur, and put a construction of their own on the phraseology of our proof text, and say;—"that only has reference to the BODY," "it does not refer," say they, "to our immortal souls, that cannot die!" So you see, those switches, we have got to tear up all along the track of truth, and let the witnesses testify by their own words: and we must be shy of man's constructions of them. Again: when we show, from the word, in these same opponents that "souls die," they have a switch ever ready to run their theological engine on; to avoid a total wreck from the advancing car of truth. That does not mean, say they, 'our deathless spirits!' Then we quote: "yea they (man and beasts) have all one spirit; as one dieth so dieth the other"—Side Track—"That means the breath, the air we breathe and not that part of God that he breathed into man when he made his body, or house, out of dust; and thus you see that we have to tear up these side-tracks, switches, turn-tables and all; and run the engine of truth on the main line, viz., by showing, by the witness's own language that man—house and all—in death "hath no pre-eminence above a beast; as one dieth so dieth the other." "That the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not any thing." "Like sheep they are laid in the grave—Sheol." "Their sons come to honor and they know it not." That his breath goeth forth, in that very day his thoughts perish," etc. The same line of side-tracks are erected on the kingdom line of truth; and precisely the same switches are erected for convenience, by Sabbatarians, on the law and Sabbath question. The different switches are known as, "That is ceremonial." "That is carnal." "That is sacrificial." That is moral, etc., etc., at the option of the conductor who runs the train; and thus making a number of laws; whereas the witnesses know of but one, thus:—"The law of the Lord is perfect." "Think not that I am come to destroy the law." "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified." "And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord; as it is written in the law of the Lord,—and to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord."

You will here see that the law of Moses and the law of the Lord, are identical, i. e. one and the same law, not two laws. Now stand up. No switching here. The switch is gone! Keep the track and all is safe: but to switch is ruin!

"Moral law" and "ceremonial law," are alike unknown in Bible phraseology! These are theological conductors' terms.

"Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel with the statutes and judgements." Mal. iv. 4. Here we have it in a nut shell. (1) "The law of Moses." (2) "Which I commanded." (3) "At Horeb." (4) "For all Israel." This law here called the law of Moses, must have been the Ten Commandments? for, (1) The connection says; "With the statutes." (2) "And judgments" are adjuncts to the law commanded in Horeb; and is here called the law of Moses.

Now sister be candid. Give me just one text to show where ever any Gentile was ever required to keep the Ten Commandments, unless circumcised, and end this controversy.

I would like to help you free yourself from this yoke of bondage: "For if righteousness comes by the law, then Christ died in vain." "For cursed is he that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them." This was written long after the crucifixion: so no switching here! There are no switches from the cross, i. e., on this side of the cross. For all the law, except the Ten Commandments, was nailed to the cross according to the statements of those theological conductors. Therefore, Paul must have referred to the Ten Commandments when he says, 'the law is not of faith;' 'ye are not under the law;' 'by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified;' apart from the law a righteousness of God hath been manifested; the book of the law, etc. "For he would not talk so about an abolished law," you write me. So you see that you are caught in your own trap.

"For if there could have been a law given" says Paul, "that could have given life (from the dead) verily righteousness would have been by the (that) law." The law of the Ten Commandments could not give that life even when it was obeyed.

It never promised it. This is all that was ever promised to them to whom it was given: "If ye will obey my voice indeed and keep my covenant, then ye shall be unto me a peculiar treasure above all (other) people,—ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, a holy nation." Ex. xix. 5, 6. One of the precepts of that Jewish law says; "Honor thy father and mother." Why? "That thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Nothing promised but long days in the land. Therefore, as Paul says, righteousness could not be by such a law: "But now," he says, "apart from the law a righteousness of God hath been manifested." (R. V.). The gospel is that righteousness manifested. Paul says that it (the gospel) is now, "the power of God unto salvation." Be it known unto you therefore men and brethren, that through this man (not Moses, nor yet the law), "is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by him (not the law) all that believe"—that the law is binding? No. Believe the gospel of the kingdom, see Acts xiii. 23.—"Are justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses." Acts xiii. 38, 39.

Here we rest our case for the present: hoping that the spirit of your mind may be enlightened.

Now dear sister, do not ignore these plain Scripture statements: but weigh them in the light of enlightened reason in connection with facts, and a reliance upon the Son of righteousness to shine in and enlighten the inner man to the exclusion of the traditions and commandments of men. Become an heir by faith to the eternal inheritance, which is incorruptible and fadeth not away. May God bless and save you by faith through Christ, is my prayer.

"COME UNTO ME." Matt. xi. 28.

Jesus is waiting to welcome the weary,
Worn with the world's fruitless striving for peace,
Tired with a night-watch that knoweth no morning,
Sick with a heart-ache that earth cannot ease.

Jesus is waiting—He stretches and beckons,
Calling in love upon each one oppressed—
"Come unto Me, sinner, weary and lonely,
I will refresh you, and give you My rest.

"Long have you striven to find it without Me,
Sought it in feelings, manhood, and pride;
These have all failed you, and still you are restless,
Seeking to purchase what nought can obtain.

"Will you not come? You need no preparation,
Stay not to think, but come just as you are—
Bring nothing with you, for love gives freely—
Peace—perfect peace—that no sorrow can mar.

"Doubting and trembling one, can you not trust Me?
Able to save you through every ill,
Able to lead you through conflict to glory,
Able to say to life's storm, 'Peace, be still!'

"Oh! I am yearning to see you unbuttoned,
Death did I suffer that you might be free:
Will you not come? and by consecration
Try to win others, and bring them to Me?"

THE REVEALING OF THE SONS OF GOD.

"For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God."—Rom. viii. 19.

That a time is coming when the sons of God, at present in disguise, shall stand forth unveiled in a glory befitting their divine relationship; and that all creation is waiting with eagerness for that time to come: these are manifestly two thoughts contained in this remarkable Pauline sentence. The context brightens both thoughts immensely; for it shows in the first place that the revelation of the sons of God will consist in their public manifestation in redeemed bodies, bright with immortal glory; and it shows in the next place, that the eager outlook of creation for this coming event is owing to a community of interest, or fellowship of fortune, between man and the lower world—that creation, existing for man, bound up with man, as a consequence with man suffers, and as a further consequence, with man is destined to be delivered. These thoughts, separately and combined, claim a closer investigation.

I. The revelation of the sons of God, as here set forth, stimulates inquiry in two or three directions.

Perhaps the first point to challenge attention is this: that the sons of God are named where we might have looked for the Son of God alone to be mentioned. If it had been said that creation was waiting for the revealing of the Son of God, we could at once have seen reason for it. He is creation's Maker, Preserver, and King. His hand fashioned it at first; he holds it together still. If creation has been smitten with vanity, and fettered with corruption, and filled with anguish and unspeakable longings—this ill-fortune has not befallen her without his permission. Hence, as he has undertaken to redeem man, it seems a fitting extension of his liberating work that he should set man's world free from its chains; and so, though we might have seen a bold figure in it,—had we read here of creation's sighing for the revelation of the Son of God,—it would have appeared but a peculiarly beautiful expression of a truth with which we were otherwise familiar. But it is not so. On the contrary, it is the revelation of the sons,—the many sons, the many generations of sons,—for whose revealing creation waits. Hence, as we know their revelation depends on him, and will be simultaneous with his own, and that he in fact will be the great Liberator,—we are led to infer a well-ordered method in his work. He, so to speak, hides himself behind them, until they are ready for the great unveiling. For some reason it is not proper that he should deliver creation until he has glorified them; and it may even be that he intends in some way to employ them in the work of striking off creation's chains. At all events, we do elsewhere learn that they are to bear the image of him who is a life-giving Spirit; which conducts us to the surmise that even they shall to some degree be endowed with the power of making alive.

The next thing that strikes us is the medium by which the sons of God are to be revealed. They are to be revealed through the medium of their redeemed and glorified bodies: "Waiting for our adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body." The "redemption"—a word happily chosen, as expressive of both the resurrection of the dead and the transformation of the living. "Our adoption"—and yet we are adopted already. Hence, this adoption for which we wait, will be our public adoption; even as in ancient Rome it was the custom that when a man had privately adopted a son, he afterwards publicly owned him before the citizens on the forum. God has already made us his sons, and put the spirit of adoption into our hearts, and is training us to become imitators of him in all gracious and beneficent ways as children beloved. But this is not enough. This may be realised, and oppressive poverty, grinding toil, deforming ugliness, much infirmity of spirit, and much misunderstanding and ill usage from men, remain. And our Father means not to let it continue indefinitely. He has something nobler and grander in view. He intends to do what he can do for the body as well as for the mind. He means to strip us of these rags of mortality, and to clothe us with beautiful, strong, spirit-ruled bodies; which shall serve as luminous transparencies and perfect organisms for our spirits. He purposes, when he has gathered his sons, to set them forth in attraction and demonstration, as if to say to all this lower, race-ruined world: "These are my sons; this is what I mean by adoption." What a revelation will that be! of hidden graces, and spirit conquests, and heroic histories, and possible elevations; of individual diversities also, and of family likeness, and it may be, of unexpected numbers. All the sons of God, and all generations, are to be revealed together.

In such a connection how the word "revealing" is enhanced in force. Mental and moral beauty will shine forth through physical beauty. True nobleness, oft now concealed by homely and unbefitting attire and by an ungainly form and marred features, shall then be written on the brow and give dignity to the whole outer man. Patience and meekness and goodness and courage and purity—all the elements of character which God loves—will find special and suitable and patient manifestation by means of the perfected mechanism and eloquent features of the glorified bodies of the sons of God. For their bodies are to reveal them, to be such as become their relationship to the God of beauty and power, to be expressive of the divine love lavished upon them, to be demonstrative of the honor to which they are heirs.

It is difficult to form any definite conception of the effectiveness of the coming disclosure. Perhaps we might bring our thoughts of it to a focus, by reverting to the appearances of Jesus our Lord in the interval between his death and resurrection. Imagine those appearances to have been as unreserved and open as they were probably restrained and certainly select. But no!—we cannot conceive what the results of such an unveiling as that would have been in Judæa and in Galilee. That manifestation alone must have brought life in the Holy Land to such a crisis as history has never known. But here we are not with the thought of a revelation of which our Lord, though supreme, will be only one of myriads. As a mere effort of the imagination—not wholly vain, seeing it is trying to appreciate a divinely assured prospect—we might perhaps ask ourselves what would be the physical, social, moral, political, and spiritual consequences if the sons of God of all ages were even now, robed in their immortal bodies, hovering on the outskirts of this lower world; concealed from all eyes until some decisive moment should arrive and a commanding word be passed through their invisible ranks; and then, the veil be rent, possibly not to disclose one collective host, but numberless detachments bursting in among men on earth at various points, or innumerable individuals making isolated visits, say one to every dwelling, each manifestation being more or less demonstrative, each visitant leaving a trail of light behind him. Would there be no wailing babes soothed to peaceful slumbers? No cripples suddenly endowed with power to walk? No features of despair lit up with wonder and unwonted hope? True! most true!—that every eye shall see Him; but true also that if not every eye shall see every one of them, still they too shall be seen; for "when Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also with him be manifested in glory." And, perhaps, if we made a more definite effort to conceive of the power exerted by the revelation of the sons of God, we might. Such kind according as it is capable. All these have been sufferers through sin. And to all these (the finally impenitent excepted) shall refreshment redound from the glory of the children of God. Upright heathens are by no means to be excluded from this earnest expectation: nay, perhaps something of it may at times be found in the rairest of many who (although in the hurry of life they mistake vanity for liberty, and partly exile, partly dissemble their groans, yet) in their sober, quiet sleepless, afflicted hours, pour forth many sighs in the ear of God." The finally impenitent excepted," as the parallelism of the next line shows, "flee clothing is of wrought gold." Something in the same style is the discovery of the perpetual virginity of the blessed mother of our Lord, in the description of the spouse of Solomon's Song, as, "a garden enclosed, a spring shut up, a fountain sealed," and also in the gate of Ezekiel's visionary temple, which should for ever remain shut, "because Jehovah the God of Israel hath entered in by it." Such uses of Scripture must be pronounced, on all sound critical principles, as trivial and baseless as the finding of a priestly crumble in the cloak left behind by St. Paul at Troas, and clear candles in the lights of the upper chamber at the same place, not to be preached to the disciples until midnight; and of a divine model of ritual for Christian worship in the ceremonial symbolism of the celestial temple evidently borrowed from Jewish customs.—Messenger.

Editorial.

Some people estimate the ability of a periodical and the talent of its editor by the quantity of its original matter. It is comparatively an easy task for a fluent writer to string out a column of words upon an, and all subjects. His ideas may be in one weak, wishy-washy flood, and the command of his language may enable him to string them together like beaches of onions, and yet his paper may be but a meagre and poor concern. Indeed, the mere writing part of editing a paper is but a small portion of the work. The care, the time employed in selecting, is far more important, and the fact of a good editor is better shown by his selections than anything else; and that, we know, is half the battle. But we have said, an editor ought to be estimated, his labor understood and appreciated, by the general conduct of his paper—its tone, its uniform, consistent course, aims, meanings, its dignity and its propriety.—Courier Journal.

Learn to entwine with your prayers the small cares, the trifling sorrows, the little wants of daily life. Whatever affects you—be it a changed look, an unkind word, a wrong, a wound; a demand you cannot meet, a sorrow you cannot disclose—turn it into prayer and send it up to God. Disclosures you may not make to man, you can make to the Lord.

BASELESS INTERPRETATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

Beginning with the common case of reading doctrines into passages where no legitimate construction can possibly find them, we will take, first, the great doctrine of life and immortality brought to light in the gospel. In spite of the certain fact that this doctrine was mysteriously held back in the earlier revelation till near its close, our modern expositors are constantly forcing it out of Old Testament texts. When Korah's rebellious company were buried alive by the earth yawning under their feet, the simple phrase which describes them as going down "alive into the pit," is compelled to yield the preposterous sense that their disembodied souls passed on into Hades. When a parent in the olden time spoke of going down to his son in the grave, or a patriarch or a king was said to be gathered to his fathers, we are asked to strain the language so as to make it imply a conscious reunion in the world of spirits. Because Josiah was told that he should be spared, by his death, from seeing the calamities coming on his people, the inference is drawn that news from the upper world does not penetrate the abode of the departed. From Isaiah's saying that the righteous rest in their beds, each one who on earth had lived uprightly, the heading expositors take occasion to expatiate on the moral energy of the disembodied saints. The Preacher's saying that when man dies the breath returns to God who gave it, instead of being taken as simple meaning in his month the reverse of the original creative process, is turned into a proof of the true, but not distinct, doctrine of man's continued personal existence in a future world.

Belonging to the same category as the extreme mystical interpretation of Solomon's Song, is the direct application to the Christian Church of the Oriental imagery employed by the Hebrew psalmists and prophets to clothe their expectations of the future triumphs of Israel. Thus, the martial prediction—"I will render double unto thee, when I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as a sword of a mighty man"—is gravely explained to mean the mission of the apostles, as arrows shot forth from Jerusalem by the bow of Christ, to preach the gospel to the heathen world. So again, the use of a feminine word in the noble processional psalm, probably in reference to the choirs of women in the sacred processions of Israel, has led to the passage, "The Lord gave the word; great was the company of the preachers," being interpreted of the part that devout women should sustain in the first planting of Christianity. Many persons must have heard the fictional holiness of the church deduced from the words, "The king's daughter is all glorious within;" yet the obvious meaning is merely that inside the chamber the royal bride is gifted, splendidly dressed, as the parallelism of the next line shows, "Her clothing is of wrought gold." Something in the same style is the discovery of the perpetual virginity of the blessed mother of our Lord, in the description of the spouse of Solomon's Song, as, "a garden enclosed, a spring shut up, a fountain sealed," and also in the gate of Ezekiel's visionary temple, which should for ever remain shut, "because Jehovah the God of Israel hath entered in by it." Such uses of Scripture must be pronounced, on all sound critical principles, as trivial and baseless as the finding of a priestly crumble in the cloak left behind by St. Paul at Troas, and clear candles in the lights of the upper chamber at the same place, not to be preached to the disciples until midnight; and of a divine model of ritual for Christian worship in the ceremonial symbolism of the celestial temple evidently borrowed from Jewish customs.—Messenger.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New Year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must have the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. A any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but ask right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER

When sending your remittances that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty five to forty cents to collect such one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

OBITUARY.

AYLING—In Windham, Ont., Canada, Feb. 18th, 1885, Mary Ann Ayling, beloved wife of Brother Harvey Ayling, fell asleep in Jesus, aged 68 years, nine months and three days.

Sister Alying was born in the south of England, and raised up in the English Church. Twenty-eight years ago, she and her amiable companion left their native country and home with their children, for Canada, and located in the Township of Windham, where they have spent their days happily together until death first ernest upon the scene and severed the union for a time.

Her disease was cancer in the stomach, and for two years her sufferings were at times severe, but they were borne with Christian patience.

Nineteen years have rolled away, since the writer first became acquainted with her, and her husband. And from that time, until sickness prostrated her, she was one of his hearers when preaching in that vicinity, and after a thorough investigation she embraced the truth, in love, as held and taught by him. And on the 19th day of June, 1884, the day subsequent to our annual meeting in that vicinity, she was immersed by him into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. And on the 30th day of last December, she eat the memorial supper with four of us, at her own home, for the last time, with the full assurance that our next meeting and feast would be at the general gathering to enjoy that feast which the Lord of hosts will make unto all people—a feast of fat things—a feast of wine on the lees well refined, and swallow up death in victory and wipe away tears from off all faces, and take the rebuke off of his people—Israel.

Sister Ayling was an intelligent English lady—a true disciple of Jesus of Nazareth; a valuable member of the Church of God; an excellent wife, a good mother, and a kind neighbor, and respected by all who knew her; as the large audience, which was composed of Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Church of England, with a sprinkling of Universalists and infidels, and a few of our own faith, gave evidence by assembling in the Methodist meeting-house, which was freely opened and every seat filled and many standing in the aisles, who listened with deep interest, as the falling tears testified, to a discourse of an hour's length, delivered by the writer—predicated upon 1 Thess. iv. 13-18 and when through, it was said, more than half of them were in tears, and after they had taken their last look upon her, in her lifeless state, then we laid her aside to rest "in the dust" until Jesus shall come to raise her out of her death state, and all those whom the Father has given to him. Amen.

H. V. REED.

"To be Christ's disciple is ennobling. When we walk in his footsteps we ascend the scale of humanity. If we keep our eyes on our Leader we must needs go on towards perfection.

Change of Address.

Brother Daniel Howard has moved to Hot Springs, Ark. His correspondents, take notice of this.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, MARCH 25, 1885. NO. 12.

THE RESTITUTION.
TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.
Address all letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the actual "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel, repentance and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

The Apostles' Creed. Par Excellence, the Creed of Lurkistandom.

The oldest, most comprehensive, and generally accepted expression of the teachings by Jesus and his apostles, as enclosed in the New Testament; and (in the form) owned by the church."

Brother Geo. B. Arnold's first in the series on this creed, in "the Church of the Blessed Hope," was noticed in THE RESTITUTION. The second was on "I believe Christ his only begotten Son,—his birth, and life—death and burial. The third his descent into Hell (Hades) in the light of Revelation and all reason; and his resurrection the third day."

The fourth his ascension to "the right hand of the Father Almighty." It is enough to voice the words of the church to say that we were profoundly impressed, and "enriched up" in the faith. As the columns of THE RESTITUTION are over crowded, the salient points, and the omissions of what are now the prevailing topics of the pulpits and press, may be noted. The occasion demands the utmost effort to secure attention to these "foundations" of the Christian faith. "The gospel of God"—like the record of Creation—is sublime in its simplicity. Its leading lines give the outline and landmarks of all truth; and this truth is grouped in terms in entire accord with the fundamental facts—known and read of all men, as to birth, life and death! The history of Jesus was as real as it was personal, like that of [redacted] worthies.—It is given in accord with death, burial and ascension.

[redacted] honored [redacted] thies, [redacted] The record, however, [redacted] died in the faith"—[redacted] better resurrection." Those two who did "not see death" encourage faith in those who shall be alive and remain at Christ's coming." Note! When God wanted those two grand old worthies away from earth, he took them in their entire humanity. As he will those who shall be alive, at the resurrection of the just. God deals with each one, in their personality—never with their breath, or body, separately. Hence David fell on sleep—and saw corruption Acts xiii. 36; David is both dead and buried—is not ascended to heaven, Acts ii. 29, 34. And with all of like precious faith, who "have not received the promise—will be raised to incorruption, eternal life." Thus, Daniel, though delivered to his foes, for the den of lions, was delivered in the most complete integrity of his personality. On this line of personal history Jesus was crucified, dead and buried; and on the third day he was raised from the dead! He ascended into heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty; whence he will come again.

Divested of theological and mystical error the creed is plain. He did not die and go to heaven; but was buried in Joseph's new tomb—the third day rose again and after forty days he ascended, as our great high priest into heaven, the antitype of the Holy of Holies, in the ancient temple; and sits at the right hand of God. At his coming again, the risen and translated saints will ascend to meet him in the air, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 18. But now death holds them in the grave—Hades, where in death Jesus was) till the resurrection! The word for grave (hell) occurs over sixty times. Over thirty times it is in English rendered grave from the Hebrew Old Testament, and from the Greek New Testament ten times. It indicates the place of the dead and is not confounded with "Gehenna," or the doom of the wicked, prior to the judgment.

"The crown of life" is never compared to, at, or with death—the negation of life; but always with the resurrection from death, to the life eternal. The terms teach the facts as to this life—its loss in death, (in sheol), hades or the grave, the place and state of the dead) the resurrection is life immortal in the kingdom. They mark the leading facts and realities of the Just One, as to his high life, death resurrection and ascension—giving the course of the many brethren, of whom He is the first born. He having in birth and all things the pre-eminence. In contrast: the fanciful imaginary notions of the heathen philosophy as to immortal mortals.—The first must alive in death Paradise in the grave, (hades)—ascension to God and glory, while yet in the tomb, and disclaiming their delusive origin. And their aim to mislead: like ye shall not surely die." nor be dead if you do! In the apostles' creed we have the leading features of the Christian system as to Christ—to man and redemption. In the other, the anti-Christian system—the artillery that beguiled Eve—and the state of the whole world (that) lieth in the wicked one." 1 John v. 19.

The value of opportunity, of a good text and a good backing to start with, is well known. Hence some who know and repeat only "the apostles' creed" may be led through that to believe the Bible. The facts and terms embodied in both, have alike significance and reality to faith in both. Of course it is well to avail ourselves of all good opportunities to "save some;" for it is only of "grace through faith" that even some are save to be saved—evil destroyed, all will be again "very good." Amen.

J. B. COOK.

The Parable of the Ten Talents, so-called (Lit. Ten Mani one) and its Significance.—Luke xix. 12-27.

Of course in this parable Christ is speaking of himself. He is that "certain man," that "well-born" one. Observe there are "ten bond-servants" and "ten mnai." The numerical significance in each case is "conjunctive" or the union of two series—one series full and another begun. So far as persons are concerned then the representatives of the old order complete and positional value established in the new. So far as things are concerned the value of the old complete and a positional value established in the new—and the exhortation is unto practical utility. "Use (not "occupy" there is too much of that in so-called religion) until I come." Use what? Use the mnai entrusted to you. But what does the mnai stand for? The particular talent God has entrusted you with I hear you say, for that is the common interpretation of this parable. Well, first to how the absurdity of translating the word talent (mna) by the English word talent. The mnai was equal to one hundred drachmae and sixty mnai was equal to one talent. The translators come within six thousand of a true estimation of value. But the true estimate is ten times ten "hundreds" a very significant and interesting ratio to any student of weights and measures and the numerical types.

There is a still deeper meaning and teaching however than either of these. The word mna is a very old word and is the root of the word which in later times came to be developed in the structural progress of the language into the word meaning to remember or to seek to keep in mind or to recall to mind, viz., mnaomai old form mnaomai primitive meaning to seek, to woo, to think much of seeking, to keep such an object in view or in mind, derivitively thus to remember.

This natural law of humanity, that necessitates the constant remembrance or keeping in mind of objects of valuable acquisition in the experience of life, explains the frequent exhortation of Scripture "to remember," "to meditate," "to be watchful and wakeful," "to think," etc. Then how significant the special exhortation, "This do in remembrance of me until I come." Do what? Why, partake in common of the one broken loaf and the one cup. What is the object in view? It is a reminder we are told. Of what? Of the teaching this symbolized. What do you wear a wedding ring for? It is a reminder is it not? Any other significance attached to it would be looked upon from the standpoint of enlightened intelligence as superstition or nonsense. So of this mna with which Christ has entrusted you in his Father's name. It is not so much our talent or natural ability to do something with which we are entrusted, as our "high calling in Christ Jesus" which should be a constant reminder of a sacred trust. From the very nature of the trust, a spiritual one, any apprehension of its utility or ability to use it inheres in a constant and truthful remembrance of the nature and conditions of the trust.

Christ emphasizes this in John vi. 55, where he is teaching the true import of the Lord's supper.

"For eating in a truthful way is my flesh and drinking in a truthful way is my blood," (the common translation of this passage is an utter perversion of the true meaning). How can one eat and drink in a truthful way without thought and reflection: and how can one think and reflect without "calling to mind?" And in calling to mind it is of the utmost importance that one present to the judicial reason the facts, not hypotheses in any case. For "faith is a hypostasis" not a hypothesis. That which is to be kept in mind is God's word and God's truth not man's nor man's misapprehension of that which he supposes to be truth.

The constant effort of apostasy is to keep in mind "wicked suppositions" and "false philosophy," in short what God pronounces "lies." Christ-like this man to his bond-servants will say to each one of us, What have you done in remembrance of me? Into what utility have you put my word and my teaching? What have you to show for the trust? "Ye know that I would require" it? "My word shall not return unto me void." Where is the interest? where the utility? I ate it and drank it and received an "extreme unction" of "the real presence." Well, but did it "strengthen you to every good word and work?" Where are the friends you were to make "in the use of the mammon of unrighteousness" even? Where are the widow and orphan to rise up and thank you? I didn't remember it that way, I remembered to keep it clean away in a napkin," hid from the knowledge of men—hid in a so-called "mystery." It was risky to put it to use. I was afraid I would lose my hold of the principal. I was afraid God's word might be lost in the busy marts of men if allowed to go out in its simplicity as "naked" truth. I forgot that it was "a living word," and like "the naked seed," would clothe itself in "due time" "after its kind," not with a rag of formalism or "a mystery of iniquity" but in living truth and beauty as God "hath willed." Hear and heed the answer and the "verdict" already promised upon such "remembrance" and such "excuses." "Take away from him the mna (mnai) and give it to the one who hath ten mnas. For I say unto you that unto the one who hath there will have been given, but from the one who hath not will have been taken even that which he hath." What is "that which he hath?" What was it in this case? Anything that belonged to the person whose received it? No. It was a trust and a trusteeship. After taking it away from him what was done with it. It was given to another who had shown himself "trustworthy." Could it be the individual life and the characteristic "talents" which inhere therein, as commonly interpreted? Could one individual life be transferred to another individual? No, it is the "crown of rejoicing" which "those who are accounted worthy" are to receive "at his coming." "See to it that no one take your crown."

In the eleventh verse of this chapter we find this statement, "And while they were listening to these things (previous teachings) he added to speak a parable because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and they thought that the kingdom of God was going to be manifested straightway."

The parable then was designed to teach the nature, character and time of the kingdom, and not the conditions of life and death. All who become candidates for the trusteeship "of the high calling in Christ Jesus" "have passed from death unto life," and the whole argument of this parable is based upon the supposition that this fact is understood.

It is a preliminary trial of "called out ones" to test their value in the matter of the sacred trust, and looks forward to a larger sphere of usefulness for those who are found competent and "trustworthy." And the value that the one so entrusted is to keep constantly before him "in remembrance" is not himself nor his own "talents" at all, but the divinely appointed utility in use of that with which he is intrusted. He is not to be "an original thinker" so-called, running off fancy free in the realms of speculative thought, but actuated by a practical every day sense of duty and responsibility, he is to be constantly keeping in mind his sacred trust, how to invest it to the best advantage, and how it may be earning the most in the way of interest or profit to the "satisfaction" of his Lord, and above all things "keeping in remembrance" the all important fact that this Lord whom we serve "for the Lord's sake," and whose trustees we are now in what he denominates a very smallest or "least" thing compared with "the things to be," has gone to receive these things to be, namely a kingdom, and "in due time" will return: moreover that one of the first events attending his return will be "to have a reckoning" with his own "bond-servants," Peter and Paul and John and you, my brother, if you have the spirit of Christ.

What for? To determine whether they or you are going to be finally saved or not? No. To be judged according to your works, and to determine your worth, and to assign you to a sphere of usefulness and honor befitting the character and capability you have already shown. As John says you have "passed" the zaraspora the condemnation in Adam "that came upon all mankind. For all have sinned." "In Christ you are a new creature." It is a question now for you whether you "enter into the joy of your Lord" or experience shame and compunction of heart, regret, for unimproved opportunities. I do not understand the value here under consideration and designated as a mna for each individual an intrinsic part of the individual as the life would be, but a use. This I think is the lesson.

TO THE ELECT OF GOD (IN A TIME OF TROUBLE).

The elect of God exist, although no man can individually identify them. They are after a common family likeness, though differently situated in the present evil world. They have one faith, and one sins, and one mind, though following different occupations, and living in different parts of the earth. We greet them in the name of the Lord, wishing them and praying for them grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Beloved, ye are known of God, though you may not be discerned by man. You are scattered up and down the world, in a cloudy and dark day, undistinguishable to human eyes, from the common mass of mankind. Your divine mark or seal, wherever you are to be found, consists of the belief, obedience and love of the truth which God has caused to be set forth in the writings of Moses, and the prophets, and the apostles. Having this mark, you are precious in his eyes. Your faith is well-pleasing to him; your obedience, your free-will offerings, your sacrifices in his service at a time when all the world ignores him ascend before him as the odor of a sweet smell, and are acceptable to him through the High Priest of our profession. And they will be spoken of again to your great joy, in a day when they will seem to have been all forgotten, and when they will seem too small to be mentioned in the presence of the world-stirring events that will belong to the coming again of our Lord Jesus Christ. I write to you concerning our common affliction—common to a large sense. I do not write to you because I know you. Some of you I doubtless know; but no man knows you as "the Lord knows them that are his." A man cannot even know himself in this sense,—as our beloved brother Paul has said, "I judge not mine own self: he that judgeth me is the Lord." We know the principles upon which men will be saved, because they have been revealed, but we are not capable of acting on this plan. There is a reason in it all. The kingdom is to be established for God's honor, not man's: for the Spirit's objects and not those of flesh. Hence it is a necessity that men be provided for its administration who are not proud and lifted up in their eyes, but who are lowly, and who know and reverence God so deeply as to find pleasure in his exaltation. The likeness of man will come out of it all, but glory to God first. If God made choice of the aristocracy, his purpose ("I will be exalted among the heathen") would not be accomplished. They are full of themselves. He chooses men who are empty of themselves, that they may be full of God. Poor men, in a day of evil, are the kind of material out of which he can provide the earthen vessels, in which his eternal treasure can be deposited, "that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of man."

But you say, "Such poor weak people as we, are not fit to be kings and priests." True: not as you are now. It is not as you are now that you will be elevated to the position. You will now be changed from the mortal to the immortal, and this change will fit you in every way for what you will have to do. It will give you strength and grace and capacity and gladness of heart. You will be able to carry yourselves as kings, and to sustain yourselves without fatigue, and to bring the wisdom of Solomon to bear in the judgment of all matters you may have in charge. Qualification of this sort is all in God, who will liberally crown his children with the highest gifts, in the day of their exaltation. The one thing needful is a humble, loving, obedient heart, and pliant will which can only be developed and put to the proof by the exercise of faith in a day like this; and the operation can only be successfully performed, in most cases, in circumstances of poverty and self-denial. Consequently, your lowly position and ineffident state, instead of being a cause of dubitation, should help your confidence, as furnishing in your case, the likely elements of suitability for the glory to be revealed.

But in another way, you may feel the cloud return. The time is long, and human nature is weak, and power fails, and you feel yourselves walking towards the darkness which bounds the horizon of all natural life; yes, the darkness will oftentimes steal into your inmost soul, and fill you with an indescribable horror, as you survey the vastness of the universe, in which God is apparently silent, and the almost infinite mass of abortive life that appears upon the earth from generation to generation. Be comforted concerning this also: this darkness is inseparable from God's plan. Nay more: it is essential to it. Human life on the earth can no more reach the glory to be revealed without this experience, than the fruits of the field can appear without ploughing and harrowing. It is part of the plan. God's wisdom is in it, and his love, for God is love. We shall see it. Mean while we must exercise faith, without which he cannot be pleased. Faith working by love can see a little even now—by starlight as it were. The darkness is prolonged for the world as a whole; but it is short for any generation. It has been on the earth for ages, but no generation lasts for ages. We know nothing of it last century; our turn has now come: it depresses, but it will soon be over, and when over, the next thing in our experience (apparently the immediate next) if actually delayed however long; is the eternal sunshine of the Father's manifested presence, power, and glory. We shall find then what has been done for us by our present exposure in the darkness and cold of earth's winter. It is the Father's appointment for us meanwhile. What can we say but "Thy will be done?" He doth not willingly afflict. Not only so, but he ministers to our need while we pass through the darkness. None of the elect of God is left alone. God is with him to guide and strengthen in many invisible ways. God cares for him: pities him; chastens him; upholds and prepares him for the inheritance that is in store for all the sons of light: an inheritance in which they will commune with unspeakable joy, after the prolonged and bitter fight of faith victoriously waged in their several evil days. "These are they that came out of great tribulation." We cannot come out of it without being in it first. While in it, it is hard to bear. But remember the end. Remember the joyful master of the lord's elect.

This touches another sorrow you have. In your several spheres of probation, you are yearning for what you never realise. You hunger and thirst for the prevalence of a noble enlightenment among men. You love God yourselves with all your hearts and souls. You long to see others rejoice in him and exalt him in a sincere and intelligent way. You have a compassionate regard for the condition of mankind, and desire, with even a tearful earnestness, to see them in a blessed condition. You sigh and faint for the delights of sanctified and intellectual friendship in which the hearts of companions should open with a noble warmth to the great and noble topics that the universe presents to the mind, instead of gravitating heavily to the petty accidents of animal life. Ah, and you are afflicted with your own incapacities that blur the sight and enfeeble the hands, and drag you into abysses of gloom as dark and dreadful as Jonah's habitation in the storm-tost sea.—Now, there is comfort concerning all this. It is somewhat negative in its form; but, then, it is true, and true comfort wears well, whereas false comfort fails you in the long run. The comfort is that these things are unattainable in the present condition of human life upon earth, but that they are attainable and will be realised in their very perfection in the kingdom of God. The recognition of this is a help. We reconcile ourselves hopefully to our lot, enduring the hardness of the desert, knowing that it is desert, and in the confident anticipation of the land of promise at the end of the journey. One comfort more. It is not displeasing to the Father that we thus hunger and thirst to the point even of misery, after righteousness. On the contrary, Jesus said, "Blessed are ye that hunger and thirst after righteousness; for ye shall be filled."

Finally, you are troubled and distressed by dissensions in the household of faith. Many of you have been plunged into deep grief, even unto many tears. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial." It is nothing new. It is the modern form of a very ancient and frequent experience, resulting from the fermentation of diverse elements brought together by the knowledge of the truth. We must trust to God's wisdom in permitting of the admixture of these elements. He has done so from the beginning. Do not be too much distressed by it. The results that come of it do not alter things. They only prove and try and manifest things. The word of the Lord standeth sure amid all the chafes and changes and corruptions of men. The Lord Jesus, from the serene exaltation of the heavens, has for centuries beheld the contusions, and commotions, and wars that have wrought havoc among men in his absence. He has beheld them without surprise. He foresaw them and foretold them. He said there would be strife and division: that iniquity would abound: that the love of many would wax cold: that the trial would be too severe for some, but that he that should endure to the end would be saved. Can we imagine that such things are permitted without a purpose? The apostolic age was rife with them: is it a marvel if we have our share? There is but one answer on the part of enlightened reason: and that answer will help us to stand in the midst of the evil and to hold fast unmoved the hope of the gospel, looking to Christ, who lives—distrusting ourselves, who die. Our life is fleeting away, the battle will soon be over. Be strong and of good comfort. Stand fast: quit you like men. Keep close to the word in daily reading, and the peace of God will rule your hearts and minds and preserve you amid all chafes and tumults, unto his glorious kingdom, which will heal all sores, and chase all darkness for ever away.

Your fellow-sufferer, fellow-soldier, fellow-pilgrim, and fellow-suppliant of the mercy of God unto eternal life.—Robert Roberts, in Christadelphian.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, March 25, 1885.

THIS NUMBER completes our issue for one quarter of the current year—1885. We are trying to do the very best we can to make the paper instructive and interesting to its readers, by giving that diversity of reading, and information on the events of the times, that should characterize every periodical. In return we respectfully ask all our friends to aid us in extending our circulation, at the commencement of the next quarter.

EVERYTHING is in such a state of unsettled commotion in the Nile country in Africa, and in Southern and Central Asia, that even speculation itself seems idle till there shall be some change in the condition of affairs. From present appearances it would almost seem that a cyclone of war has started in the African deserts that may have a very destructive sweep in its gyrations before there is another calm of peace in the Orient. That this war has a prophetic significance can scarcely admit of doubt, and we anxiously await developments.

No. 3 of Vol. I. of a new temperance, or rather, prohibition paper has come to hand named "The XVIth Amendment," Its object is to secure the adoption of a new amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be worded:

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

SEC. 1. Neither distilled nor fermented liquors shall be made, imported, transported, sold or used for drinking purposes within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The paper rightfully claims that "there is no form of atrocity ever invented by human ingenuity that can compare to the wickedness of the liquor traffic, and those who maintain it by patronage or political power are partners in all its crimes." Published at 255-261 Washington St., Buffalo, N. Y., at $1 a year.

Communications.

EDEN, Ill.,

Editor Restitution:

Will you find a place in the columns of your excellent paper for this communication? I cite texts from Matthew and Paul. "And being warned of God in a dream, he withdrew into the parts of Galilee, and came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken through the prophets that he should be called a Nazarene." "Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, then that which is spiritual."

All things written of Jesus had to be literally fulfilled or have a natural fulfilment, before they could have a second or scriptural fulfilment for that which is natural is first—afterwards that which is spiritual. So Jesus had to be the first born from the dead before the ecclesia—his body—could spiritually see and discern the Scriptures of truth in their spiritual import. We will find what the words of the prophet were that Matthew tells were to be fulfilled in Jesus. Amos ii. 5, 11, 12, 13. "But I will send a fire upon Judah and it will devour the palaces of Jerusalem" (Thy word is as a fire) "And I raised up of your sons for prophets, and your young men for Nazarites. Is it not even thus, O ye children of Israel? saith the Lord. But ye gave the Nazarites wine to drink and commanded the prophets saying, "Prophesy not, behold I am pressed under you as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves."

Who were these young men that were Nazarites and prophets? I answer, John the Baptist and Jesus of Nazareth. That he might be called a Nazarene, he dwelt in Nazareth, for all that was written concerning Jesus "must needs be fulfilled." What was the spiritual import of Nazarene? We will dwell on this anon. The natural fulfilment comes first, John the Baptist was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, make ye ready the way of the Lord, make his path straight." "What went ye out for to see? A prophet, yea I say, unto you and much more than a prophet. This is he of whom it is written, Behold I send my messenger before thy face who shall prepare thy way before thee." At Jesus' crucifixion they offered him wine mingled with myrrh, but he received it not. Thus fulfilling the above prophecy. John the Baptist they hated and imprisoned for his prophetic utterances ("Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world") and his plain speaking. "He came neither eating nor drinking, and ye say he hath a devil"—Mark xiv. 66. "One of the maids of the high priest seeing Peter saith, Thou also wast with the Nazarene, even Jesus." "And entering into the tomb they saw a young man sitting on the right side arrayed in a white robe, and they were amazed, and he saith unto them, Be not amazed, ye seek Jesus the Nazarene, which hath been crucified? he is risen, he is not here, behold where they laid him." Here we find that Jesus was know as, and called, "the Nazarene" by both the Jews and the angel. He dwell in Nazareth fulfilling prophecy in its first phase, or literal, natural, manner, but what is the second or spiritual import of the term, "He shall be called a Nazarene?" Turn to Acts xxiv. 5, and read, "For we have found this man (Paul) a pestilent fellow and a mover of insurrections among all the Jews throughout the world and a ringleader of the sect of Nazarenes. Then this word has a particular meaning. There is a thought, a belief, a religion, embodied in this word "Nazarene." It belongs to a sect—Paul had belonged to the sect of Pharisees, whose religious belief lay in the resurrection of the just and the unjust Jews or the Israelites from the dead. Now, he confesses that "after the way which they call a sect so serve I the God of our fathers, believing all things which are according to the law and which are written in the prophets." So Paul confesses to being a believer in the Nazarene sect. Christ then founded a sect during his ministry which was known to the world as The Nazarene sect, as is shown by the expression of the angel and the maid "Jesus the Nazarene" and Paul confesses to being a believer in the Nazarene doctrine. We find the Nazarene doctrine is incorporated in the "gospel of the kingdom" and is the foundation of it, for Jesus himself fulfilled the prophecy before his ministry, and after his baptism he began to preach, and was called a Nazarene, before his death as well as after, called so from the doctrine that he taught. So the Nazarene belief or sect was founded by Jesus during his ministry on earth, after his baptism, and before his resurrection. This sect or doctrine was founded on a particular truth "that was spoken against" by many and believed in by few. Jesus taught the Jews during his ministry that "I am the Son of God," and proved it by his signs and wonderful works among them. Although they saw these signs and acknowledged the wonders they rejected the doctrine he taught and would not believe, he was any other than the Son of Joseph and Mary. They would not believe in the Nazarene doctrine nor join the sect. The history of the church corroborates this doctrinal belief in asserting that, "the Nazarenes believed in the miraculous conception of Jesus." The apostles witnessed to this in their written testimony. This is what Jesus declared to the Jews when he said "I am the Son of God." This is what Peter testified to, when he said in answer to this query, "whom do men say that I am, whom do you say that I am?" "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God." Now flesh and blood had not told Peter, but he received it from God's word. And this is what Paul believed when he confessed before the governor, Acts i. 15, that after the way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers, believing all things which are according to the law and which are written in the prophets, having hope toward God which they also themselves look for that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust. (But Paul's hope included Gentiles which was another cause for hatred with the Jews.) We find that Paul acknowledges to being a Nazarene in belief, and that he believed all things which are according to the law and the prophets. This Nazarene belief was the one thing, and the first thing, and the all things written, constituted the way in all its entirety. I am the way the truth and the life. This Nazarene doctrine was the first principle and foundation that the Gospel of the kingdom was founded upon.... Jesus was literally the Son of God, thus fulfilling prophecy in a first or natural manner. The second fulfilment was when he was born from the dead, and "he was declared to be the Son of God with power" at his resurrection. The double application is made plain, "for there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body."

"And when they (the Jewish nation) had fulfilled all things that were written of him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in the tomb." "But God raised him from the dead and he was seen for many days of them that came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are now his witnesses unto the people."

"And we bring you glad tidings of the promise made unto the fathers, how that God hath fulfilled the same unto our children in that he raised up Jesus, as also it was written in the second Psalm, "Thou art my Son this day have I begotten thee." The same promises that were made to the fathers, Paul says were fulfilled in Jesus in their time, in the things that were proclaimed by the angels when the sign was given to the house of David at the fulfilment of the promise to the fathers "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel," which is being interpreted "God with us." Remember that when they, (the first man, Adam race) had fulfilled all things written of him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in the tomb. All things relating to the natural life of Jesus which were written in the Scriptures were fulfilled when they laid him in the tomb. The natural first, and they now were all complete. "Afterward that which is spiritual"—read what the apostle says of the spiritual. "And as concerning that he raised him from the dead now no more to return to corruption he hath spoken on this wise. I will give you the holy and sure blessings of David. Because he saith also in another Psalm, Thou wilt not give thy Holy One to see corruption." This is what Paul writes of the natural body and spiritual body of Jesus of Nazareth. Peter exclaims, "Moses indeed said a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you from among your brethren like unto me, to him shall ye hearken in all things whatsoever he shall speak unto you. And it shall be that every soul which shall not hearken to that prophet shall be utterly destroyed from among the people. Yea and all the prophets from Samuel and them which followed after, as many as have spoken they also told of these days."

"Ye men of Israel why marvel ye at this man, or why fasten ye your eyes on us, as though by our own power or godliness we had made him to walk. The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers hath glorified his child Jesus whom ye delivered up, and denied before the face of Pilate when he had determined to release him....And by faith in his name, "in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth"—"hath his name made this man strong." Read the whole third and fourth chapters of Acts N. R. "Be it known unto you all and to all the people of Israel, that in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth whom ye crucified," (the spiritual import of "the Nazarene" lies in this name) "whom God raised from the dead, even in him doth this man stand here before you whole. He is the stone which was set at naught of you the builders, which was made the head of the corner. And in none other is there salvation, for neither is there any other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved." Do not the Scriptures fairly and fully determine that the name of Jesus of Nazareth, the sect of Nazarenes lies hidden. Matt. x. (For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed or hid that shall not be made known. Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come.")

Nazareth the city where the angel appeared to Mary with the announcement that a child of miraculous conception should be born of her, and this child should be called the Son of God—as true a circumstance as that his name was Jesus.—His name shall be called Immanuel which being interpreted is "God with us." "The word became flesh and dwelt among us." and "the word was God." The word was "the only begotten Son of God."

"Jesus of Nazareth," which is being interpreted, "A Savior through miraculous conception." Herein rests the hope of redemption for the ecclesia first, then the world, through this same Jesus of Nazareth whom ye crucified—who bought us with a price—with his precious blood, and thus became a Savior through a miraculous conception, and shedding of his blood for the remission of sin. "A body hast thou prepared me, lo I come to do thy will, O God." Then a believing ecclesia joyfully calls him, Immanuel—and is anointed with the oil of gladness.

Did the Jews believe the teaching of Jesus and his disciples of the way? No indeed, for they ignored the prophets while they clamored for the law, they believed and taught that Jesus was the Son of Joseph and Mary. Paul testifies, "that I am a Jew born in Tarsus, of Cilicia but brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, instructed according to the strict manners of the law of our fathers, being zealous for God even as ye all are this day, and I persecuted this way unto the death... also doth the high priest bear me witness and all the estate of the elders....And it came to pass as I made my way and drew nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me, and I fell unto the ground and heard a voice saying unto me, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And I answered, "who art thou Lord;" and he said unto me, "I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest." Paul believed henceforth in this name and was a staunch Nazarene so much so that he was accused of being a ringleader of the sect.

Jesus says I am not come to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil. These are my words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you how that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses and the prophets and the Psalms concerning me." The law was fulfilled by his mother's tribal marriage, with Joseph—but the words of the prophets had to be fulfilled too, and there the Jews rejected while they stood firmly for the law. Jesus said to them of little faith, O foolish men and slow of heart to believe after all that the prophets have spoken. Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things and to enter into his glory, and beginning from Moses and from all the prophets he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. Paul before Agrippa testified, "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, and this I also did in Jerusalem," and after telling of his strange conversion he continues, "Having therefore obtained the help that is from God, I stand unto this day testifying both to small and great, saying nothing but what the prophets and Moses did say should come, how that the Christ must suffer, and how that he first by the resurrection of the dead should proclaim light, both to the people and the Gentiles."

We will now note what Paul says relating to heresies creeping into the ecclesia. In his farewell to the elders of the church of Ephesus he warns them as follows, "And now behold I know that ye all among whom I went about preaching the kingdom, shall see my face no more, wherefore I testify unto you this day that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I shrank not from declaring unto you the whole counsel of God. Take heed unto yourselves and to all the flock in which the Holy Spirit hath made you bishops to feed the church of God, which he purchased with his own blood. I know that after my departing, grievous wolves shall enter in among you, not sparing the flock, and from among your own selves (elders of the Ephesian church) shall men arise speaking perverse things to draw away the disciples after them (This we find come to pass in "Theodotian of Ephesus and Aquila of Pontus, whom the Ebonites following maintain that Christ was begotten by Joseph," Church History). Wherefore watch ye, remembering that by the space of three years I ceased not to admonish every one night and day with tears. And now I commend you to God and to the word of his grace which is able to build you up and to give you the inheritance among all them that are sanctified."

Where shall we look for the truth as it is in Jesus, outside of the Scriptures of truth. To believe all that is written in God's word, is harmony, peace, joy and love. Outside of it is strife, error, and perverseness.

There are prophesies relating to the apostacy of the church bearing on this rejection of the way, that I will call your attention too. See Isa. xxx. 1, 8, 15; inclusive. "Woe to the rebellious children saith the Lord that take counsel but not of me, and that cover with a covering but not of my Spirit, that they may add sin to sin. Now go write it before them in a tablet, Prov. ii. 3. Let not mercy and truth forsake thee, write them upon the table of thy heart, and note it in a book, (The book of testimony, ye are my witnesses) that it may be for the time to come for ever and ever.

That this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord, which say to the seers see not, and to the prophets, prophesy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits. Get you out of the way, turn aside out of the path, cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us. Wherefore thus saith the Holy One of Israel, Because ye despise this Word and trust in fraud and perverseness and stay thereon (see margin and remember what Paul said to the Ephesian elders). Therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant. And he shall break it, as the breaking of the potter's vessel, that is broken in pieces, he shall not spare so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit. For thus saith the Lord God the Holy One of Israel, in returning and rest shall ye be saved, in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength—and ye would not, but ye said no."

The Jews persecuted Jesus "because I said I am the Son of God," for this they called him "the Nazarene," for this claim the angel called him "Jesus the Nazarene," for this belief Paul confessed to belonging to the sect of Nazarenes," for this belief he was called, "Jesus of Nazareth," for this fact, "The Holy One of Israel saw not corruption," for this established truth, it was "impossible that death should hold him," his claim was just, "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God."

The Jews persecuted his disciples because they upheld the claims of "This life" for Jews and his consequent resurrection from the dead through this claim. This additional truth they did not believe any more than the first—"all things" concerning Jesus was the way. Our life is hid with Christ in God. He is the way through which we can find eternal life. This belief in the way according to Scripture evidence lies in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. The name is significant of the belief. "He shall be called a Nazarene." "No other name under heaven is given among men whereby they can be saved" "Jesus of Nazareth," the promised seed of the woman that should bruise the serpent's head. "Jesus of Nazareth" the only begotten Son of God, the true Messiah that should come and restore all things.

The facts as established in Jesus' birth, life, death, burial, and resurrection fulfilled all things written of him, but which truths were not discernable and fully understood even by his disciples until after his resurrection, when he breathed upon them the Holy Spirit and opened their mind to understand the Scriptures. We will conclude with Paul's words to the Jews at Rome, they addressed him thus: "But we desire to hear of thee, what thou thinkest, for as concerning this sect we know that it is everywhere spoken against." "Then he expounded the matter, testifying the kingdom of God and persuading them concerning Jesus both out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets from morning till evening, and some believed the things which were spoken and some believed not." The trouble with the Jews was they were blind. The law of Moses was everything to them, while the law of the Lord consisted of all things written, this truth they failed to comprehend.

A Little While.

"He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly! Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii. 20.

"Quickly," beloved! I know mine heart is bearing
With deep emotions to behold my face,
But for "a little while" will thou not spread the tidings
Of the sweet message of my love and grace?

Pray on, beloved! mine eye is ever watching;
Thy tears are numbered in my deep, deep love;
Thy truest sighs, and all thine heart's deep yearnings
Are registered by me in heaven above.

Trust, trust, beloved! I know the world frowns coldly,
But this should only drive thee nearer me.
Earth's broken links make heaven's affections stronger,
The cross will only make the crown more bright for thee.

Look up! then shalt thou learn the needful lesson meekly,
How my own hand hath planned thy path for thee.

Rest, rest, beloved! thine head upon my bosom;
Lean on my arm, and tell thy griefs to me.
My heart is thine in all the full perfection
Of sympathy none else could give to thee.

Weep not, beloved because thou yet must tarry;
Wilt thou not serve me heart and hand meanwhile?
Some hearts around thee pine in lonely sorrow;
Couldst thou not give one kindly look or tender smile?

Go forth, beloved! life's ministry is earnest,
Wrapped hearts throng round thee, in thy path below;
Fond hopes once cherished, now by death are blighted;
Oh, impart thou not a balm to soothe their woe?

Yes, yes, beloved! I read thine heart's glad answer:
Yes, then will do this work of love for me.
Only "a little while," and earth's sad scenes of sorrow
Shall change to glory bright—prepared for me.

Then, then, beloved! heaven's song of joy awaiting,
Triumphant "hallelujah" then shall raise,
Then shalt thou gaze upon my face, and ever,
"Knowing as known," pour forth thine endless praise.

The Inexhaustible Fullness.

Mountains have been exhausted of their gold, mines of their diamonds and the depth of the ocean of their pearly gems. The demand has emptied the supply. Over once busy scenes silence and solitude now reign; the caverns ring no longer to the miner's hammer, nor is the song of the pearl-fisher heard upon the deep. But the riches of grace are inexhaustible. All that have gone before us have not made them less, and we shall make them no less to those who follow us.

I have found it an interesting thing to stand on the edge of a noble rolling river, and to think that, although it has been flowing on for 6,000 years, watering the fields, and slaking the thirst of a hundred generations, it shows no sign of waste or want; and when I have watched the rise of the sun, as he shot above the crest of the mountain, or in a sky draped with golden curtains, sprung up from his ocean bed, I have wondered to think that he has melted the snows of so many winters, and renewed the verdure of so many springs, and painted the flowers of so many summers, and ripened the golden harvests of so many autumns, and yet shines as brilliant as ever, his eye not dim nor his natural strength abated, nor his floods of light less full for centuries of boundless profusion.

Yet what are these but images of the fullness that is in Christ? Let that feed your hopes, and cheer your hearts, and brighten your faith, and send you away this day happy and rejoicing.

All-Sufficient Grace.

"God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that, ye, always having all-sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work."—2 Cor. ix. 8.

"All-sufficiency in all things!" Believer, surely thou art "thoroughly furnished!" Grace is no scanty thing, doled out in pittances. It is a glorious treasury, which the key of prayer can always unlock, but never empty. A fountain, "full, flowing, ever flowing, overflowing." Mark these three ALLS in this precious promise. It is a three-fold link in a golden chain, let down from a throne of grace by a God of grace. "All grace!"—"all-sufficiency!" in "all things!" and these to "abound."

Oh! precious thought! My want cannot impoverish that inexhaustible treasury of grace! Myriads are hourly hanging on it, and drawing from it, and yet there is no diminution: "Out of that fullness all we too may receive, and grace for grace!"

My soul, dost not thou love to dwell on that all-abounding grace? Thine own insufficiency in every thing, met with an "all-sufficiency in all things!" Grace in all circumstances and situations, in all vicissitudes and changes, in all the varied phases of the Christian's being. Grace in sunshine and storm—in health and in sickness—in life and in death. Grace for the old believer and the young believer, the tried believer, and the weak believer, and the tempted believer. Grace for duty, and grace in duty—grace to carry the joyous cup with a steady hand—grace to drink the bitter cup with an unmurmuring spirit—grace to have prosperity sanctified—grace to say, through tears, "Thy will be done!"

"Remember this word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope."

Things that are Coming on the Earth.

No event of the present is without its bearing on the future. Nothing stands alone. If not at the summit, at least at the base, mountain is linked with mountain; and if not at the outset at least in after progress, the radiance of all the stars in the firmament unites and intermingles.

Each event is a seed as well as a flower. It is the product of what is past, and it is the producer of what is future. Not nature alone, but providence is pregnant: each event (be it the smallest on earth) has its place and potency as a preparer of the future; yesterday is not only the predecessor but the parent of to-day; and as to-day is the child of yesterday, so it is the parent of to-morrow. A microscope of sufficient power would show in the oak in the acorn, or the cedar in the small seed of the cedar-cone; so to an eye of sufficient prescience, or rather an eye of finer and higher power than man's, the events of the future would be distinctly seen rolled up in those events of the past or the present, which, like so many winged seeds or thistle-down, are flying confusedly hither and thither through the atmosphere of our [illegible]

It is not folly to [illegible] interc[illegible] only be pronounce[illegible] gences of a higher [illegible] With finer optics, and more powerful lenses, we might read more of the future in the present than we can now do. But interpreting events soberly, and reconnoitering the region before us with the prophetic telescope in hand, we may discover not a little, and that with some amount of certainty.

Not that history ever servilely repeats itself. There are in every age historical parallels, but exact repetition will be searched for in vain. The present does not imitate the past, nor will the future imitate the present, though there will always be many outstanding features of resemblance. To-morrow will, to a certain extent, be moulded by to-day, yet the extent of the moulding will not be a mechanical reproduction or imitation. The sounds of to-day are not the mere echoes of yesterday, though there may be likeness and sympathy between them. God does not repeat himself either in nature or in providence. As the earth lived upon, and the race that lives on it, are always the same, there will be resemblances innumerable; but as he who rules is not man, limited in invention, or poor in expedient, or circumscribed in agencies, or deficient in resources, we are sure that out of a few simple elements the most marvellous variety of changes will be evolved.

But we can look only a little way into the future. We know something of what is coming on the earth; and we can watch events, and try to note the signs of the times. The events of the hour are ominous, they seem to intimate something widespread and terrible. They warn us of judgment. They bid us watch. They tell us to be on the outlook for the great crisis of earth. They point forward to Armageddon and the great battle of earth, the great slaughter of the nations. They turn an eye to Palestine, as the stage to which the scene will soon shift, and where "terrible things in righteousness" will soon be done, in preparation for the long-promised glory.

THE SERVICE.

"He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much."—Luke xvi. 10.

I cannot do great things for him,
Who did so much for me;
But I would like to show my love,
Dear Jesus, unto Thee;
Faithful in every little things,
O, Savior, may I be.

There are small things in daily life
In which I may obey,
And this may show my love to Thee,
And show it every day.
There are some loving little words
Which I for Thee may say.

There are small corners I may have,
Some I locate in [illegible]
Small acts of faith, [illegible]
Small sufferings I may bear,
And little bits of work for Thee
I may do everywhere.

And for Thy love, give me grace
My little place to fill,
That I may ever walk with Thee,
And work in Thy will:
And in each duty or [illegible]
I may be faithful still.

THE OIL VESSELS IN THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS.

One of our correspondents writes, with reference to our remarks last month on Mr. Hughes' sermon on the Ten Virgins: "Do explain, next month, what the oil vessels accompanying the lamps indicate. The omission must be big with meaning, however mysterious." Another friend writes approvingly of our view so far as expressed, and kindly sends us a pamphlet containing his own exposition of the parable. If we may take those communications as indicating an interest amongst our readers generally, it will be seasonable if we try now to comply with our correspondent's request.

The parable is illustrative of a special phase of our Lord's return. As, just before, the incoming kingdom has been likened in a given respect to faithful and wickedly unfaithful servants; so here it is likened, from a slightly different point of view, to ten virgins, five of whom are foolish and five prudent (phronimoi). The virgins [illegible] them have regard for the expected [illegible]room, desire to honor him, [illegible]s and light them, and go [illegible]ion to meet him. The [illegible] to [illegible]on is [illegible] use of lamps is to give [illegible] In this they fail utterly. [illegible] of the oil is to feel the [illegible] it has no other meaning in such a connection. The quantity of oil required depends upon the time for which the lamp has to burn. Small hand-lamps carry only a little oil; hence if a good supply of oil be demanded, a reserve is naturally provided in accompanying oil vessels, additional to the lamps. The circumstance that it is in separate vessels that the good supply is stored is a mere accessory, due to the fitness of the representation that, in a procession, hand-lamps would be used, and these for convenience would be small. The precaution of taking a good supply is just here the essential feature. In the making of this provision is the prudence of the prudent virgins seen; in the not making it is demonstrated the folly of the foolish; which folly, be it remarked, is shown by its contrast with prudence in name and result to be imprudence, want of forethought, idleness, or presumption. The foolish virgins did not think the Bridegroom would tarry so long; or, did not give the possibility of delay a thought; or, disliking much trouble, lightly dismissed any momentary apprehension on the subject. They ventured forth without the reserve of oil which their more discreet companions took care to carry with them. The sequel we know: the provision of oil which might have been made beforehand could not be made when the crucial moment came. It was too late. The Bridegroom came. The foolish virgins were not there. The procession entered the house of joy. The door was shut. The foolish virgins returned, and sought admittance. But not it was too late. They were disowned. So ends the parable. Its rapid conclusion is remarkable. It purposely leaves many things unexplained, and we would start no ill-timed inquiries.

But now to our correspondent's question: What do the oil vessels accompanying the lamps indicate? Well, on the face of the representation, they mean neither more nor less than a prudent reserve or store of oil that feeds the flame. To get at what this means we must needs try and go a little below the surface.

The light of the lamps is the light of welcome and of witness. It is an open testimony that the Bridegroom is expected. The oil feeding the flame is the inward power of giving this welcome and bearing this witness. It is something of which it takes a constant expenditure to keep up the light. It is something which should be obtained at a proper time and in a proper way, and which cannot be got under all circumstances at a moment's notice. It is something which each watcher must have procured for himself, and for which he must not rely on others. We doubt much whether it would serve any good purpose to inquire anxiously what precisely the oil is, beyond assuring ourselves of the general notion which attaches to it. It is evident that it is the inward power of bearing witness to the expected Bridegroom. But it is not clear to our own mind that anything practically valuable would be added by an exact determination of what it is in which this inward power consists. At all events, it must fulfil the plain condition sha-lowed forth in the parable. If the oil is knowledge—then it must be knowledge which can be stored up beforehand, which will be available for replenishing the flame of witness-bearing and welcome at the trying moment, and which one person cannot obtain from another at the crisis of the midnight cry. If the oil is love—the same conditions must be maintained. If the oil is the indwelling of the Holy Spirit—still the same plain characteristics must be observed: we must in that case resolutely hold that this Divine indwelling can only be secured in sufficient fulness to meet all possible demands, by being prudently stored up beforehand. All things considered, we are disposed to settle down on some such explanation as this: That knowledge and love, combined in the inward life of the soul, are what the oil represents. The required solution must evidently be sought for in the direction of personal experience, seeing that our Lord very strikingly makes time of the essence of the means for procuring whatever the oil signifies. It is not hinted that the foolish virgins had not money to buy more oil, but they had not time! This feature, which makes everything turn on the question of time, is the more observable, and presumably important, just because no sort of incongruity is to be surmised in the idea of buying. The obvious way of procuring oil for lamps is to buy it. We are left to fall back on the ordinary course of things as to the means by which the wise and foolish alike procured such supplies as they respectively did procure at the outset. They naturally bought it. They did not beg it. The begging of the foolish from the wise was an after-thought, occasioned by the dilemma in which the former found themselves. Experience cannot be borrowed; it must be bought. Knowledge,—real, personal, experimental knowledge,—cannot be borrowed; it must be bought. A fulness—stability—strength of inward life, capable of standing a strain, springing up to meet an emergency, grappling with a difficulty,—cannot be borrowed; it must be bought. It must be bought beforehand, and be in store when needed. This surely is the great lesson. And even if we conclude with Robert Govett, of Norwich, that the exclusion which the foolish virgins bring upon themselves is not necessarily exclusion from the kingdom, but only exclusion from the marriage festivities which inaugurate the kingdom, still the lesson is profoundly admonitory; for the opportunity of obtaining that distinction, once lost, is lost for ever. It never returns. Pointed also is the lesson, as well as solemn. Pointed in this respect: that there is no mistaking the nature of the welcome and the witness which the borne forth and brightly burning lamps symbolize. The welcome is to the Bridegroom in that especial capacity. Master before (chapter xxix.), Master again afterwards (chapter xxv. 14), and King (xxv. 31): Bridegroom is the one character which he bears in this intercalated parable of the Ten Virgins; and to that character the welcome must correspond. The witness also is as determinate as the welcome. It is witness to the one truth that the Bridegroom was expected; witness to an avowed intention to meet him; witness to a desire and hope of entering with him into the marriage-feast. Such, then, are the solemnity and point of the great lesson inculcated.

Are we now to blunt the edge of all this by bringing in a contrast which the parable never once formulates? Are we to say that the virgins are clearly not the Bride, the Church; and in the strength of this conclusion throw over the entire lesson of the parable to the service of Jewish or Israelitish believers who shall be found on earth after the Church has been caught up to meet the Lord in the air and the marriage of the Lamb has been consummated? For ourselves, as at present enlightened, we dare do nothing of the kind. The Bride as such is not mentioned in the parable. There may have been reason for that, quite other than the one just hinted at above as held by some. It may have been premature, while as yet the Church had not been inaugurated (Matt. xvi. 18), to bring forward the Church in its collective capacity as the Bride. No individual soul is the Bride of Christ. We go with the late Charles Kingsley in deeming it important to remark this, and in deprecating the losing sight of it as favoring certain ideas which find their home in Romanism—with much evil consequence. But the lesson of this parable is expressly individual in its application; and therefore the character and office of these ten watchers may have sufficiently approximated under the name of virgins to the calling of the Church as a whole, to suffice for the individualized admonition which our Lord desired to convey.

There is just one thing as to which we would strengthen our article of last month. We there spoke of the slumbering of the virgins as "not entailing any serious consequence." We should have said fatal consequence. In all probability it was one consequence of that slumbering that all the lamps were dim at the moment the decisive cry was heard: and whether meaning welcome to the Bridegroom or witness to all around, it was quite serious enough that the light which should have been strong was feeble, to say nothing of the temporary dismay on awaking which greater vigilance might have prevented.—Rainbow.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

There has been lately a freshening and refreshment of the public mind in reminiscences of Washington, the Father of his country. I have felt the thrill of reverent and affectionate feeling toward the person and character of this great man, and would account it an honor and pleasure to have seen him, and talked with him. Should not this suggest to us the question, how should we not much rather have seen a greater than Washington; and should we not thrill to recall his wonderful works, and his sublime and exalted life and character. Is our monument, pure, and stately and towering to him who loved us above all others who have ever lived? Is our heart homage toward him, fervent, entire, unspeakable? Is he under God, supreme in our affection?

How sweet and refreshing the thought and hope of a new love, a new life, a new devotion, a new victory of faith. O, to live and love and labor anew in the company and service of Christ! The sweetness of the dawn of a new morning of comforted and fruitful thinking and walking with God! It seems to me this very admiration and love of Washington, should but help us toward a better and more reverent memory of our great and gentle and matchless second Adam, nor is it a memory merely, as of one who is dead, but a recognition and assurance of one who is living. And then so precious and inestimable are right thoughts of our brother, our captain, our prince, our Melchizedek! Surely God can teach us. Teach us what to think, and what to say. For even praying silence, were better than untimely and unprofitable speech.

Show me one who has right thoughts of God, and I am sure I shall see a man of learning and accomplishment. The greatest pain and poverty of knowledge, is in the error and poverty of human understanding of the One, of whom it may be said, he sees all, and he sees me.

Now up above me, on the wall, hangs a picture. It is Washington; grave, serene, patriotic, paternal and almost majestic; with his mouth firmly closed, as was his want in troublous times of old. His eyes are fastened on me. Wherever I sit, or stand, he is still regarding me steadfastly. Just so, let me remember, is God our Father, ever and every where, seeing and observing me and you, and all men. Is not God parental,—is he not perfectly well balanced and proportioned; is he not great in resources; is he not unimpeachably good; what are my ideas of God? I have an idea that he withholds some specially sought and created good, simply because here and there, those who seek, are not ready to receive or able to learn it. But he can strengthen them, and blessed will be the strengthening. I am sure that unbelief is a perverse and more or less constant impediment to blessing, and I know unbelief is a malady—almost a madness. I believe God is truly good, and that his penalties are salutary, and I trust, sooner or later remedial. There are four alternatives in government, with respect to creature and penalty.

1. To preserve the offender and his offences together, in the retribution.

2. To destroy the offender and his offences.

3. To destroy the offender and preserve his offences.

4. To restore the offender, and destroy his offences.

The first and third alternatives, may be fairly considered impractical and irrational, and of the other two all who read, may carefully consider and choose, what is scriptural, by studious collation of passages, and devout interpretation of their true intent.

Does not faith sometimes say in anticipation of the divine blessing, "Lord I thank thee," as if it were already bestowed? How few have strength to bear the blessings they earnestly seek for, at least such as are not purely spiritual, and for even these, how greatly needed is a preparation of heart. Hence with all our importunities, we need to mingle the prayer for receiving strength. We may not understand how great and large, are the blessings God has in readiness for us, when he sees in us a capacity to use them wisely.

How many people settle down to live, as if they were to live in earthly homes forever? How carefully they prepare their rooms, and how expensively they decorate them? What money and toil they expend for elegant comfort, and what elaborate precisions they make for this life's enjoyments, as if death were a myth, or however on the alert the foe may be to hit others with his arrows, he has no dart for them! What consideration they show, what inconvenience they incur, what diligence they display, for the life of a few fleeting years! This is to be cared for unceasingly at all hazards. How small is their faith, and how feeble their concern about a life beyond.

On the other hand, the wise man is contented with but little, if such is the will of God. He is not over careful about the abundance and variety of his earthly enjoyments and possessions. Even a cabin will answer him well, if he cannot easily have better. He is living in instant readiness for a better life. To him the Master's coming will be welcome, for he is not entangled with evil cares, or fettered with hurtful attachments.

It is continually a victory, "not to have seen, and yet to believe." To see our Divine Lord would be a wonderful and helpful privilege, if it were possible, and yet he is honored more by our believing without seeing. If the way is sometimes long and hard, there is a blessing to come, even if we but poorly understand it, or too faintly remember it. The longing to have the refreshment of seeing our Master is sometimes unspeakable, but in lieu of this, we may be able to have improved and vivified ideas of him, and this is a gladness and invigoration.

Sunday School Lesson.

The following lesson was prepared by Brother William Mills, of Andover, Dakota, and used in his class Sunday, March 8, 1885.

What is the gospel? We understand it is a good time coming, good news. The gospel was preached to Abraham, Gal. 3. 8. What was preached to Abraham?

Ans. Gen. 12. 3, 7; 13. 14-17; 15. 18; 17. 4-8; 18. 18; 22. 18. See Acts 3. 25,26.

What did Christ preach and teach? Matt. 4. 12, 17, 23; Mark 1. 14, 15; Luke 4. 43; 8. 1; 9. 2, 6; Acts 1. 3; John 7. 42. See what Christ taught them to pray for, Matt. 6. 10.

Will his will ever be done on earth until Christ takes the throne and kingdom promised to Mary? Luke 1. 31-33.

Ans. 2 Tim. 3. 1-2, 13.

What did Peter preach? Acts 2. 29-36; 10. 36.

What did Philip preach?

Ans. Acts 8. 5, 12, 35.

What did Paul preach and teach? Acts 3. 20; 5. 42; 14. 22; 17. 3, 18, 22; 18. 8; 19. 4-8; 20. 25; 23. 6; 26. 23; 28. 20, 23, 30, 31; Rom. 1. 2, 4; 1 Cor. 1. 23; 4. 20; 6. 9, 10; Gal. 5. 21; Eph. 5. 5. See Rev. 11. 15. Read Luke 19. 11-15.

General Grant says that he had no especial theological training in his youth, and has not studied the subject in later years sufficiently to form any opinion as to what he does or does not believe. He holds that there is a God and a hereafter, but he is not prepared to accept the extreme position taken by most Protestants that the unconverted and indifferent will be eternally tormented.

No man or woman of the humble sort can really be strong, gentle, pure, and good, without the world being better for it, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.

Take My Hand.

The slept within her little crib,
Beside her mother's bed,
The good night kiss long since was given,
The evening prayer was said.
Why start then? Does some frightful dream
I cannot understand,
Trouble my child? She only said:
"Please, mamma, take my hand."

And, with her little head at rest,
Feeling that I was near,
She sweetly slept again in peace,
Without a thought of fear.
Oh, with such a child-like faith as hers
Ready at my command,
Whose fears distress, how much I'd cast
"My Father, take my hand."

And, even though I may not see
Thy presence at my side
Yet if I feel thy hand in mine
I would be satisfied.
And through the way be cold and dark
If thy sole aid I stand
I'll trust in thee and onward go,
O Father, take my hand.

Then, when from cold life's pathway through,
Must know the way to lead,
And if I follow such a guide,
I can secure succeed:
And when, life's journey safely o'er
I reach that happy land,
I'll praise thee, Father, ever more
That once did'st take my hand.

The Faith that Saves.

In the highlands of Scotland there is a mountain gorge twenty feet in width, and two hundred feet in depth. Its perpendicular walls are bare of vegetation, save in their crevices, in which grow numerous wild flowers of rare beauty.—Desirous of obtaining specimens of these fine beauties, some scientific tourists once offered a Highland boy a handsome gift if he would consent to be lowered down the cliff by a rope, and would gather a little basketful for them. The boy looked wistfully at the money, for his parents were poor; but when he gazed at the yawning chasm, he shuddered, shrunk back, and declined. But filial love was strong within him, and after another glance at the gift, and at the terrible fissure, his heart grew strong, his eye flashed, and he said: "I'll go, if my father will hold the rope!"

And then, with unshrinking nerves, cheek unblanched, and heart firmly strong, he suffered his father to put the rope about him, lower him into the wild abyss, and to suspend him there while he filled his little basket with the coveted flowers. It was a daring deed, but his faith in the strength of his father's arm, and in the love of his father's heart, gave him courage and power to perform it.

The boy's trust is a beautiful illustration of the faith which saves the man; for as he put himself into his father's hands, to be bound with rope and lowered down the gorge to pluck the coveted flowers, so must you put yourselves into Christ's hand to be pardoned and saved.

Power of Kindness.

A young school teacher had one large boy, Joe Stanton, who was ringleader of all mischief. The first day he managed to make the school a scene of roguery and confusion. The poor teacher went home with a heavy heart.

The next day she thought if she could gain the confidence of this boy, and have him on her side, she should have but little trouble with her school. As it closed in the afternoon, she spoke kindly to him, and asked his help in closing the school-room door. He readily complied. As she turned homeward, Joe followed. At length she inquired,

"Have you any sister, Joseph?"

The right chord was touched.

"I had one sister" he said, "little Mary, but she died;" and thus encouraged by the ready sympathy of his listener, he went on to tell that Mary was his only sister, and that he used to take care of her, and carry her out of doors, and draw her in the wagon he had made for her, and that she loved him "more than any one else did," and always used to run to the door to meet him when he came home.—"But she is dead now," he added, "and I have not anybody that takes care of me. She had a fever, and she did not know me when I spoke to her, and in just a week she died. Her grave is right over here," he continued, "and perhaps you would like to see it some time."

The teacher willingly went with him, asking him still further about little Mary as they passed along, till at length as they approached the grave and sat down upon the stone near it, poor Joe could no longer wipe away the tears as he had done, when, one by one, they trickled down, for the fountains within were broken up. He covered his face with his hands and wept aloud.

"She's dead," he exclaimed again, "and nobody cares for me now."

"I will care for you, Joseph," said the kind teacher, as she laid her hands upon his now uncovered head; and she spoke to him of heaven, and the happy meeting of those whom death has severed, and of One who cares for us more than all the earthly friends, and who will help us, if we wish to do right.

Then, as he grew calm, and they had risen to go, she told him of all her own sorrow—of the father whom she had lost—of her loneliness—of her wish to be useful while she supported herself by teaching—of how hard the Westbrook school seemed to her, and how she meant to do the best she could for all her scholars.

"I'll help ye, Miss Mason," responded Joe. "I'll help you all I can," and then, the old mischievous twinkling coming again, he added, "I guess the rest of the boys won't trouble you much. They'll do pretty much as I want 'em to."

Joe was subdued and won by the power of kindness. And hard indeed must be the heart that kindness will not win.

Mungo Park's Moon.

Mungo Park was robbed by banditti on the 25th of August, 1796, when on his road from Koomo to Sebidoolco, and was stripped of everything.

"After they were gone," he says, "I sat for some time looking around me in amazement and terror. Whichever way I turned, nothing appeared but danger and difficulty. I saw myself in the midst of a vast wilderness, in the depth of a rainy season, naked and alone; surrounded by savage animals and men still more savage. I was five hundred miles from the nearest European settlement. All these circumstances crowded at once on my recollection, and I confess that my spirits began to fail me. I considered my fate as certain, and that I had no alternative but to lie down and perish. The influence of reflection, however, aided and supported me. I reflected that no human prudence or foresight could possibly have averted my present sufferings. I was indeed a stranger and in a strange land, yet I was still under the protecting eye of that Providence, who has condescended to call himself the stranger's friend.

"At this moment, painful as my reflections were, the extraordinary beauty of a moss, in fructification, irresistibly caught my eye. I mention this to show from what trifling circumstances the mind will derive consolation; for, though the whole plant was no larger than the top of one of my fingers, I could not contemplate the delicate conformation of its roots, leaves and capsula without admiration. Can that Being, thought I, who planted, watered, and brought to perfection, in this obscure part of the world, a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and suffering of creatures formed after his own image? Surely not! Reflections like these would not allow me to despair. I started up, and disregarding both hunger and fatigue, travelled forward, assured that relief was at hand; and I was not disappointed. In a short time I came to a small village."

A pleasing poetic version of this narrative was given in the Scottish Christian Herald many years ago, by the amiable and pious Robert Murray McCheyne.

Sad, faint, and weary, on the sand
Our traveller sat him down, his hand
Covered his wearied head;
Above, beneath, behind, around,
No resting for the eye he found—
All nature seemed at dead.

One tiny tuft of moss alone,
Mantling with freshest green a stone,
Fixed his delighted gaze;
Through bursting tears of joy he smiled,
And while he raised the tendril wild,
His lips o'erflowed with praise.

"Oh, shall not He who keeps thee green,
Here in the waste, unknown, unseen,
Thy fellow exile save?
He who commands the dew to feed
Thy gentle flower, can surely lead
Me from a scorching grave."

The heaven-sent plant new hope instilled,
New courage all his bosom filled,
And here him early along,
Till, with the evening's cooling shade,
He slept within the verdant glade,
Lulled by the negro's song.

Thus, we in this world's wilderness,
Where sin and sorrow, guilt, distress,
Seem undisturbed to reign,
May faint because we feel alone,
With none to strike our favorite tone,
And join our homeward strain.

Yet lifted in the bleakest wild
Of this dark world, some heaven-born child,
Expectant of the skies,
Amid the low and vicious crowd,
Or in the dwellings of the proud,
Meets our admiring eye.

From gazing on the tender flower,
We lift our eye to him whose power
Hath all its beauty given;
Who in this atmosphere of earth,
Have given it life, and form, and breath,
And brilliant hues of heaven.

Our drooping faith revived by sight,
Anew her pinion plumes for flight,
New hope distends the breast;
With joy we mount on eagle's wing,
With bolder tone our anthem sing,
And seek the pilgrim's rest.

THE LOWEST SPECIMENS OF HUMANITY.

Dr. Hyades, a Frenchman, who has been on a mission for his government to Terra del Fuego, finds that the natives are the lowest human beings in the scale of existence. The language contains no word for any number above three; they are unable to distinguish one color from another; they have no religion and no funeral rites; and they possess neither chiefs nor slaves. Their only weapons are bone pointed spears; and, as their country is naturally barren, they are obliged to live entirely on animal food. But they are not cannibals; they ill-treat neither their women nor their old people, and they are monogamous. —Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

The most interesting feature of yesterday's eclipse of the sun to those who were armed with good telescopes was the appearance in profile of the great mountain ranges on the eastern edge of the moon's disk. There are several places on the western hemisphere of the moon where a powerful glass will always show the serrated horizon line of the peaks and craters that lie close to the moon's edge; but when these same mountains are seen, as they were yesterday, with their outlines showing absolutely black against the white sun, their appearance is much more striking than usual. At moments when the air was steady, permitting the use of a high magnifying power, it was a grand sight to see the profiles of the gigantic ranges of the D'Alembert and Rook Mountains, and the Lunar Cordilleras, pictured with sharpest outline against this brilliant background. The whole forward edge of the moon was seen to be deeply notched and lined with sharp peaks, presenting a striking contrast to the perfectly even curve of the sun's edges. Even with a small magnifying power the outlines of the principal mountains could be clearly seen. In one place a broad dish-shaped valley was conspicuous, with a ridge of mountains on either side and a lofty peak in the centre, whose sharp conical form stood out from the blaze of sunlight behind it with beautiful distinctness. Here and there the edge of the moon appeared flattened and sometimes scalloped out, showing the presence of broad deep valleys sunk far below the general level.

The large mountain masses presented a particularly impressive spectacle just as they entered upon the sun's edge, peak after peak slowly moving into view, while the light streaming through the intervening valleys brought them into still greater prominence. Some of the mountains in this part of the moon rise to a height of 20,000 feet and there are valleys among them which in some cases appear to sink to an almost equal depth below the lunar surface. It is no matter for wonder, therefore, that this rugged region presented a grand appearance when cut out, as it were, in blackest silhouette against the sun.

There was a group of sun spots a little west of the centre of the sun, and the gradual concealment of the spots as the moon advanced over them, followed by their reappearance as it passed off, was an interesting feature of the telescopic observation of the eclipse.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

CHICAGO, March 16.—The Right Rev. Bishop Samuel Fallows of this city preached in the St. Paul Reformed Episcopal Church here, last night, upon the "Signs of the Times." He said it was a remarkable fact that the great mass of intelligent, far-seeing business men, politicians, and worldly-wise people generally could not or would not read the signs of the times in their bearing upon that far more important matter—the second coming of Christ. A great many of the important events which have happened in modern times were foretold, the speaker thought, centuries ago. He believed the events of to-day were as pregnant of indications as those of 1,800 years ago. The present condition of Egypt was, to the preacher, a sign and an evidence of the coming fulfilment of the prophecy that Egypt would be ruled by the Jews. He considered the domination of England equivalent to that, as it would be a control in the interests of the Jewish bondholders. Earthquakes, pestilence, and famines were prophesied as signs to be seen before the advent of Christ. The earthquakes in Italy, the approaching cholera pestilence, and the famines which have prevailed in Asia were the signs to meet these prophecies. It had been prophesied that infidelity would abound, and the Bishop thought the full measure of this prophecy had been fulfilled.

THE SURE FOUNDATION.

Build firm and sure, O soul,
Upon the Rock that cannot fall!
The storm is raging, and the gale
Shrieks round thee, fierce and wild and high.
The tempest mocks thy anguished cry.
Build firm and sure!

Build deep and strong, O soul!
Thou shalt no storm or jar or shock
Sway free from the unswaying Rock,
For deeper than earth's slightest stir
Thy sure Foundation doth abide.
Build deep and strong!

Build broad and high, O soul!
Thy temple shall be pure and fair,
And prayer and praise shall echo there.
The songs of faith shall upward rise
Like perfumed fires from sacrifice.
Build broad and high!

Build bravely on, O soul!
The Master's eye is on thee still,
Noting each thought of the will,
At step by step and stand by stand.
Thou reach'st at higher, holier ground.
Build bravely on!

THE JEWISH CONTRIBUTION.
LETTER FROM MR. OLIPHANT.

The brethren will perceive from the following interesting letter just received from Mr. Oliphant, that their efforts on behalf of the Jewish colonists of Palestine have been more influential for good than they could have anticipated, and are likely to have a further opportunity of an interesting character. This letter re-opens the door which Mr. Oliphant's last communication seemed for a while to close. It will be seen from other Jewish intelligence that the colonization movement is about to receive a new and large impetus from the Jews themselves. Our own work is but a trickling springlet, helping to feed a commencing stream which we hope to see shortly attain the dimensions of a mighty river. The fifth box of clothing (larger than the previous ones) is about two-thirds full of various articles. When fully supplied, we shall despatch to Mr. Oliphant, as before, together with a further remittance from the fund in hand. Mr. Oliphant's letter is as follows:—

HAIFA, Syria, Dec. 26, 1884.

Dear Sir.—The tulip which I had projected, to visit the Jewish colonies in Judea, was, unfortunately, prevented by an attack of rheumatism and opthalmia, which laid me up for some weeks. Two of these colonies are, however, amply provided for by Baron Rothschild, and, although the third is in need of some aid, it is an old-established colony, and its necessities are not nearly so pressing as those of a much smaller and more recently-established colony, which has been struggling on for some time, but the distressing condition of which is only of late date, and has just been brought to my notice by two of its leading members. This colony is called Tzaud Hamolo, and is situated on the shore of the Lake Huleh, or waters of Merom. It is composed of twelve families, numbering in all, thirty-six persons. These are all, for the present, huddled into one large room, which was the storehouse or granary of the native from whom they bought their land. This consists of an extent of about 500 acres, and as it is a most fertile tract, they would, doubtless, do well, if they had only money enough to buy themselves the stock necessary for its cultivation, and build themselves houses. They were apparently induced by the low price of the land, and the large amount of it which lay close together, to buy more than their means warranted; not foreseeing the expenses they would be put to, to provide food for themselves during the first year of occupation, and before they could gather the small crop they had the means of planting. This is now quite inadequate to their necessities, and they are reduced to some straits to provide themselves with the necessaries of life. I have, therefore, advanced them fifty Napoleons (£46) from the monies still in my hands, and have given them an abundant supply of clothing from the stores you so kindly sent, and of which, after supplying the needs of many poor Jews during the past year, a sufficient quantity remained to provide for all their immediate wants. The joy and gratitude of these poor people at this unexpected relief arriving at the moment of their greatest need, was most touching. The money they have received will be enough to carry them on until spring, when, as soon as the rains are over, I propose paying them a visit, and will then make them a further allowance out of the money I shall still have in hand. This colony is so small and utterly without other patronage, that I think it might, to some extent, be taken under the special protection of your society, if from time to time subscriptions were made for its benefit. I trust, therefore, that those who have hitherto so generously subscribed to assist the cause of Jewish colonization will not relax their efforts; the more so, as I may say that the timely aid which the amount originally entrusted to me afforded, was the means of preventing the extinction by actual starvation of the colony of Zimmarin, which now promises to flourish under the auspices of Baron Rothschild, and of calling into existence the small colony of six families which was mainly established with the funds of your society near the larger colony of Reshpinna, and which now enjoys the same protection and financial advantages which have been accorded by the Baron to the latter colony.

Yours truly,
LAURENCE OLIPHANT.

ANCIENT PALESTINE AND MODERN EXPLORATION.

"Line by line and touch by touch, the picture of ancient Palestine is being drawn, and in proportion as it grows in finish and begins to stand out on the canvas, public attention is the more attracted to it. The main object is to provide ample, accurate, and recent information as to the country, its architecture, topography, fauna, flora, and geology, and as to the social peculiarities (race, dress, customs, manners, language, and employments) of the various dwellers in that Holy Land of the Hebrew and the Christian, which is the theater of the events recorded in the Old and New Testaments. To Englishmen generally, the results of these researches are interesting, not so much in themselves as in reference to the light thereby thrown on the study of the Bible, and of Hebrew antiquities in general. The Egyptian Exploration Fund has employed M. Naville, the well-known Swiss antiquarian, to dig in the Delta, with the interesting result that he has identified Pithom, thus casting important light upon the Exodus route.

"Exploration has resulted in disposing of many crude objections to the Bible narrative. It has shown some curious expressions and episodes to be perfectly correct from an Oriental point of view. It has given a true coloring to our understanding of the Hebrew Scriptures, and has shown that the historic facts of such books as Kings or Chronicles with the geography of Joshua and of the New Testament are genuine and reliable, and that they can be checked by incidental notices in the history of Assyria or of Egypt, in monuments yet legible in Syria or Moab, in the ruins and ancient nomenclature still remaining in the Holy Land. From a purely human standpoint, which regards the Scriptures as ancient literature, exploration has beyond doubt done great service in destroying error, and in showing how hasty and crude are many of the views and objections of theorists who have written against the Bible. Huge libraries of controversy have been swept away when the spade of the excavator has dug up the truth.

"The earliest tribes of which we have any notice in Syrian history, are those which Abraham found in possession of the land. It might, perhaps, appear hopeless to expect that any contemporary records concerning these tribes should exist outside the pages of the Old Testament. Yet for the last twenty years the Egyptologists have been in possession of facts which prove the contrary, although it is only within the last few years that the British public in general has become aware of the fact. We may mention the Hittites, the Phœnicians, and the Amorites, as the earliest inhabitants of Syria and Palestine of whose existence we have monumental evidence.

"The survey of Mr. Conder in the examination of various rock-cut tombs of stone monuments erected by an illiterate race at an early period, and a study of the distribution of these remains and of the ancient fortified cities of the Canaanite in the Old Testament, seems clearly to indicate that Syrian dolmens, circles, and inscriptions were originally erected by the nations which Israel conquered and dispersed. The injunctions of the author of Deuteronomy, put in force by the later kings of Judah, included the destruction of these monuments; and we find that while in the region beyond Jordan, where the kings of Judah were powerless, the dolmens yet remain intact, they have entirely disappeared in those districts which were visited by the iconoclastic Jewish and the priests of Jehovah. It is very remarkable that one of the great dolmen centres is close to the probable site of the Mount where Jephthah's daughter.

"The old objections to the antiquity of the Hebrew Scriptures, which were founded on the supposition that writing was unknown until about the time of Pisistratus (550 B. C.), have (by the researches of Dr. Isaac Taylor) been swept away forever; and the newer argument representing the Hebrews as inferior in civilization, even to the Moabites, which was founded on the discovery of the Moabite stone, has shared the same fate since the recovery, at Jerusalem itself, of a beautifully engraved text (the Siloam inscription), in six lines, dating probably from the time of Hezekiah, and showing at both the character employed and the language used by Israel in the times of the kings of Juda before the captivity.

"The doctrines of the youngest German school, depending mainly on an exegesis which is not above sufficient to carry conviction, will assuredly be found, in many instances, both fanciful and unscientific, when they are weighed in the balances of a knowledge firmly based on a true comparative study of Hebrew antiquities.

"But it is not merely through the recovery of ancient cities, ancient monuments, and ancient writings, that material is to be collected. We have living commentaries to study in the East; we have the descendants of Hittites and Canaanites, with Oriental Jews and other ancient stocks, from whose manners, etc., we have much to learn. The student of literary Arabic lays down grammatical rules as to that rich but cultural language, which to himself in his study among his folio lexicons, appear to be immutable laws. The explorer, who lives among the peasantry from year to year, and who watches their life and hears them speak almost in the very tongue which poets and prophets used in the days of Isaiah, and in the time of Christ, thinks little of the fictions of the grammarian, when he can penetrate to the very heart and genius of the language.

"The work of the Palestine Exploration Fund has been important not only on account of a few genuine discoveries of primary importance, but also because of the destruction of a great mass of hasty and unfounded assertions. Those who have worked for the Society have not striven after the sensational. Men like Sir C. Wilson and Sir C. Warren have set truth and permanency before effect and popularity; and, however arduous be the way which leads to knowledge, it may safely be predicted that the work done in Palestine will outlast many brilliant theories and many popular delusions."—Captain C. R. Conder, R. E., in Contemporary Review.

The Promised Return.

[illegible] again and receive you unto myself; that where I am ye may be also.—John xiv. 3.

Another "word of promise" concerning the Church's "blessed hope." Orphaned pilgrims, dry your tears! Soon this morning hour will strike, and the sighs of a groaning and burdened creation be heard no more. Earth's six thousand years of toil and sorrow are waning; the millennial Sabbath is at hand. Jesus will soon be heard to repeat concerning all his sleeping saints what he said of old regarding one of them: "I go to wake them out of sleep!" Your beloved Lord's first coming was in humiliation and woe; his name was "the Man of Sorrows;" he had to travel on, amid darkness and desertion, his blood-stained path; a crucifix of thorns was the only crown he bore.

But soon he will come "the second time without a sin-offering unto salvation," never again to leave his Church, but to receive those who followed him in his cross, to be everlasting partakers with him in his crown. He may seem to tarry. External nature, in her unvarying and undeviating sequences, gives no indication of His appearing. Centuries have elapsed since he uttered the promise, and still he lingers; the everlasting hills wear no streak of approaching dawn; no sound is given in vain for the noise of his chariot wheels. "But the Lord is not slack concerning his promise;" he gives you "this word" in addition to many others as a keepsake—a photograph and assurance for the certainty of his return—"I will come again."

Who can conceive all the surpassing blessedness connected with that event? The Elder Brother arrived to fetch his younger brethren home! the true Joseph revealing himself in unutterable tenderness to the brethren who were once estranged from him—"receiving them unto himself"—not satisfied with apportioning a kingdom for them, but, as if all his own joy and bliss were intermingled with theirs, "Where I am," says he, "there you must be also." "Him that overcometh" says he again, "will I grant to sit with me on my throne."

Believer, can you not say, with some of the holy transport of the apostle, "Whom having not seen, we love?" What must it be when you come to see him "face to face," and that for ever and ever! If you can tell of precious hours of communion in a sin-stricken, woe-worn world, with a treacherous heart, and an imperfect or divided love, what must it be when you come, in a sinless, sorrowless state, with purified and renewed affections, to see the King in his beauty! The letter of an absent brother, cheering and consolatory as it is, is a poor compensation for the joys of personal and visible communion. The absent Elder Brother on the throne speaks to you now only by his Word and Spirit—soon shall you be admitted to his immediate fellowship, seeing him "as he is"—He himself unfolding the wondrous chart of his providence and grace—leading you about from fountain to fountain among the living waters, and with his own gentle hand wiping the last lingering tear-drop from your eye. To have an everlasting home with Jesus! "Where I am, there ye may be also." He has appended a cheering postscript to this word, on which he has "caused us to hope:"—"He that testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly."

Courtesy.

The innumerable fine and delicate threads which true courtesy weaves, as woof and warp, constitute the strength of the social fabric. Courtesy is love embodied, and rendered active and visible: and love attracts union and oneness, as when contiguous water-drops rush into bosoms, and form river and lake. Conventional observances may drive men into combinations, as external hoops force the staves to become the barrel and the cask. But the drawings of love will attract, even through impediment and barrier, like the magnetic influence that operates through the vessel upon the mimic floating swan.

Courtesy is essentially different from politeness, etiquette, manners. These may become mere remarks of supreme selfishness and hatred; and they may be only exhibitions for praise and profit. Courtesy has, indeed, no special form of manner, and yet never wars with suitable and decorous conventionalisms. Courtesy is inherent, and ever the same; but forms of politeness are shaped by accident; hence the etiquette now reigning may be destroyed in time, and the politeness of, to-day become rudeness or vulgarity.

Courtesy cannot be taught or learned; it cannot be put on or laid aside. Courtesy is felt—mere politeness seen. The former wins love, the latter respect. The one bows gracefully and profoundly; the other can lay down a life. To become polite, read Chesterfield; to become courteous, read the Bible. Abraham, the father of the faithful, and Paul the apostle of the Gentiles, bowed, indeed, with courtly grace, respectfully; but it was their courtesy, manifested in look, word, tone, manner, that revealed their heart-love and melted other hearts.

The writer was passing once along a narrow pavement. A young man in coarse apparel at our approach, stepped aside, with great alacrity, and into the mud edging the path. He did not bow, he waved no hand, he moved without grace, and yet the whole was evident courtesy.

After passing, the thought arose, should we not acknowledge and thank him for behavior so unusual in a young man in this brazen age? We went back. Offering our hand, we said, "Young man, shake hands with me!" "Certainly, sir, but why do you wish it?" "Because you are a kind-hearted fellow, and a true gentleman; you gave all the path to me!" "Sir, I would step into the gutter for an elderly man!" "God bless you, young man! May you become a believer in our Lord Jesus Christ, whose servant I profess myself: and may we meet in heaven, if we never meet on earth!"

Tears stood in the eyes of both; and when we said good-by, our hands seemed to be a love-tie binding our hearts.

Reader! "Be courteous!"

The Last Day.

To every thing beneath the sun there comes a last day—of all futurity this is the only portion of time that can in all cases be infallibly predicted. Let the sanguine, then, take warning, and the disheartened take courage; for to every joy and every sorrow, to every hope and fear, there will come a last day; and man ought so to live by foresights, that while he learns in every state to be content, he shall in each be prepared for another whatever that other may be.

When we set an acorn we expect it will produce an oak; when we plant a vine, we calculate on gathering grapes; when we lay plan for years to come, we may wish, and we can do no more, except pray that it may be accomplished, for we know not what the morrow may bring forth. All that we do know beforehand of anything is, that to everything beneath the sun there comes the last day—preparing to immortalize and unveil passing self-acts.

From this there is nothing to fear: from the neglect of it everything; for however alarming the discoveries of evil unsuspected, or perils unknown, may be, such discoveries had better be made now, while escape is before us, than in the day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, and escape will be impossible—that day which of all others, is most emphatically called—"the last day."

Editor Restitution:

Inclosed find two dollars to apply on the paper, and please excuse the few weeks delay in sending the money. I see a request in the paper for those in arrears for it to pay up. It is to be regretted that there is any necessity to occupy the paper with notices calling on subscribers for their dues. As the terms of the paper are advance pay, all who let it run over the time for which it is paid for, owe for it, and then if they don't pay up, (if they are able,) they fail to comply with the injunction Owe no man, but to love each other. Where love abounds, the golden rule predominates, and men do as they would be done by.

On taking up the last RESTITUTION, the first article that my eyes rested on, was headed, The do in remembrance of me. I was edified by the truthfulness of the article. This do in remembrance of me, as was shown in the article, was said when the old institution the passover was done away, and the new institution was being set up instead. But now we are left to form our own conclusion when to do this in remembrance of him. The old institution the passover was observed once a year in accordance to a well known rule. The new institution took the place of the old at the time that the old institution passed away by limitation, and nothing was said at the time about observing the new institution any more frequent than the old. Shall we then conclude that it is right and profitable to set forth the new institution much more frequent than the old institution was observed. More might be said touching the above sentence. This do in remembrance of me, but we remember that THE RESTITUTION is a good deal crowded with long articles.

Yours in the hope.

Editor Restitution:

Please find enclosed three dollars as my subscription for the good paper. I think it is our duty to keep it in circulation. It is both a warning and a witness. Truth is a more strange doctrine to-day than it was in Paul's day. Men are lovers of themselves, they do not regard the welfare of others, and there is no hope for the latter in this Gentile age. Were it not for the promises, we would truly be of all men most miserable. How I long for him, how you long, how we all wait. Be patient all ye that look. Watch, trim your lamps, be ready.

Yours in hope. J. A. WILSON.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find subscription. Thanks for the continuation of THE RESTITUTION, to me so long in advance of renewal. I enjoy the perusal of its pages so much. It seems that it grows better each year. The comforting and elevating sentiment that it is laden with, cannot fail to instruct the earnest and grasping Christian; steadily growing spiritual and becoming strong in the promises of Him who is to reign in righteousness on the earth, and we, if found faithful, may share with him the blessings of his kingdom. How seemingly slow people are in searching out these blessed truths. The blindness of man's theology seems too great to be overcome. Ever since I came to a knowledge of the saving truth I have at proper times, set forth the glorious plan to neighbors and friends. They say, yes, I know it is so recorded in the Book of all books, but the gospel ship you ask me to get sail in, is too narrow and contracted, so they step on board the large, popular ship of theology, to be launched they know not where, and seem content to trust their fate to the treacherous waves. Others are almost persuaded, but lack courage to bear the persecutions consequent upon being a peculiar people, working in the ordinances of God daily. But why need we be over anxious, when we know the purpose of God is to gather out a people for his name. He knows the true and tried ones—those who are as true to him as the needle is to the magnet, will honor his call-roll. Dear ones of the One Faith, may our names adorn his roll, is the prayer of your sister, striving for the Kingdom.

HIXON.—At St. Vincent, Ind. Hannah Hixon, aged 62 years.

Sister Hixon, having grown decrepit, was sent to the St Vincent, Ind., hospital for care, where the flickering life taper burned feebly out. The years previous her affliction, her neighbors and friends found in her a genial, kind heart, and willing hands to aid the weary and assist the poor, with song and praise ever on her lips to and of him who has promised as much to the faithful; and one joy especially great was to break forth—"Glorious things are spoken of thee, oh! city of God; beautiful thou art for situation, joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, the city of the great King. Her friend.

MRS. J. F. COOPER.

TANNER.—At Dayton, O. Amanda Tanner, wife of William E. Tanner.

The funeral of Sister Tanner was held at the family residence, No. 36 Liberty street, Friday, February 27, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Hoagland and Mr. John Paden, of Springfield, O., members of the Church of Christ, officiating. A large number of relatives and friends were present to pay their respects to the dead. The floral offerings bore the highest evidence of love. The deceased had been confined to her bed since last August. Patient bearing, to a wonderful degree through the long sickness, endeared her to all. She passed away peacefully and consistent with her religious belief. A beautiful floral pillow, bearing the words, "Asleep in Jesus," was placed at the head of the casket—the offering of her mother, brothers and sisters. The remains were interred in Woodland Cemetery.

Sister Tanner was born in Dayton, Montgomery County, Ohio, May 22nd 1846. Put on the raising name of Jesus Dec. 28th 1862. She was the fifth child of Brother William and Sister Catherine Fish formerly residents of Dayton.

It was her good fortune to be present at the last family reunion held at the residence of her brother L. S. Fish, in Cleveland, Ohio, three years ago, on which occasion the family "roll-call" had responses of "here," from the mother and ten children, the father having died January, 1867. Amanda's death is the first one among the children for twenty six years.

There were present of her family from abroad, her two brothers L. S. and A. B. Fish and sister Jessie Fish, all of Cleveland, Ohio, and Sister Benjamin Kauffman of Springfield, Ohio.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion into practice; obedience to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

IS MAN IMMORTAL?

"What saith the Scriptures?"—PAUL.

Assuming that the reader estimates the Bible to be the final test of all religious doctrine, we, in a friendly spirit, invite him to accompany us when we try this question by the standard both of our knowledge—Is man an immortal being? The author once reckoned man destined by nature to endless existence, as is commonly held by professing Christians in our day, with whom probably the reader entirely coincides in that. For many years, he who is responsible for these paragraphs never questioned what he had been taught when a boy, what he had heard in places of worship, and from learned professors of theology, while a student under their guidance. Blessed be God, he has said for a series of decades that intelligent persuasion induced him to bring his faith about man into comparison with what is written in the Book Divine. Perhaps the reader will favor him by looking on while an attempt is made to apply the supreme test to the popular doctrine; in other words, when an attempt is made to demonstrate that man's essential immortality is not as Scriptural as hitherto he may have imagined. It seems a thankless task to shake confidence in what has often been pronounced a fundamental article of Christian faith, indeed, of all true religion; it seems of that character, and yet surely it must be no trival service to a human brother to put him right on so vital a matter; for it will greatly, and, in our judgment, most beneficially alter his aim and method as one in need of salvation; and greatly alter likewise his estimate of Jesus Christ, and [illegible] serious function as the last [illegible]

[illegible] of us is immortal, common [illegible] appears to warrant the expectation that it will be placed by inspiration beyond all haze, like a mountain top in the pure light of heaven, and beyond all doubt. Men can express the idea with perfect clearness; infinitely more able, certain we may be, is the Spirit of God to do the same. How clearly other facts are made known; for example, that of God's existence and unity—that of our exceeding sinfulness—that of Christ's dying in our behalf—that of his second advent—that of inevitable ruin as awaiting those who reject him, and, to mention no more, this one, that they who welcome him now as their Savior shall be happy forever in his loving, adorable presence. Is it thus with man's immortality? Thus distinctly revealed, that not merely the philosopher and the scholar may reach assurance thereon; but that the wayfaring man though of slender capacity and stinted learning may not miss what the words are designed to convey.

In an inquiry of this kind, nothing can be fairer than to examine all the passages in which "immortal" and "immortality" occur, for it must be communicated in the language whereby the human mind would express, and is wont to express, the great conception; or by a description equivalent to what these terms impart to our understanding. In other language, by affirming that man is "immortal;" or by so speaking of his future destiny as to mean that.

Now, for our satisfaction, let us consider all the passages where the special words appear, and any passage, if such there is, where, though these terms may not be used, a description is given to deathlessness as the heritage of man, or, let us say, of a particular order in the great family, whoever may compose it.

The verses may be presented under the following heads:—

I. THOSE IN WHICH GOD IS THE SUBJECT.

1 Tim. vi. 16.—"Who only hath immortality," etc.

That it is God and not Jesus Christ, concerning whom the affirmation is made, seems to the writer beyond all question. In verse 13, we read,—"I charge thee in the sight of God, etc.," in verse 15, information is given us that God will yet "show" Jesus,—cause him to be manifested in regal glory to our world; and then partly in the same verse and partly in the 16th, the Apostolic teacher, by way of exalting the Supreme Being, who is Lord of all, enumerates some of his transcendent titles and attributes. Among his attributes, or the characteristics of his nature, "Who only hath immortality," is one; another is, "Whom no man hath seen or can see."—His invisibility, in different words. Now, the latter peculiarity cannot be ascribed to our Lord Jesus, for men have seen him, angels see him now within the veil, and the hour is approaching when "every eye" on earth shall see him; and therefore the description, so full and sublime, characterizes absolute, self-existent, Omnipresent Deity. It is he who only, or alone, "hath immortality."

This account of this Divine Being is parallel to language found at least three times in the Revelation of John; of which xv. 7, is a specimen—"God, who liveth forever and ever."

The meaning is, his being, and his alone, is inherently perpetual—for ever beyond the malign stroke of death. As it had no beginning, it can have no end. Any creature who is immortal, is so merely by the gracious concession of the Almighty, and enjoys while interminable ages run, the vast privilege as a gift from his hand. Its continuance absolutely depends on God's sustaining energy, on whose arm the heir of deathlessness hangs as the cluster is suspended from the vine-branch. Independent of him no creature can be, whether his life have a brief or an endless duration. The awful mystery about God is, that he must live. As to any created moral existence, the fact is, that it may, and if God pleases, shall abide forever; but only if it so pleases his loving, infinite, irresponsible will. No creature, however exalted in faculties, can claim immortality, beyond what God's promise, involving conditions of obedience of some kind, warrants. So that if it pleases him to make no promise, involving specific terms of that kind, he may at any moment submerge in unconsciousness what he has produced, by withdrawing his sustaining energy; and in such event not the least reproach could in justice be cast on his August Name. The rights of the Creator are as eternal as himself.

1 Tim. i. 17.—"Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, etc."

The word here rendered "immortal," is in Rom. i. 23, translated uncorruptible—"changed the glory"—perfection—"of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man." Each member of our family is mortal and corruptible: corruptible, because built up of fleshly organism, and so mortal. The limitless Potentate is neither. He is susceptible of no decay; he enfeebles not with advancing years, even ages of incalculable duration. The essence of his invisible being, infinitely diffused in space, is pure and unchanging in its unconditioned properties. From everlasting to everlasting he is God: the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

II. A PASSAGE DESCRIBING WHAT CHRIST HAS DONE, HAVING, OF NECESSITY, AN ULTIMATE REFERENCE TO THE HUMAN RACE.

"Come in the glory of Thine excellence.
Rive the dense gloom with wedge of clear light."

2 Tim. i. 10.—"Our Savior Jesus Christ—hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality (literally—incorruption) to light through the gospel."

(a) Christ hath abolished, or destroyed, death. In his own case this was done when he rose a conqueror of the grave, in a few hours after his crucifixion. "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Rom. vi. 9.

(b.) But Christ always occupied an official position, that of the Second Adam, and what he did was done as the world's Savior,—done especially as the head and representative of his own people. That is, his re-animation, presupposing his death as an offering for sin, secures, and is the pledge of, a resurrection similar to his own for all who accept him as their Redeemer, by Divine appointment. As their head he returned to life; they, the members of his body, shall come forth in due time. The first Adam brought in death—death necessarily without the hope of revival; Christ died for us, and soon thereafter resumed consciousness, and now we are warranted to anticipate the morning when, resurrected in an incorruptible form, we shall jubilantly exclaim, "O death where is thy sting?" We may sleep likely shall sleep in the great gloom of hades for a time; but when the Lord descends we shall be endowed with an existence over which, because of its "spiritual" and incorruptible formation, the king of terrors shall have no power. Any helpless, sinful child of man is, blessed be the God of mercy, instantly welcome to that prospect. Even now he may anticipate "eternal life"—feel as if he were immortalized already—feel that Christ has abolished death for him—feel as in the radiance of the glorious clime, seen to burst on his enraptured vision.

(c.) Thus "life and immortality" are brought to light by the gospel. This is the corruptible life, ending in death and dust; yonder is the incorruptible—a life such as our Lord's has been since he passed from the tomb.

(d.) Mark it well: This vast inheritance—"life and immortality," or immortal, because incorruptible, life, is a Gospel blessing. In fact, it is the essence, and the crown, and the transport of salvation. It is not disclosed by nature, nor is it involved in certain, victorious evidence by philosophy or science; neither in the law nor in the prophets is there any lucid, restful assurance of a world beyond this one where we dwell; it comes to us folded up in the sweet message of mercy—the "glad tidings of great joy"—and there alone it is to be found. The gospel does not certify us that we are immortal; it does announce for our comfort, however, that we may become so. For he that believeth in the Son of God, "shall not perish, but have everlasting life." Therefore says Jude to his fellow-disciples—"Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." Thus indicating the priceless truth, that "eternal life"—deathless being—is not a creation-gift, nor a reward of merit on our part, but an outcome of Christ's boundless compassion for guilty, death-deserving man. Rom. vi. 23.

III. PASSAGES WHERE MEN ARE DIRECTLY THE SUBJECT.

Rom. ii. 7.—"To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, and honor, and immortality: ("God will render"—ver. 6) eternal life."

If man in his essential nature was incorruptible, would he need to seek for incorruption? Honor he has not, and he is invited to seek for it; glory he has not, and he is encouraged to seek after it; incorruption he has not, and he is urged to strive for its possession, as one searches for a lost treasure, or battles for a coveted prize. If not sought for by patient continuance in well-doing, not one of them will be conferred on him. To those who enter on the resolute endeavor to obtain the three—to these who cultivate righteousness and sincerity of heart—to those who remain "faithful" unto death in Christ's love and service, God "the Judge of all," will at length impart, "eternal life," which includes in its mighty compass not merely permanence of being, but the glory and the bliss of heaven; said otherwise, it expresses an existence modelled after that of his Divine Son, who liveth for ever, clad in unfading splendor past all thought.

Immortality is therefore conditional. It cometh not as a natural property of man's being. It is a gift presented by the Supreme Sovereign of the universe to mortal man. They who accept it are enrolled among the heirs of "everlasting life;" whosoever declines the bounty, dishonors Christ the Life-Bringer, and at the Judgment-day will be consigned to the oblivion of non-being, out of which, O unsaved reader, think of it! no resurrecting fiat shall summon the outcast while unending cycles move onward.

1 Cor. xv. 53.—"This corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

At present saints are corruptible and mortal—these are the God-pronounced characteristics of our nature as it now appears: but on the Savior's return the children of God will be constituted incorruptible and deathless, through an exertion of the energy whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself. The sainted dead rise an; the regenerate living on the earth at the time will be changed into the [illegible] like him, for they shall see him as he is. As we have borne the image—likeness—of the earthy Adam, we shall also bear the image of the "heavenly"—"the Lord from heaven." Verses 47 and 49.

Immortality is, therefore, something reserved in the future for the holy, and is not now in their possession. Only those are heirs of it whom Paul addresses as "brethren;" and to whom he left this earnest admonition,—"My beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." Verses 50 and 59.

Luke xx. 36.—"Neither can they die any more; for they are equal to the angels ("of God in heaven."—Matt. xxii. 30), and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

That is, they are children—living, glorified products—of the resurrection spoken of in the preceding verse, "the resurrection from"—out from among—"the dead." Unless they have been "counted worthy," none shall see "that world"—the new age, the heavenly order of things—into which Christ promises to introduce his friends when the resurrecting and transforming moment arrives.

Here the word "immortality" is not employed, yet the thing is exactly and powerfully described—"neither can they die any more."

So again, we have demonstration that the privilege of entering on an endless term of existence, or immortality, rests on fixed and unalterable conditions. The aspirant must be "worthy" in order to receive it; and to the honor of that wonderful being who is Son of Man and Son of God, with a heart of tenderest love for each of us, may this momentous truth everywhere receive devout and prompt recognition!

These are all the passages where "immortal" and "immortality" appear in Scripture, with the words of our Lord added, and just considered, in which he distinctly expresses the idea and assurance of deathlessness for the worthy, without calling into his service either of the terms; a fact amply authorizing us in our grouping of Bible testimony on the great subject, to present the quotation from his reply to the Sadducean sceptics who aimed to confute and ridicule his teaching. Not one of those relating to man, and intended as a guide to his life, his aspirations, and his hopes, can for an instant be held to support the prevailing notion about the inherent perpetuity of our nature, let theologians and creed-builders compound it as they choose. Nothing more need be said on the question. The verses are left to speak for themselves. Positive proof of man's natural immortality there is not an atom. But proof there is, and plenty of it also, that any transgressor, death-doomed, may attain immortality by means of union and uniformity with the living Savior. "This is the record, that God hath given"—made a gift to us of—"eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—1 John v. 11.

W. G. MONCRIEFF.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

But seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.—Matt. vii. 33.

What constitutes the kingdom of God, is the question to be answered and settled. We answer in a few plain words. The earth, the cosmos, the world we now inhabit, with the curse removed or taken off, all things made new, the people all righteous, having been redeemed by the precious blood of Christ as a lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

Our first remark is that God will have the whole. It is his by creation, it is his by redemption, he will not share it with wicked men nor devils. What a monster that is. Where did mythology get it? Fancy that he has ported Tartarus, dug a great steep pit, exalted it up high, and filled it with boil fire and brimstone; a place to torture the souls of damned immortal ghosts to all eternity. Enough of this; our heart sickens and recoils at such blasphemy. The devil and all his works are to be destroyed in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone which is the second death. He will not quite do so. Soon an angel (Jesus Christ) will come down from heaven with a great chain in his hand, will lay hold on that old serpent, the devil and Satan, and bind him for a thousand years, and shut him up in prison and set a seal upon him that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years be ended.

Let us look at the bright side of this grand and sublime scene before us, as the Scriptures present it to our enraptured vision.

Christ has come just as he went away, the literal personal Jesus, just as the angel declared to the men of Galilee. The righteous dead have been raised—not ghosts nor disembodied souls—but real literal live men, made immortal by the power of God through faith and obedience to the gospel. The kingdom is set up in its mustard-seed form; Christ sits upon the throne of his father David and reigns over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there is no end.

We have the work of restitution fairly inaugurated; the jarring elements which are now in hostile commotion are hushed to quietness and peace! To a professor of Gentile theology, our views of a literal tangible kingdom, are exceedingly distasteful, and there is a stitch loss somewhere. We have only to say to our esteemed orthodox friend, if you will take your Bible and study its sacred pages in good earnest, with an ardent desire to understand them, it will be to you a new book.

Dear friend, we are in earnest; will you try it? If you will, our word for it you will say the half was never told us. What a sublime thought that the curse taken off, nature bound for a thousand years, the earth restored to its original glory and beauty as when it came from the hand of God, its original Divine Architect. The thought is too grand and glorious for our feeble fallen capacity to comprehend, and yet it is a matter of Divine revelation, plain and clear. Our trouble in the main is brought upon us by listening to poor fallen humanity, instead of carefully studying God's inspired word of truth, and abiding by its teachings.

There is excitement over Mr. Cleveland's inauguration as president over these United States, and it will be grand; but it will dwindle into utter insignificance compared with the inauguration of the Son of God on David's throne, when he shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.

Look at the subject we have in hand in whatever light we may, it is brim full of strong consolation to the humble follower of the meek and lowly Jesus.

It is sixty-seven years since we enlisted under the banner of the Prince of Life. We have never regretted it. Glory be to God, we are still enabled to hold on our way, with the kingdom full in view. We began with what light we had or could get. We have made several changes, first as a despised Methodist, but anchored at last on the Rock. When we heard Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ, we were baptized in an intelligent—the one Abrahamic—faith, into the name of the holy ones for the forgiveness of our sins. The word is, when we follow on to know then shall we know.

We are asked what we think of the stability of human governments, we answer in the language of God's wonderful prophet, They shall become like the chaff of the summer threshing floor, which the wind shall blow away, and no place be found for them. But the kingdom which the God of heaven is about to set up is to stand forever, as lasting and as permanent as the throne of the Eternal One.

What a strange contrast. There will be no dying in God's holy, everlasting kingdom; it will be a kingdom of immortal beings. The best of all, Jesus will be King in that kingdom, and will reign for a thousand years and for ever and ever and the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven will be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and they are to take the kingdom and possess it, even for ever and ever.

Well, you have been talking about these things ever since we knew you, about forty years and it has not yet come. This was the cry in Noah's day, but the flood came and took them all away. So shall it be when the Son of man shall be revealed. Every iota of God's word will be exactly fulfilled, the great question with the writer is, Am I ready? and with those who may read these few imperfect thoughts, Are we ready to enter God's holy kingdom, and to reign in millennial glory for one thousand years, and for the age of ages?

Qualifications necessary in order to enter the kingdom of God. An intelligent faith—or the one Abrahamic. Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. An intelligent baptism, buried with Christ by baptism into death, like as Christ was raised up by the glory, or power, of the Father, so shall we walk in newness of life.

Our creed. Deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God. Some things baptized believers of the gospel cannot do without endangering their salvation. They cannot indulge in covetous, close-fisted practices, for covetousness is idolatry. They cannot take usury, unlawful interest for the use of money loaned. This is a violation of both Divine and human law, which constitutes a man a sinner, for sin is the transgression of law, so saith the word of God. We may not indulge in any of the customs of this wicked Gentile age; the children of the kingdom are a called and separated people, touch not, taste not, be ye holy for I am holy, are the words of Infinite wisdom.

A word and we close. The kingdom of God is being dwelt upon by various writers and by our brethren of the one Abrahamic faith. Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

Your brother seeking a preparation and striving to enter God's holy and everlasting kingdom.

Colonization of Palestine by Jews.

In one of the leading London synagogues, a Jewish Rabbi (L. L. Loeae) at the close of a long congratulatory address, alluded to Sir Moses Montefiore's favorite scheme of encouraging the cultivation of land among his Jewish brethren in Palestine.

The Rabbi said Sir Moses might live to see the fond wishes of his heart fully realized. The project had been received with great enthusiasm by many thousands of people living in Russia, Roumania, Austrian Galicia, France, and some parts of Germany. Sir Moses had the satisfaction of receiving on Tuesday, Sept. 23, a delegate from twenty-three congregations of Russia, who presented him with an album containing the fervent wishes and prayers for the prolongation of his life, signed by 1,562 representatives of fifty societies, bearing the name 'The Friends of Zion,' whose object is the cultivation of land in Palestine. They celebrated his centenary by holding a general meeting of the members in the town of Kattowitz, in Upper Silesia, a place chosen by them on account of its vicinity to the frontiers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, for the purpose of arranging all the particulars referring to a Sir Moses Montefiore Institution, having for its object the cultivation of land in Palestine.

According to a letter of invitation which I received from them, they will appoint a central committee in one of the towns near the frontiers of the countries I just named, and an executive committee in the Holy Land. From statements made in the report given to me by the delegate, it appears that there has been established in the Holy Land within the last year a new colony of twenty families bearing the name Petach Tikvah, that there are now twenty families occupied in agricultural pursuits in a place called Yessod Hamaala, situated near the Waters of Merom, not far from Safed, and sixteen families in a place called Gadara, near the colony Petach Tikvah.

The same documents also show that thirty families from Roumania, possessing ample means of their own, recently proceeded to the Holy Land with the intention of buying land there for cultivation. Four colonies, called Rosh Pinah, Rishon de Zion, Samarin, and Ekron, have been taken under the special protection of a great and noble-hearted man in France, whose name the delegate requested should not be mentioned, and a society bearing the name 'Chovorey Zion' (the Friends of Zion), in Warsaw, will, by the sale of 100,000 impressions of a beautifully-executed portrait of Sir Moses, be enabled to accumulate a fund large enough to establish a colony in commemoration of his centenary. There is every reason to believe that the time will come when all difficulties thrown in the way of the new settlers in Palestine will be removed."

Confirmatory of the confidence expressed by the speaker in the closing sentence, the following appears in the Jewish World:

"A correspondent, writing to us from Constantinople on the 6th inst., says: 'According to reliable information which I have received from a trustworthy source, the Council of Ministers discussed a few days ago the subject of the settlement of Jews in Palestine. After considerable deliberation, in the course of which Osman Pasha, the hero of Plevna, warmly supported a petition which had been addressed to the Government by a body of Jews, the Cabinet determined to extend the right of settling and of acquiring landed property in Palestine to all Jews, whether from Russia, Roumania, or other countries, on condition that they become Turkish subjects. An intimation to this effect will shortly be published in the official journals. Osman Pasha, who is known to be well disposed towards the Jews, has on several occasions discussed with me the question of the colonisation of Palestine by the Jews, and the position of the Jews already settled there. On every occasion his Excellency manifested the utmost interest in the subject, and when I called his attention to the difficulties imposed on the admission of the Jews into the Holy Land, he promised to do his utmost to meet our wishes. Osman Pasha has thoroughly kept his word.'"

A full report of the Conference at Kattowitz, appears in the Jewish Chronicle. It says:

"The recent Conference, held at Kattowitz, Upper Silesia, is likely to have a considerable influence upon the Colonisation of Palestine by Jews. The delegates were merely men filled with religious aspirations. They were plous men of a distinctly practical turn of mind, many having large means of their own, and commanding considerable influence among the Jews of Russia and elsewhere. The delegates, who had travelled to Kattowitz from all parts of Europe, comprised Rabbis, publicists, lawyers, financiers, merchants, and manufacturers, several of them being men of opulence. The address of Dr. Pinsker, the President, was an eloquent advocacy in favor of persecuted Jews turning to the land of their fathers for rest and hope. We are assured that the Turkish Government regards the movement with no unfavorable eye. It requires only that its sovereign rights shall be strictly maintained and respected by the colonists. An influential Provisional Committee has been formed, and collections have been set on foot in all the Jewish communities throughout the world. Although in London the movement has not been 'recognised' in any influential quarter, collecting boxes by hundreds are being distributed, and a local Committee formed with very promising results."—Christadelphian.

THEORIES OF INSPIRATION.

In again looking over the two articles which have lately appeared in THE RESTITUTION under the above caption by Bible Student, we see nothing that for ourselves we feel disposed to criticise. It seems to us that it was not so much the writer's object to theorize about any supposed modus operandi of the Holy Spirit, in its mysterious and wonderful operations on the mental faculties of the Holy Seers, as to establish the fact that all Scripture is divinely inspired. His own statement seems to make his aim emphatically clear. He first quotes, from the articls under review, certain theories about inspirational power, in its supposable modus operandi on the minds of the sacred penman, and then remarks: "While for some inscrutable reason of Providence we are in no respect enlightened on this particular feature of inspiration, we are not warranted in doubting the fact itself; that the divinely chosen writers spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost,' and that their words are those of Divine authority."

That the Bible as a whole—or, to use an old word, in its entirety—is an inspired revelation was a more important question to the writer, than any inspirational theory as to how the Holy Spirit imparted this revelation. On "Theories of inspiration," as to a modus operandi, we fully concur with an esteemed and able correspondent in his communication in another column. On the extent of inspiration we believe, so far as the original documents were concerned, that they were inspired as a whole. Errors made by transcribers are, of course, altogether another matter.

THERE are wars and rumors of wars. England has already a war in Egypt on hand, with a strong probability of having an additional one with Russia in Asia. In Canada there is a serious rebellion in the Saskatchewan region in which, according to the latest news, the Indians are quite likely to take part with the rebels; and the Central American republics are also at war with each other. We append some views from the London Press on the situation in the East, taken from a very recent paper among our exchanges:

VIEWS OF THE LONDON PRESS.

The Standard says: "The calling out of the reserves is not such a serious matter to the industry of the country as mobilizing the Continental army. The entire reserve force and militia comprise only 160,000 men. This number can easily be spared from the aggregate population and will not seriously interfere with trade or agriculture. All the preparations now being made now indicate that the Cabinet consider it more probable that war will be declared than that an amicable settlement of the difficulty will be reached. The nation is in a humor to settle business at once and for all. The general impression is that England is better prepared for war now than she has been for years. She can continue the war in the Soudan and also send seventy thousand men to India. India was never before so tranquil. The Soudan campaign proves that the troops are still what they were in the old days. Trade has been treated to such a regime of self denial that there is little to lose through war. Never was there such a time in the present generation, when the nation would so calmly accept as necessary that which she would never accept as her choice."

The Standard continues: "We appear to be on the verge of what is likely to draw into its vortex the whole civilized world. There is no tendency to boasting, but a firm, national conviction that there must be an end of yielding. Negotiations might tend to peace. It would be a matter of regret if Russia should allow the whole fabric of government, finance and society to fall to the ground with a crash. Still nothing less is expected. If, owing to the madness of their rulers, England and Russia come to blows, the peace of the world would be broken.

The Times says: "When Disraeli called out the reserves in 1878 Earl Derby retired from the ministry. Earl Derby's opinion, therefore, and his experience were unique. The risk of a rupture with Russia are now greater than they were then. The Czar's forces are almost at the gate of Constantinople. Even if the Cabinet were disposed to preserve peace by concession after concession, it is now clear that such a policy is unsafe as it would be dishonorable. Yielding would alienate the Afghans and degrade us in the eyes of all the people of the East, without in reality averting war, which would only be postponed at the most for three years. The delay would only benefit Russia, to the detriment of England. Whatever frontier shall be traced we must protect the Afghans. It will always be in the power of Russia to provoke a quarrel unless we convince her that it will not be to her advantage to do so. A compromise in the present state of affairs will be represented as a Russian victory, and would produce opposite convictions in Russian and Afghan minds. We are persuaded that if Russia, reckoning upon a want of spirit and resources in England, is preparing herself for war, it will be in order for her to test the strength of the cohesion of her vast Empire which will bring the dreams of her ambitious statesmen and soldiers to a cruel ending."

ABRAHAM.

"And after it was said (to the woman of the Lord) came unto Abraham in a vision, saying, Fear not Abraham; I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward." Gen. xv. 1. "Know ye therefore, brethren, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." Rom. viii. 7.

These two passages of the Scripture, seem to explain and confirm each other, and the similarity of the ideas, leads us to consider that the former passage was intended by God, to illustrate to Abraham the character of the blessing which had been promised to him, while he was yet in Mesopotamia. "And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii. 3. Is not this the covenant and the promise so often referred to by Peter and Paul, in their preaching and writing, as being fulfilled unto themselves and to those unto whom they spake and wrote? I will quote Peter's words to the Jews which were assembled in Solomon's porch: "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant, which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham: and in thy seed, shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." Acts iii. 25, 26. Peter's reply to the inquiring multitude on the day of Pentecost, was expressive of the same general idea. "Then Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit, for the promise is unto you and your children and to all them that are afar off; even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Acts ii. 38, 39.

Now hear Paul to the Jews and Gentiles at Antioch in Pisidia. "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he has raised up Jesus again, as it is written in the second Psalm, Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee." Acts xiii. 32, 33. This is a most interesting chapter to read, the whole of it.

Again, what Paul wrote to the Galatians. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree; that the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit, through faith." Gal. iii. 13, 14.

Again: "He that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted unto him for righteousness; even so David describeth the blessedness of the man, to whom God imputeth righteousness, without works; saying, blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only? or upon the uncircumcision also?" "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not the God of the Gentiles also? Yes, of the Gentiles also." Rom. iv. 5-9. iii. 28, 30. From the foregoing apostolic preaching and writing, and much more of the same import, that is written in the New Testament, is it not plain that this gospel of God, the glad tidings of the forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ, was the fulfilment of the promise made to Abraham in Mesopotamia? "And in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." That this was the gospel "promised aforetime by his prophets in the Holy Scriptures." Rom. i. 2. This was according to the great commission; "Go ye therefore and teach all nations." Matt. xxviii. 19; and the same according to Luke. "And that repentance and remission of sins, should be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Luke xxiv. 47. This glad tidings was that which "eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man." 1 Cor. ii. 9. "For the way into the holiest of all, was not made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing." Heb. ix. 8. But when "this man has offered one sacrifice for sins forever, we have confidence to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he has consecrated for us through the vail, that is to say his flesh." Heb. x. 12, 19, 20.

Now, my reader, please consider with me, how great is the blessing of the remission of sins. It is nothing less than life from the dead. It is the power of his resurrection. Notice what Paul says, when he has spoken of the blessing of Abraham coming upon the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, "That we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." Gal. iii. 14. Also, "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus Christ from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11. And further as to the remission of sins, when pardon is granted to persons in this world, who have been convicted of sins against society or individuals or the state it involves necessarily the remission of the penalty adjudged against them for their crimes. So also, it is concerning sin against God; as is so many times stated in various ways, in the Scriptures. The penalty for sin, is remitted through Jesus Christ.

"Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." John i. 29. "But now once in the end of the world, hath appeared to put away sin, by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. ix. 26. "By the which will, we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ, once for all." "For by one offering, he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified." Heb. x. 10, 14. Now as "the wages of sin is death," "and sin when it is finished bringeth forth death," "and the soul that sinneth, it shall die;" the remission of sin necessarily involves the resurrection from death, unto an incorruptible life, with all the blessings attendant upon this "unspeakable gift."

How many are now preaching the gospel for the remission of sins? "Preaching repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Acts xx. 21. Alas: how many are preaching broken cisterns, that can hold no water. These better be cast away, and we return to the fountain of living waters, and build upon the sure foundation lain in Zion.

"THEORIES OF INSPIRATION."

"O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings. Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions rather than godly edifying which is in faith. Charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words, to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers. But foolish and unlearned (that is unlearned questions) avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes."—Paul to Timothy and Titus.

"Theories of inspiration" is not a Bible phrase. It is not therefore a Bible topic or question. It is an "untaught question" which as we see, Paul admonished Timothy and Titus to "avoid," giving as a reason that they "do gender strife" among Brethren. Surely what was law to them is law to us who profess the same faith, and to follow the same Scriptures as they.

Permit me, an aged Brother in years, and for more than forty years trying to walk in the truth and to keep the faith of the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, brief space to express my regret and dissent from the discussion of the series already begun entitled "Theories of Inspiration." Surely it is, in such cases, a wise rule, that when the Bible speaks we may speak, and when the Bible is silent, it becomes us to hold our peace, remembering, too, Peter's admonition, "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." This again limits us to Bible speech or Bible silence as the case may be. So that our plain duty is prescribed to us, and if we would please God in such matters we do so by abstaining from evil (i. e. from what is forbidden) and cleaving to that which is good. The word inspiration occurs in the Bible, twice only. Job says chapter xxxii. 8; "The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding." and in Tim. iii. 16; we read when properly translated, "All Scripture given by inspiration of God," etc.

This exact use of the word shows how free the Bible writers and their Holy Inspirer were from propounding and debating "Theories of inspiration." Why cannot we, who claim to be walking in their steps, copy their used on and imitate their becoming reverence and modesty? Will thoughtless and ignorant men always flaunt their pride and folly in the face of God, by assuming to be wise above what is written." The word "Theory" is not to be found in the Bible. God deals not in "theories." "He speaks and it is done. He commands and it stands fast." With him it is, "not yea and nay," but always "yea and amen." It is not so with men. They deal in theory, conjecture, speculation, invention, etc., which can never rise to the level of the Divine revelations. Hence they are more "commandments and traditions and doctrines of men" and are forbidden in the word of God as unprofitable and vain, and are to be shunned and "avoided." "What is the chaff to the wheat." Of the myriad of the sects and churches which make up "Christendom" (so called) each is built on some human theory, which cannot be found in the book of inspiration. May we not ask what possible profit to the brethren, or to the interest of truth to discuss and decide over so plainly, that the word of God is plenarily, partially or verbally inspired? Does it not suffice for us to be informed, that "Holy men of old, spoke or wrote, as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." That all Scripture given by inspiration at God, is profitable for doctrine, reproof," etc.

Should we not therefore forbear, to speak and to dogmatize, as some do, on a subject in which God has thought proper to keep silent, to wit: the mode of Divine Inspiration. Secret things belong to God, but things revealed, to his servants and their children. If we will adhere to this safe rule, we shall not wisely. Let us then forbear any further agitation of all untaught questions, which as we have seen, minister questions rather than godly edifying, and tends to the subversion of the faith. Will not time and space be both thus economized, and leave room for more practical and useful topics which will edify the brethren and better prepare us for the speedy coming of the Lord.

Faithfully submitted.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The usual fortnightly meeting was held Wednesday evening in the Y. M. C. A. building. Hugo Friedrichs, Gotha, Germany, and W. C. Jones, Cleveland, were elected members.

A piece from the coffer in the king's chamber of the Great Pyramid was exhibited. It is of red granite, highly polished, and is similar in appearance to specimens from the Temple of the Sun at Heliopolis, Pompey's Pillar and Cleopatra's Needle.

Letters were read from Rev. H. G. Wood, upon the Egyptian cubit preserved in the Turin Museum; from Professor F. Hess, on the late eclipse; from Rev. E. P. Ingersoll, on the identity of Israel with the Anglo-Saxons; from Professor W. A. Rogers, on the standard yard bar, which he is making for the society; from Professor A. Abbott, criticising Mr. Beswick's paper on "The Metrology of Coins or Values."

A paper by Mr. James Simpson, of Edinburgh, Scotland, upon the pyramid and British inch was read. He shows that the pyramid inch is only one-thousandth longer than the British, and that by this measure alone can the astronomical or time relations be accurately determined. He shows that the pyramid inch also fits other measures of the interior of the pyramid. The limit of variations of the year is somewhere about one hundred seconds. The pyramid inch in its perfect exactitude can only be obtained by knowing what was the exact length of the year at the time of the setting up of the pyramid. The paper will be published in the International Standard for discussion.

A pamphlet sent by Commander S. R. Franklin of the Naval Observatory at Washington was read. It contained communications concerning the proposed change in the time for beginning the astronomical day. The conclusion of the department is that notwithstanding the fact that England has made the change beginning the astronomical day at midnight corresponding to the civil date, the United States Naval Observatory will make no change until the ephemerides are constructed in accordance with the recommendation of the recent International Meridian Conference.

A pamphlet sent by Professor C. Piazzi Smyth and written by Mr. R. Courtenay of the Bombay civil service was discussed. The work is entitled "The Two Witnesses—The Bible and the Great Pyramid."

The author writes thus: "With one solitary exception—that of the Battle of Waterloo, which is absolutely required to serve as a fixed point in chronology—history has not influenced in the smallest degree the determination of any length, or height, or angle, and yet from the pyramid has been evolved a long series of events, the most important in the history of the world since the beginning, more than 2,500 years ago, of the times of the Gentiles—the era of Nebuchadnezzar; the fall of Nineveh; the union of the crowns of Media and Persia under Cyrus; the very day of the accession of Alexander the Great; the birth of our blessed Lord and his crucifixion; the birth of Mohammed; the taking of Jerusalem by Omar; the Battle of Waterloo; the eighteenth centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter; the fall of the Pope's temporal power and the proclamation of his infallibility.

I have shown that the Book of Daniel and the Great Pyramid are one, and that both point emphatically to 1897 as the termination of the times of the Gentiles. Far be it from me to assert that in that year "the world will come to an end." I look for that event to happen not before but after the millenium, and even then, when this world has been renovated and purified by fire, "we, according to his promise, look for a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness," (2 Peter iii. 13), but I do expect that in 1897 the Turks will have been expelled from Palestine, and perhaps Antichrist may have appeared on the scene. We have reached the time when the progress of events should be anxiously watched. A notice was given of a very interesting work which was lately appeared, confirming the theory of the late Abbe Moigno, a distinguished member of our Institute. It is entitled "The Store City of Pithom and the Route of the Exodus," by Edward Naville of the Egyptian exploration Fund.

Everyone is familiar with the record how the children of Israel "built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Rameses." It is the former of these cities that M. Naville has discovered, at Tel-el-Maseatah, on the Sweetwater Canal. The sanctuary of the god Tum, from whom it was named Pitum (the abode of Tum); also large numbers of massive chambers, with unusually thick walls, without doors or windows. These chambers M. Naville identifies as the storerooms built for Pharaoh, in which he stored his grain and provisions on the border of the empire. That the chamber belonged to Pithom and not to any other store city is abundantly proved by inscriptions of Rameses, the oppressor, himself. The fact of the identity of Succoth with Pithom is shown by the analogy of other phonetic changes into Hebrew and Greek. This locates Succoth or Pithom as the first halting place of the Israelites on their exodus. This double discovery shows the correctness of Abbe Morgan's theory that the route of the exodus must have been by way of the Wady Tumilat, while the miraculous passage of the sea must have taken place close to Lake Timsah, then its ancient bed.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BIBLICAL RESEARCH.

Assyriology has in late years received so much substantial additions as it has through the thousands of inscriptions which Hormuzd Rassam unearthed out of the archives of the great temple of the sun in Sippara (Abu Habba), and out of the library of the great Nebo temple at Borsippa (Birs Nimrud). The authorities of the British Museum, to whom the examination and cataloguing of this large collection was entrusted, have done a most excellent work, as is especially seen by one of the publications that is the fruit of this study namely, the "Selection of Assyrian and Babylonian Inscriptions," edited by Major-General Sir Henry Creswicke Rawlinson, assisted by Mr. T. Pinches. A German reviewer, in speaking of the value of this new collection of inscriptions, gives the following interesting data: "The Babylonians, like the Chinese, were essentially a literary people, and every event in their life was perpetuated in brick inscriptions. The recently discovered literature is, therefore, not of a merely historical character, but shows us great a variety as does the present time. It embraces tablets on religion, botany, zoology, astronomy, and even works of fiction, fables and stories, as also most important class of philological works, such as grammars, lexicons and bilingual handbooks, that refer not only to the language of Babylon, but also of the surrounding peoples." In Rawlinson's work, a number of those grammatical tablets have been published, and these belong to the most important in his selection, especially as they not only throw new light on the character and history of the great Babylonian libraries, but also furnish excellent material for further linguistic research. For a number of years the researches did not bring to light any lexicographical and grammatical works, and the existence of such was doubted, as it was thought that Assurbanipal, when founding the great library at Nineveh, whose contents were copies of older Babylonian works, had destroyed the older libraries. The discoveries at Rassam show that such was not the case. Between the Assyrian and the Babylonian documents there is considerable difference, especially as the latter do not, as do the former, always represent the king as the writer, but mention the true writer, as also the date of composition. In the volume published there is a syllabary of the first year of Cyrus, the King of the Lands," (538 B. C.) and one of the ten years of Artaxerxes (455 B. C.) and others dating down to 24 B. C.—N. Y. Independent.

Money.

The "nobleman who went into a far country" will return and reckon with his servants (Luke xix). He will reckon with them for time, and strength, and influence, and what of money? Has he nothing to do with this? or is it to be thrown at his feet to be wrapped up in a napkin, and returned as it was given? It has been used, but how? It has furnished handsome houses, and bought choice specimens of art; paid for sumptuous entertainments, and made Christian women look very unchristian in their expensive dress. It has built elegant conservatories, brought orchids and exotics from distant lands, and helped the followers of a crucified, thorn crowned Savior to surround themselves with beautiful sights and musical sounds, and sweetest fragrance before they reach the promised land! It has encompassed them with multiplied indulgences and abounding luxuries. But what has been spent for the Master's service? Is it too sordid a thing to present to him? Is there no bank for the gold and silver that bears interest beyond time? Is there no investment for eternity? When the servants are called for, can it be that the stewards of money—God's money will be found waiting?

O, Christians! Christ and the bridegroom is coming, the Judge is at the door! Will you show him your accumulated treasures, your well-filled coffers and satisfactory balances, and say, "There is Thy talent?" Or will you point to the impathered souls—once lost and outcast, and miserable—and say, "I found them in the streets and lanes, in the highways and hedges, and compelled them to come in, that Thy house might be filled?"

SCENERY OF PALESTINE.

One who has always lived in the Lebanon mountains, in the coast towns, or in the great cities such as Damascus and Jerusalem, can not realize the wealth of natural beauty of which Palestine is possessed. Even this oppressed and poverty-stricken country has fertile fields and broad plains, rich soil free from stones, beautiful groves, and far reaching landscapes, such as would be praised if found even in the fairest lands of the globe. The sea of Galilee is more like a work of art than like natural formation. Its beauty is developed by study, like that of Niagara, or like that of the lakes of Switzerland or Scotland. The silent hills about it clad with verdure, the shadows moving over its surface, the numerous flocks on plain and mountain-side, the water-fowl sporting in bay and inlet, men and animals loitering on the shore, here and there in the fields a ploughman or a shepherd, and, most inspiring of all, Hermon down in the north, overlooking the whole, form elements sufficient to enrich any landscape; but in this case we have sacred associations which throw a special charm over the whole.—From East of the Jordan.

The district of Badgheis, at present claimed by Russia for herself and by England for Afghanistan, is a large wedge-shaped tract of upland between the Heari and Murghab rivers, extending from Sarakhs and Penjdeh on the north to Kuhsan and Herat on the south. Its northern half presents the appearance of a vast, dreary plateau, stiflingly hot and dusty, swelling gradually up into successive ranges of low hills which occupy its whole southern portion. These hills shelter countless bands of Turcoman robbers, whose ceaseless incursions make the open country almost uninhabitable. The whole tract near the hills is studded with "towers of refuge," i. e., small turrets of dried clay, with one narrow aperture, which the occupant closes in. Major James Abbott, of the Bengal Artillery, who crossed this wild region at the risk of his life during his adventurous journey to Khiva, in 1840, conjectures its name (which he writes "Badkhiss," or "Bunkhiss,") to be a corruption of Bacchus, a very ironical title for a district whose people neither make nor drink any wine at all.—New York Times.

News Items.

GENERAL GRANT.

NEW YORK, March 30.—General Grant is no better this morning, though his throat is somewhat more comfortable. He arose at an early hour and partook of a small cup of bouillon for breakfast and went to his office, where, propped up with pillows and wrapped in blankets, he listened to the reading of the morning papers. It is reported this afternoon that the doctors of the General begin to feel alarmed, least a fatal termination of the disease may occur sooner than anticipated. It is even hinted that General Grant may not survive more than a day or two.

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

LONDON, March 30.—It is reported today in newspaper circles that the prospect for a peaceful solution of the Russo-Afghan question has greatly improved during the past twelve hours.

SUAKIM, March 30.—The convoy which left here at an early hour this morning, in charge of McNeill's scouts, to keep open that the whole of Osman Digna's force has been withdrawn from the surrounding country and is now concentrated at Tamanieb, where they propose giving battle to General Graham. El Mahdi has sent large reinforcements to the Arab garrison at Berber. Mount Hamund, to the north of Berber, has been strongly fortified by the enemy.

The French troops in Tonquin have met with a disastrous repulse at the hands of the Chinese, and a Paris dispatch to-day announces that France will at once declare war against China, forward 60,000 additional troops, and march an army against the city of Pekin.

LONDON, March 30.—A Paris dispatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company states that war with China will be officially declared to-day. Fifty thousand reinforcements will be forwarded, and the army ordered to march to Pekin. It is expected Admiral Courbet will bombard Canton. The Figaro states that the French killed and wounded in the fight at Langson number 1,200. Some papers favor impeaching the Ministry.

A Little Rope.

I found it here—a worn-out thing,
All mildewed with time, and wet with dew.
'Tis a little thing, ye would pass it by
With never a thought, or word, or sigh;
Yet it stirs in my spirit a hidden well,
And in eloquent tones of the past doth tell.

It tells of the little fairy child
That bound my heart with a magic will,
Of bright blue eyes and golden hair,
That ever shed light and sunlight there—
Of a prattling voice so sweet and clear,
And the tiny feet that were ever near.

It tells of hopes that with her had birth,
Deep buried now in the silent earth!
Of a heart that had made an answering tune,
That again is left alone—alone!
Of days of watching and anxious prayer—
Of a night of sorrow and dark despair.

It tells of a form that lie cold and still—
Of a little head upon yonder hill,
That fed easier for its mother's hand.
Than the classic statutes of Grecian art!
Ah! strangers may pass with a careless air,
Nor dream of the hope that are buried there.

O ye, who have never lost from your sight
Those brightest hopes have never been swept
Like the pure white buds from the summer sky,
Into the wreath of mist from the mountain high;
Like the rainbow, beaming a moment here,
Then melting away to life's other sphere;

Like new [illegible] by the light
Like the [illegible] that blessed some fond land,
Then passed away, but to ne'er be forgot;
If like these your life hopes have never been,
Ye cannot know of the tears I shed.

Ye cannot know—but a little thing
From Memory's chest found can bring
The voice and form that were once so dear,
Yet it is one to me, were they only here!
That can feel with me, when, all wet with dew,
I found it this morning—this little rope.

The Mother Blessed by Her Little Child.

A lady who had charge of young persons not of kindred blood became, on one occasion, perplexed with regard to her duty. She retired to her own room to meditate, and being grieved in spirit laid her head upon a table, and wept bitterly. She scarcely perceived her little daughter, seated quietly in the corner. Unable longer to bear the sight of her mother's distress, she stole softly to her side, and taking her hand in both of her own, said:

"Mamma, once you taught me a pretty hymn:

"If ever you're with trials,
Or troubles on your way,
Then cast your care on Jesus,
And don't forget to pray."

The council of the little monitor was taken, and relief came. The mother was repaid for [illegible] by having her become [illegible] teacher.

[illegible] months of [illegible] hath ordained [illegible]

The Copy Line.

In a writing school clothed observed a boy eying attentively the line placed before him as a copy, and laboring by his penmanship to emulate its correctness and beauty. Mark, said he to the bystanders, how all perfection is the offspring of imperfection, and how, by frequent mistakes, we learn to do well. It is not required of this boy that his writing should equal that line. He sees in this master by the pains he takes, and which are a ground of hope that he will progressively improve, till at last he learns to write with rapidity and elegance. We also have a pattern to copy. It has been left us by the Lord Jesus, and is his most perfect and holy life. And not that he exacts from us more than the teacher does from the pupil. No, indeed; if he finds us careful in studying his example, and diligent in our endeavors to imitate it, he exercises forbearance toward our faults, and strengthens us by his grace and Spirit daily to amend. In the school of Christ they are the best scholars who continue learning to the last; I mean sedulously keep their Master's example in view, and are always striving to grow more and more like it, but yet are never satisfied with themselves, or with the progress which they make. We must therefore avoid two faults which are negligence and discouragement. The one becomes eventually the parent of indolence and security; the other despondency and grief. Heaven is open, not merely to the perfect and strong, but likewise to the feeble and erring, if they will only with patience and humility confess their faults, and seek in the grace of Christ the supply for all their wants.

My Dear Nephew:

I am gratified indeed that you are sufficiently interested in this grand and sublime subject to give it sufficient thought to induce you to criticise my language. Rest assured I by no means wish you to accept and swallow down whatever I present as Bible doctrine without the closest scrutiny. If it will not bear this, reject it as spurious—but I would have you at the same time, be sure that your criticisms are according to Bible, and not according to any pre-conceived notion you may have long cherished, or some recently imbibed fancy.

You ask if I wish you to take this sentence, in my last letter, "I am unable to find it there taught that Christ, in any sense represented our race, or became a substitute for them"—in its widest sense. To this I reply No. I there meant in a sacrificial sense; his sacrifice did not represent us in any sense,—but in one sense he did represent us (i.e.) in him, we all rest, embodied. As we are told in Hebrews 1. that for him the ages were arranged and therefore the lesser is contained or embodied in the greater, therefore he represents us. Just as the Queen of Great Britian represents the nation with all it contains. You perhaps recollect that at one time Christ said to his hearers; "The kingdom of God is within, for among you"—Here he evidently was speaking of himself, as in this instance he represented the King—the subjects, and also the territory, because, all were embodied in him, as he was the head or chief. Then you ask how came it that Christ was sacrificed, or crucified, if not in our stead. Here my dear nephew, you enter into the very depths of God's purpose towards our race, and it is needless to enter there unless we take with us, faith in God—and unless that faith stands to all his plans and purposes, towards humanity. If in our researches there come to us any new thought, let us handle it carefully, and though we are told that from the rich treasure-house of revelation we may bring things new and old; we cannot be too careful in our bringing least we may be deceived in thinking we found there that which is not revealed.

To answer your question I must go back to man's first estate, merely to say that from that sinless state he by transgression fell, and after he sinned he was denied the privilege of eating of the tree of life lest he thereby obtain an immortal existence. As soon as man sinned, the tree of life was no longer deemed a suitable medium through which he might obtain immortality, and for the reason that it was provided as that source, while man was as yet in a sinless state—but as soon as he sinned, it became necessary to develop another source or medium that might serve a two-fold purpose, viz. 1st. of excluding sin, and then of imparting life immortal. This second source, through which immortality might be obtained by our race, God saw fit to manifest as his only begotten Son. All through divine revelation we find one individual spoken of as the Only Begotten Son of God.—Note here what the word Only signifies, so that we may advance understandingly. Webster gives three definitions, or modes of meaning to this word, when used in an adverb, which in this case it undoubtedly is, as it qualifies the adjective begotten. First then, it signifies—"In one manner," or for one purpose—alone; solely; singly. etc. Second, "above all others," "particularly." Third, "utterly; wholly."

The word begotten, is but the past participle or beget—and the word, beget signifies, "to procreate as a father." Therefore, accepting the definitions as given by standard authority, we find that the Only Begotten Son of God, was in distinction, begotten or procreated of or by God. First, in one manner; for one purpose; alone—solely—singly. Second "Above all others; particularly." Third, "Utterly—entirely—wholly."

I wish to be thus explicit my dear nephew that you may see the presumptive folly of those who try to give to the Only Begotten Son of God, a human paternity, and in so doing not only wrest plain Scripture from its acknowledged legitimate signification, but also change the truth of God into a lie, by saying that he who himself declared, "I am from above, ye are from beneath, was, as one of them, and of human paternity. God's purposes are all fixed in wisdom and radiated by unmeasured love. To the creature man he has ever shown himself as all merciful, full of compassion, tenderness and love. When man failed to attain to an immortality of bliss, He removed them from that source which might have imparted unconditional immortality, and immediately gave them a foundation for a hope of a final victory over that deceiver who had betrayed them into sin. This hope is first given immediately after the transgression, and in these words; "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed. It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Gen. iii. 15. This seed, the united testimony of revelation shows to us was the Son of God, as before fully defined. the Only Begotten Son of God. Begotten as none other ever was, and for a purpose above all others—and unlike all others and that purpose was, to substitute the tree of life which was no longer accessible.

You say you have not before heard the thought advanced that Christ substituted, or represented the tree of life, and ask "where is it taught in the Scriptures." I admit that the words are not given verbatim, but I also assert, that the thought is found like a thread of gold running all through the Word. Let me illustrate. Suppose a certain city is supplied with water from a reservoir situated on the north side of the city, and for some specific reason, it is deemed advisable to cut off, or stop the water supply from that source,—another reservoir is created on the east of the city and from this second source, the city is supplied with this life sustaining fluid. Does not the second reservoir substitute the first, does it not represent the source where is obtained the life-giving fluid? So with Christ. The tree of life was no longer within reach, but in its place another source to immortality was presented, and that source was the Christ of God. In bringing this Son into the world, God designed that he should exemplify a character free from all sin—that he should be holy, harmless, separate from sinners, by his divine or God-like nature, (here I wish you to note that divine, does not mean either immortal, or incorruptible; and that nature signifies, the sum of qualities and attributes which make a thing what it is, as distinct from others.) This Son he designed should appear on earth as a man in a mortal fleshly state. He did so. He was born of a virgin of the house of David, as predicted by God's prophet Isaiah, vii. 14. As a child he manifested superhuman knowledge and wisdom, and then knew that God was his Father and acknowledged no other all through his sojourn upon earth.

At his baptism in the Jordan a voice was heard to say "this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." After this open acknowledgment of his Sonship, he more publicly manifested God's power as shown in the miracles and signs that he wrought amongst the people, and many believed that he was indeed the Christ, the Messiah, who was to come and take the throne by right, and restore the kingdom to more than its former greatness.

They knew that Messiah when he would come, would have a claim to the throne, resting on a basis higher than human paternity, else would they have sought to make Joseph their king, as history informs us that he was the last prince of the house of David. But they know not Joseph, as an heir to God's kingdom upon earth. They only knew him as the genealogy records him as the "husband of Mary of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ."

When the chief priests and Jewish rulers saw the wonderful works that Jesus did, saw that he was living out the names Immanuel, and Jesus, as given him even before his birth—and both signifying a manifestation of God's power among men, they bobbins envious of him and they accused him of blasphemy, which crime according to their law was punishable with death. What in their blindness and unbelief they counted blasphemy was the fundamental truth on which rests all hope of a future life to our race. He said he was the Son of God. He claimed to be the heir of his Father's throne and kingdom upon earth. He knew he was God's only begotten Son—the only rightful heir of that kingdom, and he placed his right, his claim, not at or after his baptism, but from his birth. Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice. John xviii. 37. Again. We have a law and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. Jno. xix. 7. Again verse 12, If thou let this man go thou art not Cæsar's friend; whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar. Verse 15, Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your king? The chief priests answered, we have no king but Cæsar.

Mark xiv. 61, 62, 63, 64. Again the high priest asked him and said unto him, Art thou the Christ the son of the Blessed?—And Jesus said, I am, and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven. Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, what need we any further witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy, what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.

My dear nephew, do not these plain Scriptures give you a direct, and compromiseless answer to your query, "How came it that Christ was sacrificed or crucified, if not in our stead." You cannot fail to see that these Scriptures show us that the reason he was crucified was because he would not deny his paternity. He claimed a birth heirship to God's throne and kingdom upon earth as no mortal had ever before claimed. He told Pilate that he was born to be a king (not that he was baptised for that purpose) and in this acknowledgment he corroborates the Scripture that records the enquiry of the wise men who came from the east to Jerusalem (at his birth) saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews, for we have seen his star in the East and are come to worship him?

I have before shown you what being God's Only Begotten Son must of necessity signify if we give to language its proper import. Therefore I wish you to understand clearly that this crime of which Jesus was accused was not that he claimed that God had a watch care over him, and that he, Jesus, was a servant of God, and that he was called the Son of God merely as an appellation of endearment, as any other servant of God might claim. No, most assuredly not: this was not the sense in which the Jews understood this appellation, for this would have no bearing on their loyalty to Cæsar. They knew that the sonship Jesus claimed gave him a birthright to God's throne and kingdom. And this claim to the throne and kingdom Jesus himself places away back to his birth, and hence to his begettal when he said to Pilate, To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world.

Thus we see that the crime of which Jesus was accused, and what led to his death was blasphemy according to Jewish law. That which they called blasphemy was the assertion that he was the Son of God, and this Sonship was by them perfectly understood as a relationship to God which would give him, Jesus, a primary, just and indisputable claim to God's throne and kingdom upon earth.

He would not deny his paternity and therefore he (Jesus) was crucified.

Hoping shortly to continue this subject I am searching for the truth.

Your aunt,

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

Notes By the Way. No. 3.

Jan. 30, finds me once more seated upon Nahum's chariot, with my face toward the setting sun, my first point of "destination being Irving, Iowa, where I arrived in due time and administered the word to the little band of waiting ones, who still live in hope and expectation.

From thence I found my way to the hospitable home of Bro. A. J. Eychaner, at Marshalltown, where I enjoyed a feast of fat things in social converse with himself and several invited guests.

My next appointment was at a new town on the M. & St. Paul R. R., in Dallas Co., called Woodward, having been invited by Bro. Woodrow, principal of the school. Commenced preaching Feb. 6, and continued till the 15th, the audiences constantly increasing until no more could be seated, and they had to stand around the wall. Several men who had never been seen at meeting since the town was organized, were constant attendants, and although the Methodists announced a protracted effort they did not light up. I trust that light has been shed forth in Woodward that will shine until the day dawn. The way is open for the gospel, and some of our brethren who can reach that point should go there at once. Bro. Bishop is only about twenty-five miles away, and Bro. Eychaner about sixty. May the Lord stir them up to visit Woodward.

I next visited Sac City, where Brethren Pitzer and Robbins hold fast the form of sound words. Here I found all astir with a great union revival movement, where scores were being converted and re-converted and re-reconverted. If you know what that means—converted every winter—therefore it was thought prudent not to commence meetings while the other effort was in progress, for if we succeeded in gathering a congregation the cry would be raised that we did it in opposition, and if we failed to get a hearing then we would be met with the saying You tried it but could not succeed. So upon consultation it was thought best to postpone an effort in town till a future time.

I visited the neighborhood of Bro. S. H. Gordon, six miles from Sac City, and delivered seven discourses to audiences that manifested a great degree of interest. Here is an organization of Advent Christians under the pastorate of a worthy minister named Emery. I found him a kindly Christian man, not opposed to truth as restitutionists hold it, and he joined with me in the exercises. He remarked that he regretted that there was a division between those who held so many views in common.

I left Sac City Feb. 24, and arrived in Wymore, Neb., the 28th, and commenced preaching Saturday evening. Here is a small congregation under the leadership of Bro. Cochran, who has gathered it together, and they have succeeded in building a small chapel; in it I held services, joining in the same with the Elder, L. McChesney, and the Pastor, Cochran. The meeting were well attended, and each evening brought new hearers, until the last when the house would not hold them, and some were obliged to go away. Four persons pledged for baptism.

Wymore is a beautiful town on the B. & M. R. R., in Gage Co., Neb. Its town site joins the site of Blue Springs where Bro. Marshman and Dr. Williams, formerly of West Irving, now reside. The two towns are destined to become one. Their interests are so interwoven that a union is inevitable. Horse cars are uniting the two towns, and when the twain become one a city of some importance will be found here at the junction of two roads.

Bro. Elmer Clark resides two miles south of Wymore. He is well located having bought land six years ago for $3.50 per acre, which is now worth thirty five or forty. I mention this because Bro. Clark is known by many of the faith; being formerly a Wisconsin man, and the son of a preacher who is still alive and hearty at ninety. Wymore is a point where a good congregation might be gathered, by uniting the element at Blue Springs. May God open the way for such a union soon.

I discoursed eleven times in this place, and hope to see some of the result in the kingdom. My next communication will be from Kansas, so until I report again, farewell.

Editor Restitution:

After so long a time I send you a two dollar money order, enclosed to pay for the dear old harbinger of truth THE RESTITUTION. By reference to your books you will find I am among your oldest subscribers.

The health of my family has for the last eighteen or twenty years, been exceptionally good for so large a family of children, thirteen, until last September, the Typhoid fever began its ravages and continued almost four months, until seven of our children were stricken down,—one of our little girls was entirely unconscious for twenty one days, another fourteen days, and all the other minds were more or less affected as long as the fever continued. The last one taken sick was our youngest child, Freddie Garfield,—a noble, bright, frolicsome little fellow, three years of age, (less eighteen days.) The Typhoid fever told rapidly on him, and was in a fair way to get well when double Pneumonia set in, and he being then so greatly reduced from the first fever the two diseases were too much for his constitution, and he succumbed to the king of terror, "death," on the twenty eighth day of Dec. 1880. It is hard to give him up and yet we must. We gently laid him away in his "little clay home", to await the coming of him, who doeth all things well, when he will come forth, clad in garments of white, that will far out-shine all the gorgeous array of mortal invention, being clothed upon—immortality. Having often read in the dear old RESTITUTION, notices of the death of many of our dear brethren and sisters, and their little ones, I have often asked myself the question, shall it ever become my painful duty to chronicle the death of any of my family? Oh how sad a task. Time and death are no respecter of persons, they come alike to all—our time is coming, how is the future to be met, and how shall we meet it. The Master will come, shall we prove wise or unwise. Shall we meet our darlings, Freddie, Dora and Willie, in that glad fruition. Family all in good health now.

Editor Restitution:

We desire to call your attention to the formation of an association called the "Conditional Immortality Association," which was organized March 10, in the city of Brooklyn. The object of this association is, the dissemination of knowledge and information on the subject of life only in Christ, or conditional immortality, throughout the country. A preamble setting forth the purposes of the organization, was adopted, a constitution formed and the following officers duly elected,—President, George W. Young; Vice President, George B. Kramer; Treasurer, Marshall S. Driggs; Recording Secretary, William H. Gomez; Corresponding Secretary, Arthur W. Brash. By thus taking this title, we make a bold stand for the defense of the "Truth" of life only in Christ by a new birth and resurrection in opposition to the popular theory of life by natural generation through Adam.

THE HORROR AND DEGRADATION OF THE HEATHEN WORLD.

The epoch which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was an epoch of which the horror and the degradation have rarely been equaled, and perhaps never exceeded, in the annals of mankind. Were we to form our sole estimate of it from the lurid picture of its wickedness, which St. Paul in more than one passage has painted with a few powerful strokes, we might suppose that we were judging it from too lofty a standpoint. We might be accused of throwing too dark a shadow upon the crimes of Paganism, when we set it as a foil to the luster of an ideal holiness. But even if St. Paul had never paused amid his several reasonings to affix his terrible brand upon the pride of heathenism, there would still have been abundant proofs of the abnormal wickedness which accompanied the decadence of ancient civilization. They are stamped upon its coinage, cut on its gems, painted upon its chamber walls, sown broadcast over the pages of its poets, satirists and historians. "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant!" Is there any age which stands so instantly condemned by the bare mention of its rulers as that which recalls the successive names of Tiberius, Gaius, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho and Vitellius, and which after a brief gleam of better examples under Vespasian and Titus, sank at last under the hideous tyranny of a Domitian? Is there any age of which the evil characteristics force themselves so instantaneously upon the mind as that of which we mainly learn the history and moral condition from the relics of Pompeii and Herculaneum, the satires of Persius and Juvenal, the epigrams of Martial, and the terrible records of Tacitus, Suetonius and Dion Cassius?

At the lowest extreme of the social scale were millions of slaves, without possessions, who had no recognized rights, and toward whom none had any recognized duties, passing normally from a childhood of degradation to a manhood of hardship, and an old age of unpitied neglect. Only a little above the slaves stood the lower classes, who formed the vast majority of the freeborn inhabitants of the Roman empire. They were, for the most part, beggars and idlers, familiar with the grossest indignities of an unscrupulous dependence. Despising a life of honest industry, they asked only for bread and the games of the circus, and were ready to support any government, even the most despotic, if it would supply these needs. They spent their mornings in lounging about the Forum, or in idle attendance at the levees of patrons, for a share in whose largesses they daily struggled. They spent their afternoons and evenings in gossiping at the public baths, in listlessly enjoying the polluted plays of the theatre, or looking with fierce thrills of delighted horror at the bloody sports of the arena. At night they crept up to their miserable garrets in the sixth and seventh stories of the huge insulæ—the lodging houses of Rome—into which, as into the low lodging houses of the poorer quarters of London, there drifted all that was most wretched and most vile. Their life, as it is described for us by their contemporaries, was largely made up of squalor, misery and vice.

Immeasurably removed from these needy and greedy freemen, and living chiefly amid crowds of corrupted and obsequious slaves, stood the constantly diminishing throng of the wealthy and the noble. Every age in its decline has exhibited the spectacle of selfish luxury side by side with abject poverty of "Wealth heaping wealth, nor using it Mid starving populations."

but nowhere, and at no period, were these contrasts so startling as they were in Imperial Rome. There a whole population might be trembling lest they should be starved by the delay of an Alexandrian corn ship, while the upper classes were squandering a fortune at a single banquet, drinking out of tazzas and jewelled vases worth hundreds of pounds, and feasting on the brains of peacocks and the tongues of nightingales. As a consequence disease was rife, men were short-lived, and even women became liable to gout. Over a large part of Italy most of the freeborn population had to content themselves, even in winter, with a tunic, and a luxury of the toga was reserved only, by way of honor, to the corpse. Yet at this very time the dress of Roman ladies displayed an unheard-of splendor. The elder Pliny tells us that he himself saw Lollia Paulina dressed for a betrothal feast in a robe entirely covered with pearls and emeralds, which had cost forty mil-

How sentenced, and which was known to be less costly than some of her other dresses. Gluttony, caprice, extravagance, ostentation, impurity, rioted in the heart of a society which knew of no other means by which to break the monotony of its weariness, or to alleviate the anguish of its despair.

At the summit of the whole decaying system—necessary, yet detested, elevated indefinitely above the very highest, yet living in dread of the very lowest, oppressing a population which he terrified, and terrified by the population which he oppressed—was an emperor, raised to the dirtiest pinnacle of autocracy, yet conscious that his life hung upon a thread; an emperor who, in the terrible phrase of Gibbon, was at once a priest, an atheist and a god.—F. W. Farrar, in Early Days of Christianity.

THE NEW BROUGHT OUT OF THE OLD.

It seems to be a settled law of the divine operations, always to work out what is to be, from what already exists; and to bring in our new creations beyond what are absolutely necessary. You remember the miracle of the marriage in Cana. Jesus could just as easily have filled the waterpots with wine without requiring them first to be filled with water. But he preferred to take an existing element, and from that to develop the cheering fruits of his marvellous power. So in feeding the five thousand in the wilderness, he could just as easily have dispensed with the few scanty loaves and fishes; but he chose to take what they had, and to make that the basis of his wonderful provision. It would not be more difficult for him to create a new race of men upon the earth than to redeem its present inhabitants; but it seems best to him to take the old materials, and out of them to effect his great ends of goodness. He is not prodigal in the use of his power, or wasteful of his creations. Every little fragment must be gathered, "that nothing be lost." He always takes the sinner to make a saint, and the dying and corrupt body to make an immortal and spiritual one. No matter how humble or unpromising the basis may be, so long as there is a basis on which to proceed, he invariably adopts it, and works for it, in preference to an entirely new creation. I do not know a single exception to this rule. I argue, then, as he brings "the new man" out of "the old Adam," and the glorified body out of "the natural body," and the new harvest out of the old seed, so he will also assuredly bring the "new heavens and the new earth" out of the old heavens and old earth and thus make a Paradise of God out of this wilderness of our present dwelling-place. My faith is that these very hills and valleys shall yet be made glad with songs of a finished redemption; and this earth yet becomes the bright, blessed, and everlasting homestead of men made glorious and immortal in body and in soul.

And why should we start back from such ideas, or wish that it were otherwise? There is nothing essentially corrupt or degrading in matter. It did not detract from Adam's goodness or happiness that he stood in connection with a material system. It did not render Christ less pure, exalted, or adorable, that he took up his abode, upon earth, and was manifested in the flesh. After all, there is much in this world that is beautiful, attractive, and good. Though it has been much disfigured and disordered by reason of the sins of its inhabitants, we may still trace upon it the footsteps of Deity, and behold in it many lingering relics of the smiles of its God. "Look," says Cummins, "at the floor on which you tread, so exquisitely carpeted with verdure, with fragrance, and with blossoms; look at the sky that is above you, where worlds are suspended as lamps and lights to cure; look at the whole economy in which you live, the ocean of air you breathe, the infinite provisions for your comfort, and why should you want this world, destroyed? Go to some of its fair glens, its lovely scenes, its bright panoramas, and you will be constrained to say, Take away sin, take away corruption, take away head-aches, heart-aches, envy, malice, uncharitableness, and all the evils that sin has given birth to, and I could wish no lovelier heaven to dwell in for ever and for ever." Jesus himself points us to the humble lilies of the field, and tells us with emotion that "even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these!" Just take from earth the curse of sin that marred it; let its pristine beauty be renewed; plant in it the throne of the Redeemer's glory; consecrate and sanctify it with his glory and perpetual presence, and fill it with the happiness, love, peace, and righteousness foretold in the Scriptures; and there certainly can be no reason we should wish any better heaven, or ever think of annihilation. —J. A. Seiss. D. D.

Poetry.

THE LOVING-KINDNESS.

Sitting alone in the shadow
Of a grief that was all my own;
Silently thinking it over,
Mutely making moan,
Sudden there swept the myrtle
Of a gladness great and deep,
Over the chords of feeling
Till my heart began to weep.

"Because of thy loving-kindness"—
The word stole into my brain,
Like a cool hand soothing its fever,
And charming away the pain.
Because of thy loving-kindness,
Better than life to me,
My life shall be keyed to the measure
Of praise unabated and free.

Not always the path is easy.
There are tickets hung with gloom,
There are rough and stony places,
Where never the roses bloom,
But oft when the way is hardest,
I am conscious of One at my side,
Whose hands and whose feet are wounded.
And I'm happy and safe with my Guide.

Better than friends and kindred,
Better than love and rest,
Dearer than hope and triumph,
Is the name I wear on my breast.
I feel my way through the shadows,
With a confident heart and brave,
I shall live in the light beyond them,
I shall conquer death and the grave.

Often when tried and tempted,
Often, ashamed of sin,
That strong as an armed invader,
Has made wreck of the peace within,
That wonderful loving-kindness,
Fallest, and fail, and free,
Has stooped for my consolation,
Has brought a blessing to me.

Therefore my lips shall praise thee,
Therefore let come what may,
To the height of a solemn gladness,
By song shall arise to day.
Not on the drooping willow,
Shall I hang my harp in the land,
When the Lord Himself has cheered me,
By the touch of His pierced hand.

LIFE IN MODERN PALESTINE.

HAIFA, Feb. 2.—I narrated in my last letter the disappointment I experienced when, after making a pilgrimage to the north end of the Lake of Tiberias for the express purpose of seeing some stone covered with inscriptions and pictorial representations, said to be in the possession of the agent of a rich Arab proprietor, I found their owner gone and the relics locked up in a building of which he had taken the key, and all ingress to which was impossible. The Bedouin sheik whom I picked up as a guide, at a neighboring encampment, seeing my chagrin, comforted me by the assurance that if I would only follow him he would take me to a place where I could find others which were quite as good. I mounted my horse, therefore, in somewhat better spirits, as from his description of the locality I knew it must have escaped the attention of all former travellers, and consoled myself by the reflection that a discovery of some importance might still be in store for me.

Our way took us due north across the fertile plain of the Butaiha, an alluvial expanse about two miles in length by one in breadth, formed by the detritus which, in the course of ages, has been washed down the Jordan, and the winter torrents which rush into the plain down the Wadys that descend from the elevated plateau of Jaulan.

The Butaiha is not unlike the plain the Gennesareth. Both are well watered and extremely fertile. Butaiha has the largest and most prominent brooks, Gennesareth the most numerous and abundant springs. The old traveller, Burckhardt, says that the Arabs of the Butaiha have the earliest cucumbers and melons in all this region. It was on this plain, at the foot of the hill or "tell" we were now approaching, that Josephus fought the Romans under Sylla, concerning which battle he says: "I would have performed great things that day if a certain fate had not been my hindrance, for the horse on which I rode and upon whose back I fought fell into a quagmire and threw me to the ground, and I was bruised on my wrist and was carried into a certain village called Capharnome or Capernaum."

The tell which rises from this plain, about a mile and a half from the lake, is thickly strewn with ruins, consisting of hewn blocks of black basalt, with which in the ancient times all the houses in this region were constructed; but as yet no traces of any large building have been discovered. It has, indeed, been very rarely visited, but it is considered by many to be the site of Bethsaida-Julias and the scene of the miracle of the loaves and fishes. At present all we know for certain is that Bethsaida was somewhere in the Butaiha; that Josephus in his descriptions advanced it to the dignity of a city, both by reason of the number of inhabitants it contained and its other grandeur; and that inasmuch as the plain of the Butaiha contains many heaps of ruins, none of any very great extent, any of them may be Bethsaida, while it was a large city. In our modern conception of the term, the whole plain would not be large enough to contain it.

Indeed, one is much struck in exploring the ruins of the country by the limited areas which they cover. I am afraid to say how many sites of ruined towns I have visited, certainly not less than forty; and I think one could crowd them all into the area occupied by the ruins of one large ancient Egyptian city—Arsinoe in the Fayoum, for instance; but then the ruins of an Egyptian city are composed mainly of mounds of potsherds, while these consist of large blocks of building stone, either lime-stone or basalt, measuring generally two feet or two feet six one way, and a foot or eighteen inches the other. Then they are usually comparatively near together; all around the Lake of Tiberias, for instance, and in the country in its vicinity, they are generally not more than from one to three miles apart; so that this section of country must have been very thickly peopled. The ruins of Et Tell are now built over by the Arabs, who live in a squalid village among the basalt blocks which formed the mansions inhabited by the more highly civilized race which occupied the country in the days when all this region was the favorite haunt of Christ and his disciples.

Leaving Et Tell on our left, we followed the east bank of the Jordan for more than a mile. This river is here very rapid, and, splitting into numerous streams, whirls past the small islets they form. It is the very ideal of a trout stream, on which on some more propitious occasion I propose to cast a fly. Meantime, even had I been provided with the requisite tackle, I should have been obliged to forego the temptation. It was on the steep rise of a hill, about a hundred yards from the river, that my guide suddenly stopped. Here was a small collection of Arab hovels, recently constructed, and it was in their scarch for stone, last summer, that the natives had for the first time uncovered the ruin which now met my delighted gaze.

I found myself in the presence of a building the character of which I had yet to determine, the walls of which were still standing to a height of eight feet. The area they enclosed was thickly strewn with building stones, fragments of columns, pedestals, capitals, and cornices. Two at least of the columns were in situ, while the bases of others were too much concealed by piles of stone to enable me to determine their original position. My first impression, from the character of the architecture which was strewn about, was that this was formerly a Roman temple; but a further and more careful examination convinced me that it had originally been a Jewish synagogue, which at a later period had been converted to another use: probably it had been appropriated by the Byzantines as a basilica or Christian church. This was the more probable, as the existing walls had evidently been built upon the foundations of a former structure. The massive stones were set in mortar, which is not the case with the synagogues hitherto discovered; and I should doubtless have been completely at fault in classing this building had my attention not been already directed to the remains of the synagogues brought to light recently by the exertions of the Palestine Exploration Fund.

I was now fortunately in a position to compare the dimensions, ground plan, and architectural fragments which were strewn about with those which distinguish the synagogues already discovered, in regard to whose original character there can be no doubt, as the Hebrew inscriptions and sacred Jewish symbols carved on the lintels prove it. The building measured 45 feet by 38, which is exactly the measurement of the small synagogue at Kefr Birim. The columns were exactly of the same dimension. The door was depressed, and reached by a descent of two steps, which were carried around the building in benches or seats each a foot high, the face of the upper one ornamented by a thin scroll of floral tracery. These features occur in the synagogue at Irbid. There was a single large stone cut into the shape of an arch, which had evidently been placed on the lintel entrance, like the one which stands to this day over the doorway of the great synagogue at Kefr Birim. The pitches, with the great scallop-shell pattern which distinguishes them, almost exactly resemble those of the synagogue of Kerazeh or Chorazin; while the cornice, which was extremely florid, and not unlike what in modern parlance is called "the egg-and-dart pattern," though differing in some respects from the cornices hitherto observed, was evidently of the same school of design. The capitals were two feet, large leaves high, and Corinthian in the same style and of the same dimensions as those of the small synagogue of Kefr Birim, and there was the upper fragment of two semi-attached fluted columns, with Doric capitals, the ditto of which is to be found at Irbid. The two columns in situ exactly answer in position those of several of the synagogues, and though the position of the door, which was in the center of the western wall, was somewhat unusual, this was accounted for by the fact that the building had been excavated from the hillside, so that the top of the east wall, nine feet of which was still standing, was level with the surface of the slope of the hill.

The only convenient entrance was in the wall of the side immediately opposite to it. The name of this most interesting locality was Eddikkih, a spot hitherto unvisited by any traveller. Indeed, if it had been visited, it would have been passed unnoticed, for its antiquarian treasures have been revealed for the first time a few months ago. The word Eddikkih means "platform," a name, concerning its position, not inappropriate; but I have not been able to identify it with any Biblical site.

The area of ruins apart from those of the synagogue itself was not very large, but the situation was highly picturesque. Half a mile to the north of where we stood the Jordan forces its way through a gorge which I hope some day to explore, while immediately below us it rushed between numerous small islets. Opposite the hills swelled gently back from its western bank, behind us they rose more abruptly to the high tableland of Jaulan, while to the southward stretched the plain of Butaiha, with the Lake of Tiberias in the distance.

Meantime the few wild-looking natives who inhabit this remote locality clustered around me, as they watched me measuring and sketching, with no little suspicion and alarm. "See," said one to another, "our country is being taken from us." My request for old coins only frightened them the more. They vehemently protested that not one had been found, an assertion which, under the circumstances, I felt sure was untrue; nor did the most gentle and reassuring language, with tenders of backsheesh—which was nevertheless greedily accepted—tend to allay their fears. I have forgotten to mention what was perhaps the most interesting object of all, and this was a carved figure of a winged female, waving what seemed to be a sheaf in one hand, while her legs were doubled backward in a most uncomfortable and ungraceful position. It was on an isolated slab about six inches thick, and two feet one way by eighteen inches the other.

The area of the hillside all around was strewn with the blocks of building stone of which the town had been built. It had apparently not been a very large place, but as the villagers will probably continue their excavations for their own purposes next summer, it is not at all unlikely that they may bring some more interesting remains to light. I earnestly impressed upon them the necessity of preserving these, promising another visit next year, when I would reward them in proportion to the carvings, coins, or other antiquities they could provide for me; but they listened to my exhortation with such a stupid and suspicious expression of countenance that I did not derive much encouragement from their reluctant consent.—*N. ### WILL WORMS BE IMMORTAL?

How is this for a text? Who ever heard a sermon on worm longevity? A few Sundays ago in our senior Bible Class, the story of Dives and Lazarus was referred to in proof of eternal torture, the doom of the wicked. I told my teacher that it was to me more like a description of Abraham's estimate of wealth and poverty since there was nothing said about the moral character of either of them. I also showed them that God was not in the dialogue.

"Our superintendent was present, and I might say the class embraces some of the best minds in our church (the M. E.) Every one in the room appeared surprised at the way I dissected this strange story. The majority of the class, I thought, were disposed to adopt my views. The teacher then asked me to explain—'There the worm dieth not.'

I knew the bell would ring in a few seconds, and I know also that a question of this sort is answered best by asking another.

So I asked him if he really thought that worms would be made immortal? This settled the controversy. Every one in the room looked as though they wanted to recess. The immortal worm was severely turned down that morning, not by argument, not that, but simply by holding long enough to take a square common sense look at it. What a pity that church people take so little interest in comparing Scripture with Scripture, and then apply their creed and conduct as the builder applies his spirit level to his work.

Church people are accepting without question many things just as ludicrous as the immortal worm theory. I am persuaded that it is not always best to go into a wholesale abuse of views which may differ from our own. There are few men able to see all that is to be seen of truth or of anything. It takes us all to see it. Explorers in the realm of truth should be courteous with each other in exchanging notes, as explorers in the realm of science.

In our late solar eclipse, there were many points of observation. It would have been very foolish for the Chicago note-makers to ridicule the Baltimore note-makers because of some slight discrepancy in their observations.

The best of us now know but in part, are only in the dawning of the day. It should not make us lose our temper when our views are questioned by any one, and if we would take a little pains in dealing with other people's views we might avoid giving offense.

There was not one in the Bible Class I have referred to who (including the teacher) showed the least anger when I innocently asked, Will worms be immortal?

ISAAC MCCURRY.

THE OLD SHOP BIBLE.

A few days ago (March 17, 1885,) I was called to the house of mourning, where the grim monster death had entered, and mown down the head of an affectionate family. It is Benjamin Coddington of LaFayette, Ind. He was a warm hearted and Christian friend. He died of paralysis, in the first hour of March 16, at the age of 68 years, seven months and eleven days. I formed acquaintance with this disciple of Christ more than twenty years ago, while I lived in that city. He then, and from that time on, followed a humble calling, toiling for his living in a job shop, a large portion of his work consisting in filing saws. I often visited his shop, for his society was always good, and so different from most work shops. It was ornamented with the "Holy Bible" and on the leather cover was ingeniously engraved "Shop Bible." The use of this book was visible on its pages. The print in many pages had become so dim, that it could scarcely be read, being so worn by the thumb and fingers, for he loved to search the Scriptures. They were of great comfort to him, they spoke to him of "God," of "Christ," and of the "great salvation." His faith in the word of God was remarkably strong. He believed in conditionally immortality, in a future life beyond the grave, when Jesus shall come and "fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory." For this he longed, for this he waited.

Our brother was a believer in the "kingdom of God," and looked for Jesus our Savior to reign in person on this earth, often speaking of the time when "a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment."

How often have I entered his shop, and found it filled with men both young and old, and sometimes a clergyman would be there, and he would dispute with them concerning the popular teachings of the day, and give unto them his understanding of these things and compare them with Bible teaching. As soon as opposition arose, he would reach to the shelf and down comes the "old shop Bible," the sword of the Spirit, his weapon of war. He then would give a "Thus saith the Lord," and repulse the enemy. For the loved to talk on Bible subjects, and preach the gospel of Christ in his little shop. He wisely wielded the sword, and cunningly repulsed the enemy, yet he was respected by all, and they that knew him best loved him most, for he spake in wisdom and rebuked in love.

But now his work is ended, and he is gathered to his fathers in peace. He leaves a loving wife, two sons, three daughters-in-law, and several grand-children, as well as many friends to mourn their loss.

On his death bed, he requested this "Old Shop Bible" should be buried with him. So it was brought from the shop to the house, and on examination these lines were found written by his own hand, evidently some time previous, at the close of the Old Testament.

"In the end of my life, let this book be placed under my heads, on my breast, that this copy may be in my hands when I shall awake."

B. CODDINGTON.

So at the funeral services, after some appropriate remarks by Mr. Blackburn, a Baptist preacher, who kindly visited him during his illness, the undersigned spoke a few words concerning old acquaintanceship, and his love for both God and man; also how he loved the Holy Bible, and then read his request, and placed that precious book just where he desired. So like a military man his sword was buried with him.

I believe he could say as did the apostle Paul, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the Righteous Judge, shall give me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

May this "Old Shop Bible" be a lesson to all who may read these few lines, may it lead us to a closer study of God's holy word. J. B. COX.

Editor Restitution:

We write a few lines that we may be able to trace Bro. C. C. Ramsey, and know when he can be with us, so we can arrange for our meeting. We have written to him at Wymore Neb., in due time, but hear no more from him. Will Bro. Ramsay please confer with us. Bro. Halstead has been detained from coming here at present on account of sickness, hope he will get to come soon. We are still holding our meetings regularly, and they are growing in interest, and we hope some good may be done here yet. The Brethren are making this quite a central point, as so many want to find a warmer climate. We think the weather has been cold here this winter, but it has been light compared with the winter north, and now (March 23,) we are sowing oats and making garden, but still we get a cold wave when it comes from the northeast. We are in need of Hymn Books here, but no moneyed men among us, so we can not help out in getting up the new book, but expect to be ready to pay for copies enough to do us when the book is out. We ask an interest in the prayers of God's people that we may continue faithful till he comes.

Your Bro. in Christ,
H. W. BARNHILL.

BUILDING A DESERT RAILWAY.

The line of the Suakim and Berber Railway, in the Soudan, is to be the ordinary full gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches; the material will all be sent out in ten-mile sections, complete and ready for laying, and it is expected that from twenty to twenty-five miles of it can be laid in a substantial manner each week. There is little need of preliminary surveying, that having been thoroughly done in 1875, and having since been carefully gone over by experienced engineers. The line will in the main follow the grand caravan route of the Arabs, thus, of course, touching all the wells which for the eastern half of the journey are numerous, but small. The distance is given on the war map as 241 miles, though some of the routes are forty or fifty miles longer. For about a dozen miles from Suakim the road is over a gravelly plain, but it then plunges into the mountains rising at the ill-fated Sinkat, a dozen miles further on, to over 950 feet above the sea. It continues through gorges and valleys till it reaches the fertile oasis of Arieb, 119 miles from the coast, which is the chief point of defense for the line. The mountains are left a few miles further on, and from the Bak wells, 173 miles from Suakim, the road to the Nile is a treeless, waterless and stony plain, crossed at one point by a belt of sand dunes five miles wide and rising nearly seventy-five feet above the plain. This belt will cause the chief mechanical difficulties of the undertaking, for except at one or two points there will be no rock cutting in the mountains, and it is thought that all cutting may possibly be avoided. There will also be little earthwork and no masonry except for culverts. Indeed most of the route is practicable for wagons. General Earle, it will be remembered, marched over it with his Krupp guns, and Sir Samuel Baker, who had crossed it three times, insists that the transp for an army would be "merely an agreeable promenade." This belief is not shared by the authorities, clearly, or the railroad would not be built.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

ATHEISM AND THEISM.

—BY JOHN G. WILSON—

Mr. Wilson is the Editor of The Prophetic Times and Watchtower, and is well known as a clear, strong writer. This book contains about 350 pages, is neatly and tastefully bound in cloth, clearly printed, and will be sent postpaid, for $1.00 Send to this office for it.

Editor Restitution:

Am glad you continued to send THE RESTITUTION to me for we take great pleasure in reading it. For we believe it teaches the truth of God. It is only a little over one year since we have had any preaching in this place on the one faith.

A brother of mine Dr. C. J. Wilbur first called my attention to it. I saw a little light and invited Brother Truman Finn to come up from Scranton to teach us, and he was very ready to come. Thanks be to God, a few were able to see the light and eight have obeyed and been immersed. Bro. Finn comes once a month and although we are a few in number and are persecuted we have good meetings, and hope to see many more added to our little band in this place.

MRS. NELSON CONRAD.

REMEMBER! REMEMBER!

That this is the first of the New Year, and that it is very likely your subscription to THE RESTITUTION expired with the Old Year.

REMEMBER

That the Editor must live, the printing and paper bills must be paid, Uncle Sam refuses to send out mail unless the postage is paid, and that many other bills are constantly on hand ready to take money.

REMEMBER

Those of you who have received statements lately, and do not throw them aside, but look to your account, and if the bill is right, please make an effort to pay it, if it is not right point out the error, and it will be made right. It is not unlikely that errors have occurred, but we have tried to be careful. At any rate we want to hear from you.

REMEMBER

That we will send THE RESTITUTION to the poor, at their request, so long as we can get the means to publish the paper. Let all our brethren who have means to use in sending the good news to others,

REMEMBER

The name of some friend or relative, and send us an extra dollar, to send the paper to them. If you cannot think of any such persons send the money, and we will apply it where it will be appreciated and return blessings on the donor.

REMEMBER

That this is written for you, if you are in arrears, or have not renewed for 1885. Do not say, "Well, I'll attend to it in a few days," but act right NOW. We need the money at this present time.

REMEMBER

When sending your remittance that many sums of money are lost every year by the careless manner in which many send their subscriptions to newspapers; so please get a Post Office Money Order, a Bank Draft, an Express Money Order, or have your letter Registered. Do not send Bank Checks, as it costs us from twenty-five to forty cents to collect each one. If you are compelled to send postage stamps buy those of the one or two cent denominations. We do not want large ones.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Agent.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked to eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a yearly belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersions as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

LEAVING FIRST PRINCIPLES.

One of our large dailies recently in giving their usual report on Monday of a few of the more striking or popular sermons preached the day before in Chicago, worded one of the texts as follows:

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection," the text taken by the preacher and preached from, and of which the above is supposed by a very large number of people to be a faithful transcript or translation of the thought of the inspired writer, is the first clause of the first verse of the sixth chapter of Hebrews and reads as follows: "Leaving therefore the word pertaining to the authority of the Christ, let us be borne on unto the completion," (that is the rest of God's teaching in regard to man's career and destiny).

Now without offering any special criticism of this particular sermon, (for it was very much better than the average sermons of the day) we will assume that the preacher stuck to his text and that his sermon as a whole was "a departure" in its teachings from "the principles of the doctrine of Christ." For he assumes as his first premise in his text that this is the exhortation of the author of Hebrews. Let the reader at this point carefully compare the two translations, and decide as to which of the two harmonize with common sense and the general teaching of Scripture; and then let him ask himself whether he does not know a large and increasing number of people who are doing just that thing "leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ and going on to perfection," "laying other foundations"—for themselves, assuming and accepting all sorts of "authority" except the Christ authority, making it to be greater than it is or less than it is, adding to and taking from the word to suit every "wicked supposition" that happens to be the popular ism of the day; and in every case they sincerely think, apparently, and do not fail to tell you probably, that their converts are going on "unto perfection." Such is the human heart and the pride of human reason in its natural condition, unrenewed by grace, and of one thing the reader may rest assured, namely that any "leaving of the principles of the doctrine of Christ is a departure from God's word and teaching, and vice versa. For Christ tells us and to this all the prophets agree" that he is "the authority" par excellence of God, and this is the word translated "principles" in this "text" or passage. The translator has omitted entirely to translate another term in the original, namely tov logov, the word which materially modifies and limits the meaning and use of the word archy. "The word pertaining to the authority" as the word of God and largely quoted from "the prophets." "The authority" is the official authority which God has conferred upon The Christ (The Anointed One), and the author of Hebrews has been up to this point in the Greek giving the argument for the fact, and the rationale of its conferment, and now he says "let us be borne on (as a ship in, with its sails all set, by the favoring winds of God's teaching through the prophets) to a complete or a perfect apprehension of God's plan and purpose as therein revealed, "not laying again, etc." "For other foundation can no man lay than hath been laid, etc." Not that we are to leave this foundation that hath been laid and go off into the realms of speculative guesswork and belief, but do what any wise master-builder does after the foundation of his building has been laid, go on and build carefully and scrupulously in harmony with the ground plan. Then what would you think of a so-called master-builder who went to work laying polished stones on the sand with no settled conviction that the foundation he is building upon was "sure," and every angle and measurement of it exactly determined "to the line and the plummet?"

Now why is the word of the teaching of Christ and the prophets "the more sure word of prophecy?" Because it is founded upon the immutable character of God. This first course of masonry, this foundation course of which Christ is the chief corner stone rests upon a building—in preparation for it as we learn in the Apocalypse of John, which "building," in preparation, is compared to jasper, and this in symbolic parable language represents the character of God, or "in faith" a true and correct apprehension of it, as contrasted with a false apprehension of the same in any of the manifold forms of idolatry, and in this figure elsewhere called a foundation of sat i, or of "hay, wood, or stubble," or even of "gold, silver, or precious stones."

God's word is the word of a covenant (not a testament) and confirmed with an oath, and the Christ is the ratification of this covenant, and his blood is the blood of this covenant that sealed it and made the instrument a valid one in the sight of God, men and angels. What more can human reason ask or infidelity demand?

But the terms of the covenant are plain and specific, and there is no promise outside of it, and every one is bound to see that he understands what he "ratifies" or agrees to. For it is a case of life and death. If you were buying a piece of property you would want to know exactly how the dead or the covenant for a deed read and if you couldn't read yourself you would be careful to find some one who could and whom you could trust to give you the exact conditions of the conveyance before attesting or ratifying it. Are you as careful of your spiritual welfare, and "the great inheritance" of which you may become an heir and joint heir with Christ? Of one thing you may rest assured, and that is, if you "leave the principles of the doctrine (teaching of Christ, whether this one teaching or the teaching of the prophets in regard to him) of Christ," and you become "a partaker with the saints in light," it won't be under any revolution thus far given, and you will need "a special warranty" to make your title good, as well as a quit-claim from all those "who read their title clear," and take possession of all there is to inherit under the "original warranty."

This "going on to perfection" in disregard of God's requirements has been the "mystery" of all apostasy, and the invariable fruit of unsanctified human reason and pride of personal opinion, so aptly designated in the Scriptures themselves as "the mystery of iniquity."

Read church history, review the past from the secular stand-point even, and see the long line of "perfectionists" that has arisen, reached perfectionism (that is worked out their lie) and gone down into hades to await "the day that will try every man's works." Look at all the monkish brotherhoods and sisterhoods of the middle ages, the convent and the cloister, the lama and the sects, "the peculiar people," the religious "cranks," and the heartless, blood-thirsty fanatics inspired with every demoniac passion and lust that ever was known to enter in and take possession of men—all perfectionists, sealed. These all literally followed the exhortation of the text as first rendered, left "the principles of the doctrine of Christ," "built on other foundations," and where are they? Shall we be wise in our day and generation or shall we "go on to perfection" in some other life? Shall we allow ourselves to be "whitewashed" with a semblance of God's word or do we "desire the unadulterated milk?" That is the question for every "sincere" Christian believer who is a believer in a general way. Theology sealed has had altogether too much "sincere milk" and "unadulterated" nonsense in it. The common sense of the world is sick of it, and the world is full of hard-headed matter-of-fact people, who, when piously and scrupulously told that God's people are expected to be "a peculiar people" insist upon understanding the word "peculiar" to mean just what it does mean and always has meant in good old common sense English, namely "odd," or "eccentric," and so very naturally and consistentously, when these same hard-headed, matter-of-fact people become pious, you see them transform themselves into all sorts of peculiar or eccentric "cranks," and you have Mormonism, and Mohamedism, and Shakers, and Quakers, and Puritans, and Oneida Communities, and Fourierites, and Long-haired Free Lovers and all the ists and isms of the day. Let me give the meaning and exegesis of the word translated "peculiar." περιουσιος adjective from περι, περι preposition, meaning in composition with this verb ειμι to be—more than enough; whole meaning to be more than just enough, or to abound or exist. As an adjective descriptive of a people, God's people, or the character of such a people, then it would mean a very excellent people, peculiar in this respect but in no other, a people of excellent character and "abounding in every good word and work;" with none of the cranky peculiarities of hypocrisy and deceit about them. They do not come to you as "wolves in sheep's clothing." They do not point you to a thorn-bush and tell you that it will bear figs, nor to thistles and try to make you believe they are grapes. They do not put on the garb of Shakerism or Quakerism or any other ism, and tell you that this constitutes "godliness" (piety) or any essential part or characteristic of it. They do not "visit" the widow and the fatherless in their affliction to pour the vinegar of pompous patronage and pompous consolation upon their aching wounds, but like the Good Samaritan they take an "over-sight" of them, and having administered "the olive-oil and wine" (that which serves the temporal and spiritual needs) they lift them up tenderly as "burden-bearers" should and "carry" them to God, the All-Receiving One, and the Mercy Seat, the All-Receiving Place.

Enough then of nonsense, brethren, This is the nineteenth century, "The night is far spent," and "the Day-Star" appeareth.

Let it neither you the time you have spent as Gentiles (nations) walking in the ways of such and stumbling over the dark mountains of so-called "mystery" and mysticism. Remember it is the harlot (the apostate church) that has written on her forehead μυστηριον (mystery). We are children of light and of the day. Let us walk in the light. God's word is the light, "In it is life and the life is the light of mankind." It was in Habraam's day and is just as much so now. He believed it and it was accounted unto him for righteousness when he had done his best to live it, or "let his light shine before men" not in mere talk, James says, but in "good works." For faith without works is just as dead as the natural life without a natural body or organism to live in. The natural reason has conceived of this life-in-death result as a "ghost" and you will invariably find that any "leaving of the principles of the doctrine of Christ" is a ghostly teaching, which tried by the test of the word of God has about as much basis of fact in it as this so-called "ghost" of ignorance and superstition.

A DAY AT THE TOWER OF BABEL.

We gave Saturday, January 17th, to a visit to the Tower of Babel. Thursday and Friday we had ridden the circuit of all that remains of the wall of Babylon, on the east of the Euphrates, and had, as fully as the narrow time at our disposal would allow, examine the diggings made by the more scientific English and French explorers, and by the ignorant Arabs who quarry bricks for the Hillah market. We had been over the high, square hill, at the north corner, called Bab-il, and gutted with excavations, and we had ridden forward and backward over the other great mounds: Kesr, otherwise called Mujelibeh, with its solid yellow brick masonry on the top, which defies the vandals; Amran, with its sharp-domed Mohammedan shrines; Jimjimeh, like Amran and Kesr, all riddled with borings and diggings for bricks and old graves; and Homera, a red brick hill off the line of the river, and barren of antiquities. We had taken the photographs provided for by the Wolfe Expedition, and fast riding (which means, in this country, fast walking or slow trotting of the horses) should have brought us into Hillah, whither our pack animals had preceded us, in an hour from Jimjimeh, but the light rain, which had made our last photographs unsatisfactory, also rendered the road so slippery that it was nearer two hours before we had passed through the outer glorious palm trees and found our way over the crazy bridge of boats which floats across the Euphrates, to our dilapidated khan. I withdraw the term of disparagement; for, if the walls are somewhat dilapidated and if the big breach in the dry mud outer fills the east window over the head of my bed is filled up with a fresco of the weeds used here for fuel, and does not keep out the raw wind, yet the west window has stout wooden bars in the place of glass, the walls are of mortar, there is a deep recess for clothes, two actual mortar shelves, two nails in the wall, a door which fastens from the outside—and who wants to lock himself in?—and the mud floor has had its top mud swept over, not swept off, with a wisp of palm leaves. The air is chill and damp in the tireless room; but what is that when one is in Babylon? Nebuchadnezzar had a furnace for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, but no stove for himself.

After Babylon, we must see next the Tower of Babel. Birs Nimrud is on the other, the west, side of the Euphrates, and a good two hours' distance from Hillah. The camera has to be carried on one's back, and the slides in the saddle bags. We are four—a Williams graduate, who has had much experience in photography as well as in archæological journeyings in Turkey; our sharp, honest, and faithful young servant and interpreter, Daniel, whose facility with languages (he talks Arabic, Turkish, Kurdish, and Armenian and English, and has a smattering of as many more languages) is our shame and despair; the inevitable Turkish Zaptieh, or zaptieh, and myself. We ride through the long, low-covered lanes of the bazaar, past the tiny shops, where the coppersmiths, the gold-smiths, and the sleeve-weavers are making and selling their goods, where the vegetable merchants, the print-sellers, and the druggists, each in his square shop, or stall, which is all door, are waiting for custom; suddenly out of the town, and into the slippery track, which goes up and down, over and through the little ditches which water the palm gardens, past the last straggling palms, and out on the level waste of sunburnt silt, of which the whole Mesopotamia basin is composed. Immediately before us rises—and nothing else breaks the horizon line—the hill of Birs Nimrud, appearing as a long, low elevation, with a little crater cone in the middle, on the top of which rises what is evidently a sharp perpendicular fragment of masonry. There, six miles off, is the Tower of Babel of tradition and Genesis.

I despair of being able to convey to one who has never seen them a just idea of the immensity of labor implied in the construction of one of these vast mounds. It was a principle unquestionable among the early inhabitants, all the way, certainly, from Athens to Persepolis, that a city must be set on a hill. It must have an acropolis for defense, for temples, and for the dwellings of king and court. Where an easily fortified natural elevation could be found it determined the place of the city, as a harbor or a waterfall determines its place with us. On these hills, through Greece and Asia Minor, one looks for lost cities of cities. But there are great and fertile plains and valleys where there is no natural acropolis, and there one must be made. The great cities once existing along the Tigris and Euphrates, are now marked only by these enormous mounds, or tels, raised entirely by human labor. Nor are they the slow and unavoidable accumulation of long years of occupation. Their erection was designed and accomplished by the order of rulers, who either began them or added to them as they needed more room for palaces or fortifications. The Assyrian and Babylonian kings, in their own records, are careful to tell not only of the temples they erected, but of the great labor of the mounds of crude brick they built to put them on. These mounds we now find everywhere, large ones and small, for large or small cities. Often a mud village now occupies the lower edge of one, just high enough for drainage; often they are for selected Mohammedan graveyards. The best example I have yet seen of an old mound still seeming to serve its purpose as an acropolis, is at Erbil, a day's journey east of Nineveh. This town is the old Arbela, famous for Alexander's battle, but famous long before, as one of the oldest in the whole basin of the rivers. Long before Nineveh became a capital, perhaps before Babylon became the capital of the old Chaldean kingdom. Here was the great seat of the worship of the Venus, the Ishtar of Arbela. It was worth many days' journey to see here, surmounting the lower city, this immense flat mound, all walled about, and with houses, still inhabited, built in the walls. On the level summit, perhaps five thousand people live, though the blue tiled minarets and domes have taken the place of the grander temple of Ishtar, and the houses along the narrow streets hardly recall the palaces of the viceroys of old Arbela. Most interesting are the "ascents," the inclined ways running along the side of the mound, with steps for men and a paved way for horses, by which one goes up from the lower to the upper city. They are not as grand as the wonderful stairway at Persepolis, still almost perfect; but they show us, as if dropped down from an early chiliad, what was the actual relation of the old artificial mound acropolis to the lower city, defended only by its walls.

But we are forgetting this vast mound before us. The lower portion may be two miles long and fifty feet high—I have no measurement before me—and represents the lower city. The upper mound, with the tower, is a fifth of a mile long, half as wide, and two hundred feet high, measuring to the bottom of the standing masonry. This, which leaves out of view the neighboring hill of Ibrahim-el-Khalil, is one immense mass of solid bricks; bricks for the basement and bricks for the tower. We now see what use the hundreds of thousands of captives were put to. The first thought which comes to one on seeing a mound, is of the incredible labor it took to erect it.

Who has ever heard of the Hindiye? And yet that water, running parallel with the Euphrates—now a river, now lake, and now swamp—is a worse barrier to travel than the Euphrates. They managed it better in the days of Nebuchadnezzar. Now it prevents my taking a seven hours' ride to Kerbela, the famous Persian shrine of Hassan and Hussein, and to-day it compells us to make something of a detour to the left. I have called the land a waste, and so it appears; but it is the most fertile land in the world, if it only has a chance. Herodotus declares that it yielded two or even three hundred fold, and that the leaves of wheat and barley were four fingers wide. At present, with imperfect irrigation, the peasant tries to get six or eight fold; but the larger part of the surface looks as if it had lain fallow for centuries, and the soil is bare of grass and weeds; and yet the thin mark of the furrow shows that it has, at some time, been scratched with what is here called a plow, and, doubtless, there will be not a little green in the month of April. A couple of Jaukals appear in the distance crossing the road, and I start in a race after them, but am suddenly stopped by the ditches, which give me the evidence I need that the waste is not really barren.

At last, after plunging down several larger ditches, and coming out of them with leaps which make us tremble for the camera and plates, we reach the foot of the hill, and ride slowly up, past old excavations, to the top of the lower level of Ibrahim-el-Khalil—Abraham, the beloved of God. There we find another of those miserable little sharp-domed Moslem shrines, or tombs, which are too holy and too dirty for a Christian to enter, but built on the very spot—so you are told—where the patriarch was cast into the furnace by Nimrod. Before it were squat three lazy Arabs, who could be persuaded for five cents to help the zaptieh keep our horses from fighting while we walked over the hill. Somehow, Jasin, the chief or Khahya of the village a mile away, to whom we had a letter of introduction from Daud Tome, of Baghdad, Mr. Rassam's distinguished lieutenant in all his explorations, had discovered our approach, and a few minutes later made his appearance.

Without stopping now to look at Ibrahim-el-Khalil, we hastened to ascend the peak of Birs-Nimrud. We went down twenty feet into the valley between the two, and passed through the excavations at the base of the higher hill. A maze of rooms had been opened, whose arrangement was not evident until we looked down on them from the high hill beyond. We simply ran into one or two, peeped into several dark tunnels, and then hurried to climb the steep ascent. Reaching the top of the enormous mound, two hundred feet above the river, we stood at the base of the fragment which remains of the great tower built here by Nebuchadnezzar. It is a yellow wall of compact and unalterable brick-work, thirty-seven feet high and twenty-eight broad, and half as thick. It is cracked along the middle from top to bottom, as if burst asunder by lightning. At the side of its base is what most astonishes the writer, immense tagged blocks of brick work, each weighing many tons, molten and vitrified into compact black stone, showing only here and there the traces of the original layers. Brick and cement have all been lost together in solid rock. There lie in confusion these huge masses, tumbled on one another, and thrown down the hill, and rolled into the plain. What possible conflagration could have melted such masses of brick? Or, having melted and solidified them, what force could have broken them into these enormous jagged fragments? It seems as if some Titanic power had been at work, some such agency as that which, in the line of mountain upheavals, has metamorphosed sand and clay into solid rock.

This destruction is not that recorded in Genesis. Of the Tower of Genesis and tradition no remains have been discovered. That there was an old ruin on the hill before Nebuchadnezzar's time, he himself tells us, and the Genesis story bears the same testimony; for, however late a date criticism may attempt to assign to Genesis, it can hardly bring it down so low as when Nebuchadnezzar's tower had been destroyed and forgotten. Nebuchadnezzar says, in his vain-glorious account of his great buildings, that his predecessors, many centuries before, had begun the tower, and raised it to the height of seventy feet, but that it had been left incomplete and had fallen into ruin. He finished it, as an immense tower of seven stages, of different colors, and dedicated severally to the seven planetary bodies, and at the top of all was the temple of Nebo. Of one of the upper stages, probably, the wall that remains was a part, and the vast substructures of brick, which compose the rest of the hill, and which all bear Nebuchadnezzar's name, formed the lower stages. Sir Henry Rawlinson, and after him Oppert, of the French Expedition, made careful studies of the hill, and worked out, after extensive digging, the dimensions of the original tower, and scholars can refer to their account; but the "Rapport" of the "Expedition Scientifique" of the French explorer, whose long labors Jasin remembered and despatched on, is too bulky a book to have been carried with our packs, and I cannot here refer to it. I am aware of the theory sustained by Rich that the vitrification of the bricks on the top of the hill was a part of the original design, and that a huge fire was built about the walls for the purpose of solidifying them. This is improbable enough; but it is almost equally difficult to conceive how a sufficient amount of wood work should ever have been constructed into and around the temple on the summit of the hill to melt so vast a mass of bricks. We get from this a fresh idea of the grandeur of the wood work as well as of the brick work of these temples and palaces. Nebuchadnezzar has as much to say of the vast amounts of timber he brought from Lebanon and Amanus for his buildings, as of the gold and precious stone. The wood doubtless rose story on story, and the great temple and the constructions about it were destroyed by fire, perhaps, after the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, the death of Belshazzar, and the capture of his father Nabonidus here at Birs; for Birs was the old Borsippa of classical writers. Or, perhaps, Xerxes, who in his indignation at a rebellion destroyed the great temple of Bel, on the other side of the river, which even Alexander could not rebuild, made a ruin of this tower also.

We picked up fragments of the melted bricks as momentos, but refrained from scratching our names by the side of others which we recognized on the tower itself. An owl yielded us a few feathers to add to our memorials of the ruin of a once populous capital. We made notes of the French diggings, which seemed conducted far in the line of the architectural investigation, in contrast with these of Mr. Rassam, for the British Museum, who seems to care nothing for the buildings he dug in, but only for the tablets and historical inscriptions he might find. Just under the peak of the hill we saw a large building dug open by him, the long series of rooms built about a central court, and Jasin pointed out to us this room and that, and this layer of ashes and that, where tablets and "barrels" were found. He had charge of the seventy men who worked here two years at thirteen cents a day, and he knew only tablets and "barrels." An intelligent Arab he was, and was pleased to get his back sheesh of twenty cents, as much as Mr. Rassam, or, rather, Daud, had paid him for a day's overseeing in the flush years of the last explorations. Now a stray Arab may occasionally find and open an old grave, and perhaps dig out a tear-bottle, an earthen bowl, or even a gold ear-ring; but Birs is too far from Hillah to invite the wholesale depredations which ransack every rod of Babylon.

The pictures taken, we mounted our horses to return to Hillah. We looked behind us to carry away the full impression of the mighty ruin which had remained unaffected by sun and storm for over two thousand years. The Hindiye water, like a great lake, in the near distance, made a useless defense of about two-thirds of the circuit. Along the bare land we took our way back up and down the neglected canals and ditches. As we approached the town we looked back again to see a streak of sky appearing beneath the dull clouds just at sunset. Brilliantly red shone the level clouds, with the long mound and the cone and the ruined tower projected against them. Above, the angry sky was rather lurid than brilliant. Before us, where the palm trees of the Euphrates began to show against the sky, a bright band of red rose and seemed to curve on the clouds, and within it a softer flush colored the heavens. I thought at first it must be that an imperfect arc of a rainbow was showing but a single color, but the angle made with the setting sun was not that of a rainbow. A more gorgeous sunset I have seldom seen, and one fit to end a memorable day, From Babylon, with its magnificence, its teeming population, its hundredfold alluvial gardens, its mighty ample, we return to Hillah, dirty Turkish Hillah, squalid, decaying Turkish Hillah. Ah! that adjective Turkish will repeat itself as the concentrated quintessence of all that is thriftless and ruinous. Why is it that the Turks, gentlemanly, kindly, lovable men, can only ruin what they hold? Does it run back, at last, to an utter lack of honesty, and to a universal distrust of each other's honesty? Or it is a Turcoman characteristic, something racial, which makes the Turk a magnificent destroyer and an intolerable ruler? The racial theory does not satisfy me. The Turkish blood is all mixed. I believe that moral education will, in a few generations, correct every other lack, and that moral degeneracy will in a few generations destroy every intellectual and executive capacity.—William Hayes Ward, D. D in The Independent.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, April 8, 1885.

We were out to Mentone in Kosciusko County last Sunday, where we went, in response to requests, to preach two or three discourses. Brother R. C. Railsback is now a resident of that new and flourishing town on the Nickel Plate Rail Road. Through his influence Brother B. Woodward held a series of meetings there last winter. Under his preaching an encouraging interest was awakened to hear more on the grand themes of redemption and restitution. It is our hope and prayer that this devoted Evangelist may once more be enabled to visit this locality and hold forth the word of life. Brother C. H. Jones, Editor and Publisher of Our Rest, in Chicago was at our meeting, and came home with us to Plymouth.

Certain and Reliable, If the Trumpet Give the Certain Sound.

"Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, "John i. 29-34. "He took part of the same (flesh and blood) that through death he might destroy the devil—and deliver," Heb. ii. 14-15.

This process must be of—a part is not the whole—God on the upper grade that "the way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell beneath," Prov. xv. 24. "The old man must be put off; and the new man, in its supernatural grace, put on, Eph. iv. Here is both argument and illustration combined, "Natural birth is now the prelude to death." Hence "ye must be begotten,—born again!" John i. 12, 13; iii. 3, 5; 1 Pet. i. 3, 13; or fall of "life which is life indeed," 1 Tim. vi. 19. Revised version and Greek. All like texts from Creation to Restitution, require this "record that God has given of his Son," Matt. i. Luke i. John i. 1 John i. "God hath magnified his word above all his name," Psa. cxxxviii. 2. He has guarded it as he did the tree of life," Gen. ii. 17; iii. 24; Deut. xviii. 18, 22; Prov. xxx. 6; Rev. xxii. 18, 19. The grand features of Revelation, as to the sonship of Jesus make him David's Lord as certainly as he is "his Son," Psa. cx. 1; confirmed six times in the New Testament. His maternity through Mary of David's lineage makes him Jesus the Christ according to the flesh; while his Divine paternity reveals him "The Branch of the Lord—Jehovah," Isa. iv. 2; xi. 1, 9; Jer. xxiii. 5; Zech. iii. 8; Luke i. 78. Margin.

It is under this associated relation, that the name of David's Lord—adon—occurs in Prophetic vision, Isa. xlviii. 10; lxi. 1. "The Lord God and his spirit hath sent me! "It reads" —Adonai—Jehovah and his spirit, hath sent me. "On this lofty range of truth we baptize in the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, Math. xxviii. 19; nay more, the gospel form of blessing, takes in the same comprehensive doctrine. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all," 2 Cor. xiii. 14,—no human sonship here!

This gives to the Lord Jesus his proper preeminence, in his relation to God, as in both Testaments, and also to his many brethren by adoption of whom Jesus is "the first born," Rom. viii. 29, 30; Col. i. 18. Joseph's son as such could not excel David as "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity," but Mary's son "conceived by the Holy Ghost," fills the picture, Amen.

Infidel philosophy argues God out of "the record" of creation and providence, and the eliminator of our gospel would fain in his darkness, argue off the very headships of the Son of God. However it remains that "the head of woman is the man, the head of man is Christ, and the head of Christ is God!" 1 Cor. xi, 3. We read "Ye are Christ's" and Christ is God's 1 Cor. iii. 23.

God's ways are equal, he "makes the tree good that the fruit may be good," on the line of the new heart, new man, new covenant, new earth; and all things new. But the opposing view builds at best on "dust and ashes," for a foundation. Gen. xviii. 27. Their "vine" has rottenness, even at the root. Their man is "mortal man," in whom (as such) is "no hope." Yet it assumes to "eliminate" this central truth of Christ's miraculous birth! Its advocates seem never to have seen that it is "high as heaven," above them. Isa. lv. 8-11. They need to learn that "such a High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless—separate from sinners and made higher than the heavens!" Heb. vii. 25-28. Note. We own Joseph's place in "the record, and also accept Mary's—her Son, and heir to the throne of his father David—with God over all—to it all." Faith accepts the record in its integrity. "It is the Lord's doing—marvellous in our eyes." Amen.

Their assumed elimination would strike out all such essentials of that "word which God has magnified above all his name." Ps. cxxxviii. 2. Jno. i. 11-14. Hence it seems a presumptuous, fallacious and fatal error! Rev. xxii. 18-19. "Immanuel—God with us—David's Lord at the right hand of God,—God magnified in the flesh, etc., are all eliminated on that delusive view, and so Jesus' birth is brought down to the low plane of the old Adamic race in its "lost," outcast condition. Jacob's ladder without its top in heaven; and David's Lord not at the right hand of God.

Observe! David spoke "as a prophet" of things then future; as also Isaiah, who associated Adon, David's son, by name, with the God of Israel and his spirit! Hence, we cannot treat the Sonship of Christ, and the integrity of "God's record of his Son,"—as if that view could be Christian—except as a part of the foretold apostasy, ending in perdition.

According to the gospel of God—"the natural man" must give place to "the spiritual—the new man!" Hence the notion or a mortal fatherhood can not—must not displace the Divine; seeing that "this present evil world is to give way to that which is to come, under Christ. Heb. ii. 5, 14. "The immortal King."

The incipient stage of all this gospel is given with the name of Jesus—the Savior! Matt. i. Luke i. This name (so originated, so honored in baptism and transfiguration) appears, with variations, over a thousand times! It is the central truth of "the gospel of God." Hence our "rock," Matt. xvi. 16-18, is "not their rock," "they themselves being judges," or they could not presume by such logical legerdemain, to attempt to "eliminate it!"

If they could, they should see that "Israel" is bereft of their "Deliverer," Rom. xi. 26-29; and the church, with creation, is left under "the bondage of corruption." Rom. viii. 14, 2, 3.

It "takes away David's Lord,—Israel's Prince and Savior," Acts v. 31; while yet there is no other name under heaven—by which they or any can be saved! Acts iv. 12.

"Father forgive them, (if ignorantly," 1 Tim. i. 13,) for they know no "other record" of thy Son—no other "rock" on which the church can stand! Note, one hundred promises, prophecies and figures of the Old Testament, cluster and center here, to confirm our faith in God's only begotten Son—Jesus the Christ. His many "joint heirs" are created anew "after God's likeness." (Conybeare) Eph. iv. 22. 1 Pet. i. 3. 1 John iii. 2.

This requires the Resurrection, Restitution and all things new! Not a spot or wrinkle of the old will be left to mar its Divine perfection. "Amen and Amen." Ps. lxxii. 20.

"STAR DIFFERETH FROM STAR IN GLORY."

Of the physical and literal fact mentioned in 1 Cor. xv. 41; that "one star differeth from another star in glory," there cannot be two opinions, for the thing is ocularly evident to every one. The question of distances, or magnitude, has nothing to do with the obvious fact itself. There it is, however caused, or whatever reason in the wisdom of the great Creator, "star differs from star in glory." They are not all equally bright, they are not all at the same apparent distance from us, there is no uniformity in these respects; but they are all luminous, all are light bearers, all are pure and beautifully brilliant. This is their common "glory." As to size and position it matters not; all are light, all are splendid gems of the robe of the great King, "who coverath himself with light as with a garment." When our Lord was transfigured, "His face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light," appropriate illustrations of the glory which belonged to him when he dwelt in "light which no man can approach unto, before he emptied himself and took upon the form of a servant, that he might give believers sonship, and in the resurrection clothe them with glory.

It is impossible to conceive anything grander or more exquisitely beautiful as an intimation, or illustration, of what the children of God are to be in resurrection. "There is one glory of the sun, and another of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for star differeth from star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead."

It is charmingly appropriate that the future of the sons of light should be suggested to them by the stars of heaven: that is their individual position; for their aggregate glory—an intensely brilliant constellation—is intimated by the Lord when he says, "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father" Matt. xiii. 43. The stars are seen by night. The righteous have been God's witnesses during the long moral night of the world's history. What a wonderful story it is! How densely dark everything would have been, but for the stars that God has placed here and there, of very different degrees of light, in the firmament of history! The literal stars of heaven could not be plucked from the firmament by the guilty lovers of darkness; but how they have hated and persecuted and slain the men who have been true to God, "the Father of the lights of heaven," is the chief burden of all history. The story of the world is simply one of war—that of the prince of darkness and his demons against the Prince of life and his followers. It is an old story, and has been told a thousand times. Let us toll it once more, as we wish to have a look at the Lord's veterans, when the war is over, to see whether they are poor pensioners, lame, blind, battered, bruised, crawling on crutches, with memories of a thousand hardships, and the fact of a present pauperism that renders life a burden, and reminds them constantly that the "glory" resulting from the war in which they were volunteers is an invisible quantity; or whether it is something different. Time seems slow with all its speed. The Lord bears long with his foes, and long with his elect, that cry day and night unto him.

"Careless seems the great Avenger; history's pages but record
One death-grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and the Word;
Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong for ever on the throne—
Yet that scaffold sways the Future, and, behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

Well, then, let us be true to our "Leader and Commander," accepting His Word as our rule of life and action on the great battle-field of faith. We may safely trust him, however appearances may seem to thwart his revealed purposes, and bring clouds over his promises. He is worthy of our loyal confidence, and genuine faith can stand the hottest fire.

"Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and
'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubling in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified,
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied.

Count us o'er earth's chosen heroes—they were souls that stood alone,
While the men they agonized for hurled the contumelious stone,
Stood serene, and down the future saw the golden beam incline
To the side of perfect justice, mastered by their faith divine
By one seamless robe of truth to manhood and God's supreme design."

It seems clear even to ordinary intelligence, when it sets itself to think for a few minutes, that Truth, as it is under the special guardianship of God, its Author and Defender, must some day have a triumphant vindication before the universe. And the logic of ordinary thought on this matter coincides perfectly with the utterance of revelation—God's "eyes are upon the truth;" and the rewards promised to "those who are valiant for the truth upon the earth," are among the proofs that it shall not always be trodden in the streets, but shall rise on buoyant wing in its peerless beauty, and receive the homage of the nations.

But the comparison of the saints in resurrection to stars differing in glory, teaches that even then uniformity in position, or attainment will be unknown. All will have glory. The idea of incorruptibility and Christ-likeness, carries that with it, of course; but God's great law of variety, with its never ending types of beauty, will obtain then as it does now. The suspicion of partiality must not be allowed to creep into the thought, but there will be great as well as little ones in the kingdom of God. The least will not feel that anything has been withheld that he was qualified to receive, and the greatest will wonder at the Divine munificence that has given him such a "weight of glory." The feeling of envy on the one hand, or superiority on the other, will not shade the splendor of God's redeemed. Each will feel that he is exactly in his place, that no other position could have suited him; and the harmony of admiration will never be broken by a jarring note.

There is an exquisite verse in the sixty-eighth Psalm, which we hope will not be "improved" by the learned Revisers; for, whatever may be its exact meaning, the remarkable contrast between the two images it contains, vividly suggests thought concerning the "now" and "then" of Christ's followers.

"Will ye lie among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

When these sons of light look back upon their mortal story, what sad scenes will memory recall! and when they think of their incorruptible condition as the children of the resurrection, what an amazing contrast! The idea of casting their crowns before the throne, seems, under the circumstances, the most natural thing imaginable! That will not be able to help it! They must do it! Gratitude, wonder, admiration, an overwhelming sense of the results of redeeming love, will constrain them to fall prostrate before the glorious Redeemer, who has done such unspeakable things for them.

But "stars. Surely there is another thought in this similitude. Does it suggest the precious thought of purity? O, incalculable crown of redemption! Perfect, spotless, transparent, eternal purity! The very thought is bliss, and what will the realised fact be? If the Lord is able and willing to lead any of his people up to this transcendent issue of his work, they need no further proof of his marvellous love. But he is both able and willing: "Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word; that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." Let us, therefore, in hope of this surpassing blessing, close with the sublime doxology: "Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen!"—Dr. Leask, in Rainbow.

THE GUTENBERG BIBLE.

Before the middle of the fifteenth century there were no printed books. During the previous century Wiclif translated the Bible into English. "When the great work was done," says the Rev. F. L. Ewell in the February number of the Andover Review, "every possible means was taken to spread it. Great pains was taken to multiply copies. It seems an anachronism to speak of the publication of a book before the invention of the printing-press, but there was a recognized method of publishing in the days of manuscripts.

A person would read the book slowly from a platform or pulpit to a company of transcribers. As he read they would write down his words. In this way hundreds of copies might be made from a single reading. This was a slow progress compared with the steam printing-press, but labor was cheap. Multitudes of copies were also made of portions of the new translation. The whole Bible cost the equivalent of $200 now, but even the poor man might have a copy of the Beatitudes or the fourteenth chapter of John. So many copies were made, and so carefully was it treasured, that a hundred and fifty copies of the whole, or a part, survived a century's war of extermination, and have come down to our day." Ecclesiastical hostility and the absence of printing prevented Wiclif from giving the Bible to England.

Block-books or Books of Images were the precursors of printing. Though their origin and date are doubtful, they are considered as belonging to the first half of the fifteenth century and to Germany or Holland. About ten of these books are well known, the most celebrated being the Biblia Pauperum or the Bible of the Poor. This title has given an erroneous impression of its real character and history. It is not probable that this volume of rude pictures with Latin inscriptions was used as a Bible by the poor. Says the Rev. Dr. Arthur T. Pierson: "In those days so few could read even the English, it is difficult to see of what use to the uneducated multitude a book could be, all of which was in Latin. The Franciscan friars, who were the principal preachers of that day, were wont to assume the humble name of 'Paupores.' And this volume was probably used by them to aid in teaching others, and called Biblia Pauperum, not with reference to those for whom, but rather by whom it was used. It is not properly a Bible in any sense, as it contains but a few roughly executed illustrations with brief descriptive and explanatory Latin sentences."

Says the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia: "It consists of a series of forty leaves, printed on one side, so as to make twenty when pasted together, on which forty scenes from the history of our Lord are depicted; underneath are the inscriptions in the abbreviated Latin of the period. The title given above is probably misleading. It was not intended for the poor people so much as for the poor friars who went about preaching, and would, no doubt, derive help in the composition of their sermons from the pictures. Besides, they could be shown with advantage to their audiences." It was printed, not with type, but from wooden blocks as are ordinary wood-cuts. It has so little relation to the printed Bible, that it would not be mentioned in this connection, except for its name which has given it this association. Fac-similes of it are often seen in the book-stores, but an original Biblia Pauperum is seen in the case of Block-Books at the Lenox Library. As the cuts have not been colored, this copy is in a very clean and perfect condition. Other Block-Books in this collection are extremely valuable from their rarity and relation to the history of printing. Similar copies have been sold for several thousands of dollars each.

The Scottice Biblia Pauperum, recently issued in this city by A. C. Armstrong and Son, is not a fac-simile of the famous Block-Book we have mentioned, but a reproduction of a series of pictures from ancient blocks, with printed descriptions from the writings of Wolff. It has received this title merely because its purpose resembles that of the Block-Book after which it is named. It represents the era of early printing, whereas the larger "Biblia Pauperum" represents the era before early printing.

"The secular history of the Holy Scriptures is the sacred history of printing. The Bible was the first book printed and the Bible is the last book printed," says Mr. Henry Stevens. At some time between 1450 and 1456, Gutenberg at Mentz produced the volume in Latin which is now known as the Gutenberg Bible, the first book printed with movable types. It is also called the Mazarine Bible, from the fact that a copy of it was found in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. Like many others of the earliest printed books it has no date, but an inscription by Cromer, the illuminator and binder of the copy in the National Library at Paris, shows that it was printed before August, 1456.

Twenty-eight copies of this book are known, two of which are in this country, one in the Lenox Library and the other in the library of Mr. Brayton Ives of Brooklyn.

The earliest dated specimen from printing with movable types is a Letter of Indulgence of November 15, 1454, probably printed by Gutenberg at Mentz. It is well for humanity that the first printed book was the Bible, which has made all such letters an abomination in the eyes of an enlightened world.

Gutenberg, like nearly all inventors, has not won his title to fame without great contention. Holland has long claimed the honor for Coster of Haarlem. Statues have been erected, tablets placed, medals issued to commemorate one whom the rest of the world has come to regard as fictitious. Mr. De Vinne, in his book on the "Invention of Printing," devotes three chapters to an exposure of the spuriousness of "The Coster Legend." According to the legend, Gutenberg was in the employ of Coster in Haarlem, and absconded to Mentz with the types and the secret set. Dr. Van der Linde's volume, in opposition to the Coster story, was received with so much indignation by his countrymen, that he left Holland to reside in Germany. Mr. Hawkins, in his "First Books and Printers of the Fifteenth Century," presents the summary of the documentary and historical evidence in favor of Gutenberg.

A Warsaw paper relates that a Russian official about to make a journey, asked the head of his department if he had any commissions. His chief, having much reason for being hostile to the press, replied, "Yes, if you are in Frankfort be so kind as to look up the statue of Gutenberg and spit in his face." Gutenberg's first and greatest work will receive more attention in another paper.—Wendell Prime, D. D., in N. Y. Observer.

He that Endureth.

"He that endureth to the end shall be saved"
Matt. xxiv. 13.

A mighty tide of evil is bearing the world farther and farther from God, and its chilling waves are dashing their spray upon the very pews of the church. A sight painful to angels, it must have been, to behold for six thousand years the great majority of earth's inhabitants in one grand procession marching down to death, led by the great arch enemy of God. Steadily have the ranks increased; and now when Satan well knows that his time is short, he is executing the best laid plans to take men captive, and lead them at his will.

—It will not avail us—that we know the right way, and are somewhat aware of Satan's devices, if we do not walk uprightly. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." Our knowledge in such a case would only increase the greatness of our downfall. Knowledge will not preserve us. True wisdom which is sanctified knowledge, will direct us, as helpless and needy, to him who is mighty to save. The most intelligent may be made by Satan to serve him as his most devoted children, and the strongest man, though he boast of his moral power and uprightness, cannot alone withstand his wiles. Jesus told us all this in these few words: "Without me, ye can do nothing."

Who, then, will finally be saved? Who will finally awake in the possession of never-fading glory and immortality? Who will share in the ineffable joy of the meeting by and by? Who will sing the song of the redeemed, and join in the triumphant strain of victory over death and the grave? Who will sit down with the Captain of our salvation upon his throne? "He that endureth unto the end, the same shall be saved."

The love of the world, of old associations, the flattery of mistaken friends, the present ease of the broad way, will doubtless cause many who once loved the truth to turn from it and choose an easier religion, or none at all. Oh, fatal turn! "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." There is no safety far from God. Enoch walked with God, and they who endure the trials and temptations of these times must do the same.

There never was a time when the power of the adversary was more manifest. God's people must keep their eyes upon Jesus. They must struggle toward the light. "Strive to enter in at the straight gate." If we will do this, then we shall be sure of eternal life. Jesus says of those who faithfully put their trust in him and follow him, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." John x. 27.

DIED.

WOODBURY.—At the residence of her son, Charles H. Woodbury, near this city, March 31, 1885, Mrs. Amanda Woodbury, aged 81 years, two months and six days.

The deceased, whose maiden name was Amanda Cushing, was born at Bethel, Windsor County, Vermont, Jan. 23, 1804; removed to Morrow County, Ohio, in 1833; and from there to Marshall County, Indiana, in 1848, where she resided during the remainder of her life. She was the mother of six children of whom only one, Mr. C. H. Woodbury, survives her.

For all those traits, that together make up true excellency of character, the deceased was one of the most eminent examples. She was a woman noted for her piety, benevolence, charity, and sympathetic kindness. On the final destiny of the human race, she entertained the larger hope. She believed that, sooner or later, the results of the great salvation would be to elevate millions from the lower to the higher life, and that Christ had come as a Savior to redeem man and bring in everlasting righteousness, and as a Restorer to abolish death and eradicate every form of evil from God's universe. Whether these fonder and more far-reaching hopes of her loving nature shall ever be realized to the full extent of her glad anticipations or not in the on-coming ages, yet we believe that the redeemed, in the aggregate, will be multitudes that no man can number. Leaving a memory embalmed in the heart of hearts of surviving friends she now sleeps till the day of Resurrection shall dawn on the night of the grave.

"Farewell! Shall my name be forgotten?
O, loved ones think kindly of me!
In the beautiful land that is coming
Some day I will call, love, for thee."

SHIBBOLETH.

"Say now Shibboleth," they cried.
They could not say it so they died.
Forty-two thousand brothers died,
Slain at the fords of the Jordan.

In that old and bloody time,
A small thing was a deadly crime,
And father's sons were slain by those
Who held the fords of the Jordan.

"Say now Shibboleth," still they cry,
"Say our Shibboleth, or die."
And many a brother falls by those
Who held the fords of the Jordan.

And still the river runs with gore,
And brothers fall to rise no more,
By the cruel hands of those
Who held the fords of the Jordan.

Dear Sister W——

Your letter of the 26th inst., is received. I am surprised, and yet amused! Diverted, and yet dumbfounded! I am at a loss what to make of you. It is first this way; then that way; then any way!

But then a drowning man will catch at straws! Climb aboard the old gospel ship, dear sister: climb aboard.

In my reply I will be as brief as possible. I am sorry that you still use that old exploded text in Mark ii. 27; which reads in the Greek thus:—"Kai elegen autois; to sabbaton dia ton anthropon egeneto; ouch o anthropos dia to sabbaton." Now we will give you a word for word translation. "And he said to them; the Sabbath, because of the man, was made, not the man because of the Sabbath." So you can readily see that the noun, man, is not used here, as you assert, in the generic sense and applicable to all men—or the race,—irrespective of sex, color or previous conditions, etc. Then why not be honest and surrender to the preponderance of testimony? If you want to build on a mistranslation you surely show a spirit of bigotry. All Sabbatarians of any learning, admit that "ton" (the) precedes the noun "anthropon" (man) in Mark ii. 27.

I will now give your quotation, verbatim, of the Master's words. "The Sabbath was made at creation: and Jesus said it was made for man and that too before the fall." Now sister, Jesus has said no such thing. Why don't you quote and cite Scripture? and not tell us what some Sabbatarian has said or says, and which you say that you "believe." The devils believe and tremble! Will that save them? You say that "you believe that the Sabbath was made for the whole human race;" suppose that you do. Is that any reason that I should? Is your belief proof in the matter? The Hindoo mother believes—and she is just as honest in her belief as you are—that when she consigns her darling babe to the dark waters of the Ganges, to the merciless jaws of the greedy crocodile; or throws it under the ponderous wheels of the car of Juggernaut, she believes that she appeases the wrath of God! Must I believe it? Does that make it so? The Indian truly believes that after he has committed many atrocities, that immediately at death, he enters the "happy hunting grounds," therefore I must believe it forsooth, for it is so! Strange argument this! Give us evidence of the facts—if they are facts,—and we will believe them too. I ask for only one passage of Scripture proof, that any Gentile was ever under any obligations to keep the Ten Commandments unless he was circumcised. Just one. You say that circumcision is done away: therefore no one is now under obligation to keep them, much less the Sabbath.

"It is evident," you say, "that God had a law, which was handed down by tradition from Adam to Moses." We admit that God had "a law" from Adam to Moses: but that it was the Ten Commandments, we positively deny; and will cite and quote evidence to support the denial. Acts xiv. 16, God "who in times (years) past, suffered all nations to walk after their own ways." "He showeth his word (the Ten Commandments) unto Jacob, his statutes and judgments (the balance of the law) unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any (other) nation; and as for his judgments they have not known them." (Psalm cxlvii. 10.) No amount of evasions or cavilling will invalidate this testimony. But we quote more. "And Moses went up unto God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, 'thus shalt thou say unto the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel.'" Now we ask you, who is the house of Jacob? Who are the children of Israel? Is it all men? the entire "human race?". Israel, first, is the circumcised sons of Jacob: the great-grand-children of Abraham. Second, They are the nation that God brought up out of the land of Egypt, to whom God, with an audible voice, enunciated the Ten Words; to whom he said: "If ye will obey my voice (when ye have heard it) and keep my covenant (that I gave to Abraham, viz., circision, see Gen. xvii. 10), then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all (other) people; ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. These are the words thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel." Exodus xix. 5, 6.

Query:—If all nations were required to keep the Ten Commandments, how would Israel become a peculiar people, above all other people, by keeping them? And second, If Israel had the Ten Commandments and were keeping them before they were come to Sinai, why did God require them to do something that they were already doing? "Why seek for immortality if you have it?" Is a question you often put to those who believe what the serpent taught. Please be consistent. Read Deut. xxvii. 16-19, in connection with Ex. xix. 5, 6.

Once more; and we come now to the giving of the Ten Words. "And God spake all of these words, (not commandments) saying, I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage: thou shalt have no other gods but me." This is perfectly plain that these Ten Commandments had never before been given to any people, and now only to Israel, who had been in the land of Egypt, in the house of bondage. If you ignore these Scriptures and prefer your "believes," without any evidence, surely the veil is upon the heart—understanding—in reading. May the Lord remove the veil so that you can see Christ instead of Moses—the gospel instead of the law.

We have the most undoubted evidence that the Sabbath was not kept, or even known, before Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage; in fact it was given to commemorate that event, and not as you say, "to commemorate God and his creative power!" Thus your theory is a new departure from your leaders, for they say that the Sabbath is a memorial of creation. Truly "the legs of the lame are not equal!" "But," says Moses, "the Seventh Day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.....and remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm. Therefore (for this reason) the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath Day." (Deut. v. 15.) This is to the point, and conclusive. It needs no comments or constructions upon it. There are no switches here!

THE BIBLE PROVED BY ITS INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

Having reached the conclusion that our reason accepts the credentials and authenticates the truth of revelation, we proceed to cite the proof afforded by the Bible itself, the internal evidence, and to examine the contents of the holy volume as forming the rule and guide of our life, and acquainting us with a knowledge of the destiny of our race and world.

There are few things in which the Divine wisdom is more conspicuous than in the great age attained by the patriarchs. At that early pre-historic period men were dependent chiefly on the personal testimony of eye-witnesses of the Divine manifestations, or, what was of the next value, on the accounts of those who had received the facts with as little of second-hand statement as possible. When we remember that the flood occurred 1,656 years after creation, and that Adam lived 930 of these years, and that Noah was 600 years old when the deluge occurred, there remains only a gap of 120 years between Adam and Noah, and as Noah's father Lamech was 182 years old when Noah was born, he lived with Adam 56 years, and was contemporary with Noah 595 years, dying but five years before the flood. Noah had thus the advantage of this long intercourse with one who had lived 56 years with Adam, the father of mankind. Thus Noah had a knowledge of man's history from one, himself but one degree removed from the first man.

The generations after the flood were but little less favored, when we remember that the birth of Abraham was 1,996 years before Christ, and taking that sum from 4,004, the age of the world at that time, it was but 2,008 years from creation; and if we take the epoch from the flood from the era of creation, that is, 1,656 from 2,008, we have from the flood to the birth of Abraham, 352 years. But as Noah lived 350 years after the flood, it appears that he lived within two years of Abraham's birth, and Noah's son Shem (probably the Bible Melchisedec), who lived 502 years after the flood, was the contemporary and companion of Abraham for 150 years, the difference of time between Abraham's birth and Shem's death. This gives us only four witnesses from creation to Abraham, to wit, Adam, Lamech, Noah and Shem.

The interval from Abraham to Moses is bridged over by the long lives of Isaac (180 years), Jacob (147), Joseph (110) and their successors in Egypt to Moses. Meantime the Israelites preserved their isolation as a distinct race by circumcision, and jealously guarded their traditional history, refusing to be incorporated with their Egyptian taskmasters, thereby escaping the danger of losing their identity and the memory of their traditions.

To Moses revelations were dictated by Jehovah personally, and by him they were recorded in written language, and supernaturally preserved in the ark of the covenant, and by the Levites up to the building of the temple, and in that sanctuary afterward, and to their conquest and captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, and during that captivity and exile, by the prophets Daniel, Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and by Ezra and Nehemiah, for, on their restoration and the rebuilding of the temple, we find the last two in possession of the sacred oracles, and reading them publicly in the audience of the people.

Their safe custody in the second temple continued unto Christ, for we learn that the law, the prophets, and the Psalms, from which our Lord quoted (Luke xxiv. 27-44; and elsewhere), were all in the possession of the Jews up to that period, have remained with them to this day. The authenticity of these chronicles of the Jews as a people is further establish by the reference to them in the New Testament in which the genealogy of Christ is traced by Matthew up to Abraham, and by Luke to Adam. It is impossible to suppose, humanly speaking, that his lineage could have been thus traced without these Jewish records, which were accepted as genuine and indisputable.

As to the books of the New Testament, the whole Eastern world, especially the literature and the learning of Greece and Rome, presented unusual facilities for multiplying copies of such remarkable books, in many languages, and for their preservation and circulation. This seems to preclude the possibility of their loss or essential mutilation. It should be added also, that by a special Providence of God, the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues, in which the Holy Scriptures were written, became not long after the death of Christ, by reason of the overthrow and dispersion of the Jewish people and the early downfall of the Roman Empire, dead languages, and were no longer subject to those changes in the use and meaning of words which a living language always undergoes. Thus the Divine revelations became stereotyped, if we may use the expression, and so remained, to the discovery of the art of printing, which being "the art preservative of all arts," multiplies and secures to the million, at this day, the cheap and well-nigh universal diffusion of the blessed book, heaven's best gift to man.

With this review of the testimony, both human and Divine, every intelligent and honest man perceives that every hypothesis impeaching the truth of the Bible and resting on a supposed defect of the testimony showing its transmission to us, is based on false premises and falls to the ground?

Opening the Bible, we read in the first verse of the first chapter of the first book of the sacred record, as follows: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth;" and turning to the last part of the last book of the same volume, we read: "Behold I create a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away."

Was ever book placed in man's hands with supremer claims to his interest, his admiration, and his gratitude; opening with the announcement of the creation of one world, and closing with the promise of another!

From this great primal truth taught in Genesis i. 1, we deduce by simple logic the following imposing conclusions:—

I. That the Bible contains within itself in prophecy and history, the record of the past, present, and future of our race and world. It acquaints us with the origin and history of one world, and foretells the creation of another, with its characteristics of wisdom, righteousness, and Divine blessedness.

II. That the present world is not, as socialists and scientists maintain, a perpetual arrangement, an end, a finality, but the means to an end yet future. We are living under a government not permanent, but temporary and provisional. The present dispensation of man's life, which is the true intermediate and probational state, spans the gulf between Eden lost and Paradise restored; between the Alpha and Omega of our mundane cosmos. Our world and race await new decrees of destiny from their Divine Creator.

III. That it is the purpose of the great Founder and the Builder of all things, at the same time in the future to supersede and remodel the present world, and out of its elements to reconstruct a new dwelling-place for man, though still on the earth, which shall "never be moved out of its place," and which "endureth for ever;" wherein he shall work out of the great destiny for which God intended him in the beginning; when the seed of the woman shall have "bruised the serpent's head;" when there will be reconciliation and harmony between God and man, and the long-promised "glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and goodwill toward men," shall be happily realized.

Now we are to consider the means by which these ends are to be compassed; for God works by means to accomplish His will to us-ward; for as by man sin came into the world, and death by sin, so by man comes also the resurrection from the dead and redemption from the bondage of sin and death.

In His character of "the Builder of all things," we may be assured that as a "wise Master Builder" He does not build without a design, and that design is perfect in kind, and the highest expression of the Divine benevolence. Having that design as the model before His mind, He proceeds to prepare and construct everything, all its parts, with reference to the plan and end He has preconceived. The Bible accordingly informs us that the great Architect of the world, or cosmos, of which man forms a part, has nicely and wisely adjusted the means to the end proposed. "His hand hath laid the foundation of the earth and His right hand hath spanned the heavens; for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created."

The prophet Isaiah informs us, in strains of sublime eloquence, that the great Architect "measured the waters in the hollow of His hand, meted out heaven with a span, comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance." Having finished the task, He saw all the works He had made, and pronounced them, "Good, very good;" and such was the admirable wisdom and the glorious harmony and beauty of their mechanism, that "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."—Rainbow.

A Boy's Hymn.

[Rev. Moriah Jones "wished he could write expressly for boys another version of Charlotte Elliott's hymn, 'Just as I am,' full of bright dreams and happy anticipations."]

"Just as I am," thine own to be,
Friend of the young, who lovest me!
To consecrate myself to Thee,
O Jesus Christ, I come.

In the glad morning of my day,
My life to give, my vow to pay,
With no reserve and no delay,
With all my heart I come.

I would live ever in the light,
I would work ever for the right,
I would serve Thee with all my might,
Therefore to Thee I come.

"Just as I am," young, strong and free,
To be the best that I can be
For truth, and righteousness and Thee,
Lord of my life, I come.

With many dreams of fame and gold,
Success and joy to make me bold;
But dearer still my faith to hold,
For my whole life, I come.

And for thy sake to win renown,
And then to take my victor's crown,
And at thy feet to cast it down,
O Master, Lord, I come.

—Marianne Farningham.

How much more we might make of our family life, of our friendships, if every secret thought of love blossomed into a deed! We are not now speaking merely of personal caresses. These may or may not be the best language of affection. Many are endowed with a delicacy, a fastidiousness of physical organization, which shrinks away from too much of these, repelled and overpowered. But there are words, and looks, and little observances, thoughtfulnesses, watchful little attentions, which speak of love, which make it manifest; and there is scarce a family that might not be richer in heart-wealth for more of them.

A Word of Advice.

It is as easy to be a good man as a poor one. Half the energy displayed in keeping ahead that is required to catch up when behind, would gain credit, give more time to attend to business, and add to the profit and reputation of those who work for gain. Be prompt; honor your engagements. If you promise to meet a man, be ready at the appointed time. If you go out on business, attend promptly to the matter on hand, and then as promptly attend to your own business. Do not stop to tell stories during business hours. If you have a place of business, be there when wanted. No man can get rich by sitting in stores or saloons. Never "fool" on business matters. Have order, system, regularity and promptness. Do not meddle with business you know nothing of. Never buy an article you do not need, simply because it is cheap, and the man who sells it will take it out in trade. Trade is money. Strive to avoid harsh words and personalities. Do not kick every stone in the path—more miles can be made in a day by going steadily on, than by stopping to kick. Pay as you go; a man of honor respects his word as he does his bond. Aid, but never beg. Relieve others when you can, but never give what you can not afford to, simply because it is fashionable. Learn to say no. No necessity for snapping it out, dog-fashion, but say it firmly and respectfully. Have but few confidants. Use your own brains rather than those of others. Learn to act and think for yourself. Be vigilant. Keep ahead, rather than behind the times. Young man, cut this out and place it, by careful perusal, in the golden storehouse of your brain, and if you find there is folly in the argument, let us know.

Dear Children,

A little girl once asked her mother, which was the greatest sin, to tell an untruth or to steal; her mother replied both are sinful my child. The little girl then said, mother, I have been thinking it was worse to tell an untruth, because if I should steal I could take it back, but I cannot take back an untruth. This reminds me about a man of God who was sent by Jehovah to a place, the name of which signifies "The house of God." There he was to cry against an altar, on which a wicked king, whose name signifies "Fighting against" had sacrificed to idols. When the king heard what the man of God testified, he put forth his hand saying, Lay hold on him, and instantly the king's hand dried up, so that he could not pull it in again. The altar also was rent. Then the king said unto the man of God, Intreat now the face of the Lord thy God and pray for me, that my hand may be restored. So the man of God besought Jehovah, and the king's hand was restored to him. When the king saw the power he manifested he begged him to come home with him, and he would give him a reward, but the man of God declared if the king would give him the half of his house he would not eat bread or drink water in that place, because so utterly disgusted was the Lord with the wickedness of the king and people that he commanded the one sent not to eat a morsel or even return the way in which he had come, so he went another way, which was not far from the dwelling of an old prophet who was not a righteous man. The sons of this prophet had witnessed what had happened to the king and the altar, and when they told it to their father, he said, saddle me an ass quickly that I may go in search of him. So he went after the man of God and found him setting under an oak, and he said unto him, Art thou the man of God who came from Judah? He answered, I am. The old prophet said to him, come home with me and eat bread; but the man of God answered, I may not return with thee, neither will I eat bread or drink water in this place, for it was said to me by the word of the Lord, Thou shalt eat no bread nor drink water, nor turn again to the way thou camest. He said to him, I am a prophet also, as thou art, and an angel spoke unto me by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him back with thee into thine house, that he may eat bread and drink water, but the old prophet lied unto him, nevertheless the man of God believed him instead of what Jehovah had told him, and while they sat at the table, the word of the Lord came to the old prophet, and he cried unto the man of God, saying: Thus saith the Lord, Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and hast not kept the commandment which the Lord thy God commanded thee, but camest back and hast eaten bread, in the place of the which Jehovah did say to thee, eat no bread and drink no water, thy body shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers. So the prophet who deceived the man of God with a lie saddled for him an ass and he quickly departed. But the man of God had not gone far from the house of the old prophet, when a lion met him by the way, and killed him. O, how terrible it is to fall into the hands of the living God, when we willfully disobey his commands. Strange to say the ravenous lion never touched the ass neither did he eat the body of the disobedient one. But men passed by and saw it cast in the way, and told it in the city where the old prophet dwelt, and when he heard it, he said, it is the man of God, who was disobedient to the word of the Lord. So he brought the dead body back, and laid it in his own grave, and he mourned over him saying, alas my brother! But all the man of God had testified concerning the altar and king, was positively fulfilled by a righteous king, whose name signifies, "The fire of the Lord." And while he was executing the judgment, written, he saw a little spot, and asked, What title is that which I see? They answered it is the sepulchre of the man of God who proclaimed these things that thou hast done. Then the king said, let him alone, let no man move his bones. So they let his bones rest with the bones of the old prophet.

We can see, dear children, how dreadful it is to disobey the word of the Lord, the punishment falls on ourselves, even as it did on the man of God. To obey is better than to sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.

Your affectionate teacher.

ALL WILL BE WELL.

All will be well. I heard this blest assurance,
Flung o'er the borders of the unseen spheres.
It gives me faith and courage and endurance
To walk serenely on, and meet the years.
Like the sweet voice of some consoling spirit,
Down through the silence of the night it fell;
My soul's dim ear was rightly turned to hear it:
"All will be well."

All will be well. Why should we ever doubt it?
There were no blunders in creation's plan.
When God's vast mind conceived, and went about it,
He was not aided or controlled by man.
The stars that move in such immortal beauty
Through their appointed pathways, seem to tell
Our questioning souls, if we but do our duty,
"All will be well."

All will be well. Let not our hearts be troubled
By passing clouds or shadows that may fall,
We must press bravely on with faith redoubled;
The glorious end will justify it all.
I will believe that voice from heaven's portal,
Clear as the utterance of a silver bell;
It spoke to me a truth that is immortal;
"All will be well."

OUR PATIENCE OF FAITH.

Faith is a life of assured confidence of an unseen hope, and surely never was there an unseen life which was so entirely dominated by that unseen hope as his life, who "for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame." This Jesus, in the absoluteness of his dependence upon the Father, in the completeness of his trust in him, in the submission of his will to that supreme command, in the unbroken communion which he held with God, in the vividness with which the unseen ever burned before him and dwarfed and extinguished all the lights of the present, and in the respect "which he had unto the recompense of reward," nerving him for all the example of a life of faith, and is our pattern, as in everything, in this too.

How blessed it is to feel when we reach out our hands and grope in the darkness for the unseen hand, when we try to bow our wills to that divine will; when we try to look beyond the mists of "that dim spot which men call earth," and to discern the land that is very far off; and when we try to nerve ourselves for duty and sacrifice by bright visions of a future hope, that on this path of faith too, when he "putteth forth his sheep he goeth before them," and has bade us do nothing which he himself has not done. "I will put my trust in him," he says first, and then he turns to us, and commands, "believe in God, believe also in Me."—Alexander Maclaren, D. D.

ROOTED AND BUILT UP IN HIM.

COL. ii. 7.

We cannot continue long to live contrary to the world's maxims and customs; if we are not upheld by a strength which comes not from the earth. We must have meat to eat, of which the world knows not. We must be able, in times of conflict and weariness, to fall back upon some support that is stronger than earth can furnish. And we find that in the fact that our Lord Jesus Christ is living yet in our nature, in the heavenly world, a human brother and yet an almighty friend, according as the author of the Epistles to the Hebrew has said: "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession." There is, in one of the valleys of Perthshire, a tree which sprang up on the rocky side of a little brook, where there was no kindly soil in which it could spread its roots, or by which it could be nourished. For a long time it was stunted and unhealthy, but, at length, by what may be called a wonderful vegetable instinct, it sent a fiber out across a narrow sheep-bridge, which was close beside it, and that fixed itself in the rich loam on the opposite bank of the streamlet, whence it drew sap and sustenance, so that it speedily became vigorous. Now what that tiny bridge was to the tree, the resurrection of Christ is to the believer. The Christian life on earth is growing in an unkindly soil; and if it could find no better nourishment than that can furnish it would die; but, taught by the Holy Spirit of God, through faith in the resurrection and ascension of the Lord, it send a rootlet across the the river into the better land, and draws from that all the support it needs to keep it fresh and healthy.—Wm. M. Taylor.

DAY BY DAY.

One of the great mistakes which people are constantly making is overlooking small opportunities and waiting for great ones. The divine plan of life which leads those who accept it higher by slow and imperceptible stages is understood by few; to grasp it firmly and to live by it resolutely is to achieve success at the very start. There is a widespread faith in chance, luck, fortune; in some magical element in the affairs of the world which if one happens to possess hoists him to prosperity. There is no magic in the growth of a tree; it arises out of the soil a fragile thing, gathers body and vitality year by year, spreads its great arms over the sward at last in centuryold vigor and permanance, by the operation of inviolable laws. In all the sweep of its expanding life not an inch of girth has been added, not a leaf unfolded, by chance, accident, or fortune; a sublime order has enclosed every hour of its growth.

A little child's life is ordered from the first under a law not less pervasive and universal; its growth into power and permanence depends on the same loyalty to the laws which enfold it, and which are to it the unseen highways along which it may pass to the highest success. Slow growth, by hourly loyalty to the best impulses within us and to the smallest opportunities around us, lifts the weak life into a loyal strength and beauty at last. It is not by great and sudden expansions that men and women are brought to the front and charged with high and difficult work of guiding society; it is quiet, steadfast fidelity to the duties of obscurity that brings at last the shining crowns of fame, influence and eminent usefulness. Any future of brightness which does not grow out of a needful a mirage that will lure for a time and then fade into nothingness, and leave life tenfold more barren. Aspirations die only in souls that are disloyal to them; life promises nothing which it will not fulfill to those who set themselves to obey its law.—Christian Union.

COME, LORD JESUS.

"Hasten, O my Savior, the time of thy return; send forth thine angels, and let the dreadful, joyful trumpet sound; delay not, lest earth shall grow like hell, and lest thy church by divisions be crumbled all to dust; delay not lest thine enemies prevail against thy flock, and lest pride and hypocrisy and sensuality and unbelief gain advantage, and when thou comest thou find not faith upon the earth." Delay not, lest the grave should 'boast of victory,' and having learned rebellion of its guest, should refuse to give thee up thy due.

O, hasten that great resurrection day, when thy command shall go forth, and none shall disobey, when the sea and earth shall yield up their hostages, and all that sleep in their graves shall awake 'and the dead in Christ shall rise first'—when the seeds thou sowest corruptible shall come forth incorruptible. Therefore dare I lay down in the dust, therefore my flesh shall rest in hope till thou raise me to the possession of everlasting life. Return, O Lord; how long? Let thy kingdom come! Thy desolate bride saith, Come; the Spirit saith, Come, praying with groanings after thee that cannot be expressed; the 'whole creation' saith, Come, with groanings, waiting to be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God.' Thyself hath said, Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.—Richard Baxter.

The best thing to give your enemy is forgiveness; to an opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to your child, a good example; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity.—Mrs Balfour.

THE MIDNIGHT CRY.

"And at midnight there was a cry made. Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him."—Matt. xxv. 6.

The silvery moon is breaking,
The shadows flee away;
The eyes that look for daylight
Can see a brilliant ray;
The sun with all its splendor
Will soon flash into sight,
The long dark night be over,
And all around be bright.

The watchers on the mountains
Proclaim the day is near;
The cry, "The Bridegroom cometh,"
Has fallen on our ear;
From distant shores the tidings
Are flashed o'er land and sea;
Arise, be up and doing,
Thy King thou soon shalt see.

The waiting time was weary,
But cannot now be long;
The hopes of His appearing
Turns weeping into song.
Makes weak ones strong to labor,
And fainting ones to rise;
And nothing can but Jesus
Be lovely in their eyes.

The garish lights are fading
That glitter here below.
As nearer comes the sunlight
With never-ending glow,
The shrines of His splendor,
The beauty of His face,
The majesty of glory,
And loveliness of grace.

Oh! wake, ye slumbering virgins,
And trim your lamps with oil;
This is no time for sleeping,
The Lord demands your toil,
The wandering ones to seek for
Upon the mountain wild,
And bring them with rejoicing
And safe into the fold.

The fields are white to harvest,
The fig trees cast their leaves;
Go now, and pluck the ripe fruit,
And gather in the sheaves;
Today is ours for labor,
To-morrow may not come;
The Master may have beckoned,
And called His children home.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

In viewing what Jesus has taught concerning the kingdom of God, it is necessary to keep in mind what has been revealed in the Scriptures in relation to it. Any view, disconnected with what is there taught, must be erroneous. Our Lord spake of the kingdom in various ways, using language that was highly figurative at times, but in reading what he teaches, we should never lose sight of the primary signification of the term. Our reason for saying this is, that up to the coming of Christ in the flesh, it had been plainly revealed, that the God of heaven would set up a kingdom on the earth, which should take the place of all the kingdoms on the earth, which should take the place of all the kingdoms of men, and which should stand forever. Also, that the universal king, should be the seed of Abraham, the Christ, and a decendant in the line of David, by the mother, the woman seed, who should sit upon his father David's throne, in Jerusalem, and reign over all nations in righteousness. Therefore when our Lord refers to the kingdom of God, in its future relations he invariable uses terms relative thereto. It will never do, to build up a theory, to say that the kingdom our Savior speaks of, in their hearing relates to and establishes a condition of things by some now called the kingdom of God. Before considering some of the relative terms, we present a few very plain statements concerning the future kingdom.

And the angel said unto her, fear not Mary, thou shalt have a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus, he shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest. And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end, Luke i. 33. Fear not little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure, to give you the kingdom, Luke xii. 32. I appoint unto you a kingdom, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke xxii. 29. The two sons of Zebedee, requested that they might sit, the one on his right hand, and the other on his left in his kingdom, Matt. xx. 20. Who shall judge the living and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom, I Tim. iv. 1. Inherit the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world, etc. These are a few samples of many, in regard to the future literal kingdom, and reign of Christ on the earth. Now the question arises, is there any other kingdom of God taught by Christ or his Apostles. We say no. I believe some teach another kind of a kingdom, and try to show that Jesus taught a present kingdom. To convey some idea, as to the way they understood some of the sayings of Christ, we refer to Matt. vi. 33. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, etc! I suppose they think if they get the righteousness now, they get the kingdom now also, or at least all the kingdom necessary to know anything about. I think the right way to look at Matt. vi. 33, is to compare it with Acts viii. 12. But when they believed Philip, preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized. Were they not baptized for the righteousness? Does not this example correspond with what Jesus taught in Matthew? The truth involved is the same. To seek a thing rightly is to know where to find it, and having found it as the treasure of great price, receive it by an understanding faith, as those who believed Philip. We can only seek the kingdom of God by faith, and we cannot have it without the righteousness. We cannot believe in Jesus, unless we receive him as the Christ, the King of Israel, and we cannot seek the kingdom, unless we seek it through Jesus as the Messiah. The one is inseparably connected with the other, certain it is there is no other kingdom to seek, but that which is revealed in the Scriptures. Paul said he taught none other things than Moses and the prophets did say should come, and will any one affirm he did not preach the kingdom of God. We are prepared to stand by this, from all Paul's teachings. Why it is that any one should try to build up a theory of a kingdom as now existing, may puzzle a lover of truth, but it is no offence to the adversary, though he may assume the garb of righteousness, I no not use this term, with any offensive meaning. Some may honestly differ with what I have written but honesty of purpose, does not alter their position as in opposition to the truth, no matter how honest the motive. It may be, they think the lines are drawn too closely, or that too much is required in the way of knowledge, before baptism, so that if they can accomodate a little, the preconceived notions of their hearers, and make it more palatable to those who may think the literal kingdom where eating and drinking is practiced is a little too strong, etc. Therefore if it can be shown that we need not bother our heads about the future kingdom, but seek the kingdom now existing, it will suit our hearers better, and we can baptize them upon their faith in Jesus, with very little present knowledge. If they are to grow at all, or know any thing of a future kingdom, it will be time enough to learn, when they get a little stronger, etc. That this is the view of some, I have reason to know. But in taking this view they have to meet the Scriptures, and instead of doing their hearers any good, they do them much harm, by leaving them in the dark jeopardising their salvation through lack of knowledge. Let us glance at some of the relative terms we find in the New Testament. Jesus said, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force, Matt. xi. 12. Luke has it, the law and the prophets were until John: Since then the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it. He also said, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God, as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein. These statements in themselves are paradoxical. But is it not easy? We say yes. In the first place can it be literally true, that the kingdom of heaven suffered violence. We think not yet we accept what Jesus said, as referring to a fact in his experience. One thing is very evident, if Jesus himself was the kingdom referred to, they did not take him. The territory was there but they did not take that, yet they took something. If we belong in what Luke says, we are assisted in our conclusions. The kingdom of God is preached. What do the violent take? They take what is preached, how can a hearer take what is preached? I know of only one way, believe what is preached, what do they take then? The doctrine concerning the kingdom for Jesus says they take who is preached, and obeying it they became heirs of the kingdom preached. The same idea is presented by our Lord, when he said, whosoever will not receive the kingdom of God, as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein. Is it not the same kingdom that is received, that is to be entered into, yes. It it not very evident then that to receive the kingdom, is to believe the doctrines concerning it, that when the time comes for the saints to possess it they may enter in? We can arrive at no other conclusion without doing violence to the whole tenor of Scripture. Jesus said the kingdom of God is among you; here we have a different view of the kingdom of God. It here assumes present appearances. What were they? Jesus the Majesty of the heavens was in their midst. The apostles to whom he had promised thrones in the kingdom were there, he was on the territory of the kingdom proper, the subjects were partly there. He had come to his own, but they received him not, it comes not with outward show, as they supposed. All things were ready, and they were invited to the wedding, so that relatively speaking the kingdom of God was among them. In the purpose of God, the kingdom was first offered to the Jews for their acceptance, it come nigh unto them, in that sense it was among them, but they put it away in the person of their King. They would not have this man to reign over them. Tell ye the daughter of Zion, behold thy King cometh, etc. I believe it was necessary that all the conditions of the kingdom should exist at that time, to afford the Jewish nation an opportunity of receiving Christ as their King. Hence we can understand why John and Jesus preached the kingdom of God at hand, saying, repent for the kingdom of God is at hand. They were offered every opportunity of bringing forth fruit meet for repentance. But the tree brought forth no fruit so it was given up, the kingdom which they might have received, was taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruit thereof. They were given every opportunity as a nation, but how few of them were like Nathaniel, who recognised in Jesus the Son of God, and King of Israel. Because they rejected him, God rejected them for his people, and raised up children unto Abraham from among the Gentiles, who were grafted into the commonwealth of Israel, and made partakers of the covenants made with Abraham and David. The Gentiles were invited to partake of what Israel lost by their rejection of Christ, upon a principle of faith, the same in kind as that of Israel, with the addition of faith in Jesus as the Christ Which faith may be summed up in the words of Paul, as the hope of the promises made of God to the fathers, as taught by Moses, and the prophets, for Paul said he taught no other things. To return again to what Jesus says. The violent take it by force.

The kingdom of God is a very expressive term, almost everything in the Scriptures, bears more or less directly upon it, we have an answer to what is said in regard to the violent taking it by force in John, when Jesus perceived that they would come and take him by force, and make him a king, etc. This is a very forcible illustration of our Savior's word: He saw the eagerness and desire of the multitude that the kingdom should be set up then, with Jesus as King, therefore when Jesus used the term violence, he simply gave voice to the eagerness and desire of those who thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear, Luke xix. 11. How are we to reconcile taking a kingdom by force, or pressing into it, and yet be told by parable that it would not yet appear. I think the answer is plain. Jesus taught doctrines relative to the kingdom, the works that he did convinced many that he was the Messiah, they wanted to assert his right to the throne of his father David. They were eager to enter the kingdom with Christ as King, and were ready to resort to violence to place Jesus upon the throne. Hear what they said when Jesus rode into Jerusalem, blessed be the kingdom of our father David, blessed be the King who cometh in the name of the Highest. These expressions all indicated their faith in the kingdom, and the King. This clearly shows how they understood what Jesus taught. But it was not to be then, he must die, and go away first, hence the parable of going to receive the kingdom, and to return, if we rightly divide the word of truth, we shall never adopt the view that it exists now, except as the word believed, and which is as a powerful stimulant to govern the believer in his love and allegiance to the royal head. But it is objected that Jesus never preached his future reign, or said any thing about the promises made to the fathers. Admitting that he did not. Then according to this showing, it is not necessary to know any thing about either the one or the other, or, any way, the knowledge of them is not necessary to make one wise unto salvation, and we are shut up to the conclusion, that the gospel our Savior sent his apostles to preach, had nothing to do with his future reign, or the promises made to the fathers. Alas! Alas! are we to be blinded by such teachings as this? I hope none of my readers have so learned of Christ. If we lose sight of the kingdom in its literal aspect, we are all at sea, in regard to any clear or well defined principle of understanding all or even part of our Lord's sayings. As I said before the term kingdom of God, is only used in the New Testament, first, in the literal, second, in the relative sense. But we must never lose sight of the literal. We have a vivid illustration of this in the case of Jesus before his transfiguration. He said there be some standing here, who shall not taste of death, until they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom. We might infer from this, it was the future kingdom he meant, and truly he had it in view, or the language used would have been useless, but our Savior never meant to convey the idea, that during the life time of those he referred to, he would really come in his kingdom. Peter, one of the eye witnesses, gives us the meaning of our Lord's words. He says, we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of his majesty, when we saw his glory in the holy mount, 2 Pet. i. 16. From this we learn, that the three apostles had a representative view of Christ, when he shall come in his glory to establish his kingdom, and to teach that the view presented, had no reference to the future kingdom, would be sheer nonsense. But in regard to the sophistry, that our Savior never preached his future reign, or said any thing about the promise made to Abraham, to have done so in so many words, would have had no effect upon his hearers, who were Jews. If they had not learned before that Christ was the seed in whom all nations were to be blessed, and who should possess the gate of his enemies, also that he was the Son promised to David, who was to occupy his throne forever, to have told them so would not make them any wiser, but the fact was, they knew all about the covenants made with Abraham and David, all that was necessary in their case, was to prove his Messiahship. Was he to do so by telling them he was Messiah; that would not have proved his claim. His Messiahship, and heirship to the promises made to the fathers, was attested to by John the Baptist, who bore witness of him, and the work he did in the Father's name confirmed what John said, so that if they were not convinced, by these two witnesses, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. The writings of the prophets had preceded the coming of Christ, and their testimony with what was then transpiring established a threefold chain of evidence, which cannot be broken. It was very effective in convincing some who recognized him as the Son of God, and King of Israel, and every true believer will so learn. But then again does not Paul say, he hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son. We answer yes. But if we take this to mean we are already in the kingdom with Jesus, then we have nothing further to look for, if we are in it what more can we want, can we believe that Paul intended to teach that the kingdom of God's dear Son was in existence when he wrote these words? It was utterly impossible that he could do so. The kingdom is future, and has no present existence, the Lord Jesus is not in it yet, nor will be until he leaves his Father's throne, to take his own, and this same apostle says, flesh and blood cannot inherit it, only immortal beings can have any part in it. How can we understand what the apostle says, and what Jesus says, who declared before Pilate that his kingdom was not of this world? There is only one way, which is, in the relative sense, and the context fully sustains this view. We read giving thanks to the Father, who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Thus we see a present condition of things is established, the standing of the saints is secured by the Father. Again. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, etc. A change of condition has now taken place, no longer related to the power of darkness, but relatively speaking translated into the kingdom, or under the jurisdiction of God's dear Son, being joint heirs with him, to the kingdom. Again we read, the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, Rom. xiv. 17.

Does this mean any thing more than that faith and obedience to the gospel of the kingdom of God, brings forth the fruits of righteousness the apostle enumerates? The truth believed results in the condition of mind and action referred to, for he that in these things serveth Christ, is acceptable to God, and approved of men, Rom. xiv. 17. To Rev. 1: is written, I John, who am also your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, Rev. i. 9. Paul says it is through much tribulation we enter the kingdom. Again, John says, referring to the event Paul speaks of. These are they who come up out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. In the three references the kingdom is spoken of, once associated with being in tribulation, twice with tribulation left behind. Shall we conclude from this, that two kingdoms are intended. I think none will contend for this and yet I have heard the one quoted, as proof that the saints are in the kingdom now. With such views entertained for, and hence is made of the primary meaning of the kingdom of God. It is not the tribulation, referred to by John something endured for the kingdom of God's sake? Therefore the term kingdom in this connection is used in its relative significations. To affirm otherwise would create confusion. Again it is claimed by some, that the kingdom of God that Christ preached, was in regard to a condition of things he instituted among his apostles, and believers, that it was a government instituted over those who gave in their allegiance to the Lord Jesus. This they claim is the kingdom of God Christ taught his hearers to seek. It is true the saints are under the Divine government of the Lord Jesus, and joyfully they wear his yoke, desire faithfully to serve him, and be found so doing, when he shall come to reckon with his servants. This is correct doctrine, but to teach this to the exclusion of a necessary understanding and belief of the gospel of the kingdom of God, as it stands related to the promises made to the fathers, and the royal house of David is doing violence to a right division of the word of truth, and confers no benefit on the seeker after truth. The writer is pained to know there are some who set themselves up for teachers, who say the belief of Christ's future reign, or of the promises made to Abraham, is not essential to know or believe before baptism. According to that idea, a good deal of useless labor is expended in contending for their important bearing on the salvation of the believer. In concluding the writer would contend. That the promises made to the fathers, are the essential groundwork upon which the Church of God is built, if the foundation be removed, where shall the righteous stand. The foundation is necessary to the building, without it there is neither symmetry or order. In these promises Christ stands out in great prominence they are essential to the whole. Have we not the Messiah and the kingdom preached in the promise, thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies? Is is not a fact that the simplest way of gaining the knowledge of any system of education is to go to the root of that system? and it is impossible to know the root and ground of Christianity, without which knowledge we cannot believe, and leave out the promises made to the fathers concerning Christ, and to be ignorant of those promises, is to be without faith in the first principles of the oracles of God. Brethren let us earnestly contend for the faith once (for all) delivered to the saints.

Editor Restitution:

As I have received many letters of inquiry by the brethren, concerning this country, I feel that it is my duty to give a description of it, as well as to let them know what the members of the One Body are doing in this our Western Home. Our Home, as we call it, is a very beautiful valley in Union Co., Ore., in the north eastern part of the state, known as the Wallowa Valley, north of Grand Round and east of Walla Walla. The valley proper is near fifty miles in length east and west along the Wallowa river, and from five to eight miles wide, very productive in almost everything but corn. This does not do well on account of cool nights. We are surrounded by mountains covered with pine, fir, hemlock, and other timbers common to the Pacific states.

To the northeast of the valley proper extending perhaps for forty or fifty miles, is a high rolling prairie, a great range for stock, and an excellent country for wheat, a great portion of which is yet open for settlement, and I feel that I can say to those of our brethren that contemplate coming west, that I believe this to be one of the very best portions of this country. I have traveled for some years over the northwest and am satisfied that what I have said is true.

Our valley is productive to the extreme. We have health, prairie, timber, soil, and the best water I have ever seen. Game in abundance, fish that cannot be beat (the noted Red Fish), and are surrounded by the most beautiful mountain scenery.

Our climate is similar to that of Illinois, except the wind, of which we have very little; hence the winter is pleasant, the thermometer went down to 22 deg. below zero last winter, one night only. We had eighteen inches of snow.

We have two towns, Lostine and Joseph, both promising places. Our new church is just being finished in Lostine. We have a membership of about thirty, and at Prairie Creek about sixty in number. Eld. G. Pickett and myself do the preaching mostly. We have held this winter two series of meetings, and Eld. Pickett has had discussion. Two or three were added to our number. In May or June, I am to have a discussion here with a Campbellite from Grand Ronde Valley. Our brethren are all united, and are in earnest in the work of the Master. Bro. Pickett has done a good work here, and by the help of God we expect to hold the fort. We call this Our Home, of course I mean our temporal one, but to express myself, we have battled for the truth so strongly that the popular religions of the day do not make much of a demonstration, and for the first instance in my life I see the truth of God more prominent than error. Thank be to His holy name. Hence you will see why we call this Our Home. Surrounded by high mountains, we feel that we may be safe in the hour of temptation that is coming on all the world, and we want more of our brethren here. There is no reason why God's children should not enjoy this quiet retreat until Jesus comes. Did I not believe that a good livelihood could be had here I certainly would not say come, but we want our brethren with us, and are ready to assist all we can. Our brethren at Prairie Creek want an earnest, active minister. Bro. Pickett is laboring on a farm to maintain his family, and I am tied up in my store. Cannot some one come and make his home with us? God help you in your noble work, is the prayer of your brothers in the Wallowa Valley. J. CONAWAY.

HISTORICAL ASSOCIATIONS OF THE EUPHRATES.

The river, which is the apocalyptic symbol of the dying Ottoman power, has the most illustrious historical associations of any river on earth except the Jordan. It was somewhere on its banks that the Garden of Eden was planted, and that Adam and Eve walked in sinless innocence. It was in this vicinity that Abraham was born. It was here that great Babylon was reared and shot its spiral like towers, as it were, into the heavens. Here, God's people, Israel, hung their harps upon the willows and refused to sing the Lord's songs in a strange land.

ON THE BANKS OF THE EUPHRATES.

There is a correspondence between the state of the literal and political Euphrates. The beautiful valleys that mark the course of the literal Euphrates were once full of life and fertility. Now they are a solitary wilderness—the lurking-place of human ghouls. The mighty cities through which it once flowed are a desolation for ever. The vast ruins raise their sombre heads towards heaven as a mute testimony to eternal truth and as monuments of the vanity of human grandeur—grim sentinels keeping guard over the sleeping dust of the millions buried beneath the debris of ages.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION Advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortality and life of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in all of the Gospel; repentance, and immersions as prerequisites to the remission of sins, and a holy life as essential for salvation.

MID-PEN NOTES.

I would not ordinarily prefer the theme present to mind, this March Sunday, (white with sunlight and new-fallen snow,) but for once, and for now, a few thoughts may serve for suggestion, and all the good and wise in the world, were welcome to correct the smallest error.

I have thought a good deal on the matter of meetings—social in particular,—and the mode of their management, or, if it is a better way of speaking, the course of their operation.

What is a prevalent idea on this subject? Let me answer. That is a social meeting, all believers present, shall as much as possible bear a part, either in vocal prayer, or in "witnessing" by word of mouth; and the latter may be in the way of exhortation, instruction, recapitulations of experience, or glad acknowledgment of God's goodness. I will not here seek to indicate what may be proper for special occasions, when believers who have seldom met, are convened in a kind of associational jubilee. Let our sphere of inquiry be limited to the ordinary and stated gatherings of the kin-folk of the Master. Let us see kindly and quietly about the rule implied or expressed, that all shall bear a part if time permits. Is it a really binding Bible rule? I know there are some who conscientiously deprecate over-urging on the part of the leader of the meeting, whoever he be may be, and especially is it true, that under all circumstances there is ground for doubt whether it is a healthy and wholesome feeling and fashion or tendency, whatever it may be called, for teacher or pupil, leader or follower, clerical or lay, to live and breathe on the verge of grief, or nervous excitation, if there is a panadic [illegible]

Suppose there is a pause. I would to God there was a better appreciation of the sacred sweetness and solemn grandeur of pauses. That the moments of silence were reckoned as golden with the privilege of profitable thinking and praying as they probably should be. There need be no suspected hint of a premium offered to inaction by this, not one least encouragement, or allowance to neglected duty. But I am very sure indeed that there are occasions and times when the unquestionable duty of some, may be silence—and it is clear to my mind, that any thing like artificially or nervously forced or hurried participation, is not wise, and may be in more than one way, detrimental.

There is one pretty safe rule, and that is when a brother earnestly declares to speak, or feels the duty actually incumbent, and has something good to say also, silence is not only not obligatory but it is regrettable. But on the other hand, when there is no sense of privilege or duty, and no consciousness of any thing current in the mind needing expression—silence may not be a sin,—it may be even wisdom. And I would have the common tendency to nervousness when there are intervals of silence, correct'd. Why should half the comfort of a meeting be destroyed through the constant dread of pauses, as if pauses were unholy, incongruous or unbearable? Or why should the pause itself be reckoned in the light of a damaging hiatus, scourge or reminder of chaos? Are not pauses more or less dreaded on account of some real or supposed ability which such stillness might inspire, for a religious nesting in the minds of those who have turned in for a moment from the wide world without?

Disdaining to learn from none who meet for the worship of God, and in that mental frame of humble consideration for whatever portains to evidently reverent attention to the God of all grace, I can be instructed even by Quakers. Not that unbroken silence from beginning to end of a meeting, seems to me desirable,—or that it is Scriptural,—or that it is easy for perfectly developing Christians. But there is something like power in silence after all, if that silence is rightly viewed and rightly used. But to be efficient and fruitful, it should be clearly chosen, and thoroughly improved. It must not be taken as if it were a robbery and a wrong,—and with a perturbed or doubtful spirit, and a self-reproachful solicitude. It must be taken and used intelligently, and with calmness, and content,—taken as a privilege, a blessing, a right. And there ought to be that understanding among brethren, that agreement, that appreciation, that the silence may be the nursery and opportunity of irrepressible good. Then when the Master has prepared the sweet profound, into which the Spirit of God has dropped the precious seed, or deposited the dew of heavenly influence, there comes with it, and over it, a new and welcome force,—a zest, a spirit of an active, which is hard to repress. Especially then, when meetings have drooped through the mental objection of some to conformity to routine, and when there is little to stir the heart in the repetition of things many times reiterated, I think there may be virtue and recuperation in a bath of reticence,—from the very heart as to God; that is the way it ought to be,—and with the secret motion of prayer that God only reads, and certainly knows.

Let me then simply suggest as a possible medicine for some,—a surrender of a little time at the beginning of things, for prayer in absolute silence. Not under the protest of captain, or corporal, or private, in the little company, but by cordial and common consent and agreement. Suppose fifteen minutes were sacredly devoted at the outset, to the most sincere and heartily welcomed, silence, if I may be thus expressed. Or the time be even double that. Then, when the last second is ticked, if there is one with a word, in the love of God, and power of truth—the opportunity is his,—and so with any or all. But if I were to say what I think, I would say, if need be, prolong the solemn and holy silence. I would say let silence do its perfect work,—or the Spirit of God, in the silence. And in the fulness of time, when the word of the Lord was in the heart and on the tongue of the believer, let him speak. I would be strange, if it did not have power from the prayerful delay. We know well from scripture precedent and teaching, that there is a certain grandeur in waiting, a certain promise of abundance, as the reward of waiting on God. Do we know, do we hold, do we practice, and prove the God-pleasing alternative of waiting, not in dullness, but with diligence,—waiting on the Lord who fills immensities, and who is well able to fill the heart held open in silence like a consecrated vessel, to receive the good he gives? Have we nothing to learn? Is there no secret of inspiration yet at least in part, unexplored?

Does any one secretly suppose there is a lurking danger in this balm, and as it might to some appear, this outward blank, of muteness? Does any one dread the on-coming of a kind of Quakerish dumbness, where a voice is seldom heard, and where stillness is almost supreme? I see no need of such an outcome, and should only give this hush of prayer and waiting its true and needful place. I would forever discard the nervous apprehension of sin in stillness,—only when there is a true monition of duty within urging to testimony, and this should not be stifled. I would still have free utterances, and I would have them earnest and forcible, and all the more from the impulse received from an interval sacredly given to restful silence, since the greatest powers come forth from the nursery and opportunity of rest—not indolence, but rest. A sister said she had often wanted the "privilege of glorifying God by keeping still," and of course with the accompanying assurance that no one was perplexed or stumbled by that devotion in quiet, though in the society of saints. I trust these suggestions may be rightly taken. Earnest words are needed indeed in this blinded age,—yet I cannot help thinking that utterance is not always potent in the ratio of its copiousness. If it is unwilling, and a sense, coerced, by ministerial or managerial urgency, if I may so say, it may be of doubtful utility. If, after the duty is performed, there is a painful unrest, the inquiry arises, what can the matter be? I know this may seem a delicate or a difficult topic to treat. I would not over-magnify the sacred delight and edification of silence—but I would give it its full power and place as a means of grace. I would utterly eschew the nervous apprehension and uneasiness, that some may manifest, because there are pauses. Let the meetings be, "God and Liberty," in the grandest sense and acceptation of the words. Let God be all in all, in the assemblies of the saints. Let there be peace, reverence, reflection, brotherly love, waiting on God with expectation, and that understanding and concert of mind, that the place and occasion may be the nursery of the sweetest fruits, and the birth-place of the grandest energies, and the wisest and most God-honoring activities.

Prayer. Its Office and Proper Functions.

It is defined by Webster:—

1. The act of praying, or asking a favor; earnest request; hence, an earnest memorial to a court or a legislative body. 2. Especially the act of addressing supplication to God; the offering up to the Supreme Being of adoration, confession, supplication, and thanksgiving; the practice of communion with God in devotional address, worship, and supplication; as public prayer, secret prayer, etc. The last is recognized as the most acceptable worship, but not excluding public prayer.

Prayer, to be acceptable to Jehovah, must be performed by, and through the "Spirit, (the word) and with the understanding also," the same is in singing, both should be performed intelligently and discriminately, not ignorantly. Prayer or supplication should be, not for fancied, but for real wants. It was not instituted for the importation of instruction, or to excite in one's self, or in others, ecstatic and spasmodic joy. This is not its proper function.

No hymn should be sung when the language of it is not in accordance with the word of truth. We ought to sing the truth, as well as to pray in the spirit of truth, or to preach it. "Poetical license" which is granted for euphony's sake, but should never be for the purpose of teaching error, nor be grasped at the expense of truth. Sacred songs, even though the musical performances, might not be in the highest style or type, of the art, yet if sung with the spirit, with the understanding and the truth, often become the medium under God, of bringing men and women from darkness to light, and from the power and dominion of sin, unto God—to save souls (persons) from death (not misery), God has declared his purpose to save those, and those only, who believe the "glad tidings" concerning the kingdom of God, on the gospel, and are baptized, (immersed) not sanctified or sprinkled. The oft repeated plea, as being non essential, cannot, without doing great violence to the word, be admissible. This is a compound sentence and cannot be separated with impunity. Those who do it, do it at their peril.

Prayer then, in order to be availing must be in harmony with God's plan and purpose to save men; a perfect acquiescence on our part, in the behests of Jehovah is requisite to secure salvation, and bring the supplicant in harmony with God's plan and purpose; the change of course, is all on the side of the creature.

Extremes to be avoided. Unless well guarded, we are liable to the extreme of presuming too largely, of demanding instead of imploring, and failing in receiving the blessing as desired, the tendency is then to the opposite extreme, hence the question arises often in the mind, "what profit is there, if we pray unto him?" The key to the solution of this question, is found in Christ's memorable prayer to his Father—"Father if it be possible let this cup pass from me, nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." This spirit should be, and indeed is, the underlaying principle of every sincere, honest and intelligent Christian. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his."

This all important item should not be forgotten, overlooked or ignored by us, when we pray unto God. The question is pertinent then, was Christ's prayer answered according to intent? Echo answers and answers yea! Will not every prayer of the true Christian when dictated by this spirit, and guided by the prescribed rules of the word of truth, be answered? The principle of avoiding extremes, may be well illustrated by adverting to a law of nature, as taught by astronomers, viz., that the earth is kept in its orbit, by two, and what might be termed opposing forces, termed centripetal and centrifugal, the former, is according to the law of attraction towards the sun, and the latter is in accordance with laws of repulsion, both of these forces, operating according to the laws governing each, keep the earth in its orbit around the sun, producing the different seasons.

Prayer cannot supercede other duties, or transcend its own proper functions. If one fails to "search the Scriptures," according to Christ's command, the failure cannot be supplied by longer, or more frequent prayers, or with greater earnestness, or even extreme unction. The leanness which is legitimately caused by thus disregarding this command. I would by no means undervalue "the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man," for it availeth much." No such a thing, as an undevout Christian, it would be an anomoly, or more properly a contradiction in terms, but it must, (so to speak) revolve in its own orbit, must not, nor it cannot transcend its own prescribed limits, with the approval of Jehovah.

Prayer was not instituted for display for elocution, or even for the impartation of instruction in the word. Christ's touching on the duty and the object of prayer, covers the whole ground for which it was instituted. He speaks more particularly in regard to prayer in secret, by which means we are brought into harmony with his plan and purpose to save men, and thereby we may become assimilated to Christ our Elder Brother. He struck the key-note when he said "not my will, but thine be done." "No good thing will he withholden from those who walk uprightly." He answers the prayer of the humble and contrite, not perhaps in the way we might prescribe, but in his own way.

Editor Restitution:

At the request of our Dear Bro. Mills, formerly of Goodland Ind., now of this place, I came here three weeks ago last Friday, found himself and family all well, contented and happy, though hungrying for the Word of Life. The town is small, (only about three years old) containing only about 500 souls, but generally wide awake intelligent people, with the beautiful country surrounding quite well settled up with a like class of people.

Commenced meeting (in a hall some 60-25 built by Bro. Mills for meeting purposes) which has been quite well filled from the commencement with attentive hearers. The interest increasing from the start. Have delivered 21 discourses on the blessed gospel and its obedience. On yesterday P. M. immersed eleven intelligent believers into the name of the Blessed Christ. Three more came forward last night. On motion of the Baptist Minister at the close last night the whole congregation rose to their feet to signify their desire and request that I should remain another week, which I shall probably do.

Truly the gospel is the power of God unto salvation.

D. T. HALSTEAD.

The Church of God at Millerton, Kan., will hold a general meeting, commencing Thursday evening, May 14, continuing over Sunday. Brother C. C. Ramsey has promised to be with us. This will be our first general gathering, and we expect to arrange for a conference, and we are desirous that the brethren and sisters living in this and adjoining counties may be with us, that our arrangements may be perfected. Now brethren and sisters all are invited. Come and let us have a joyful time together praising the Lord. We need a general waking up that we may be found at our duty when the Master calls. Millerton is on the St. Louis, Ft. Scott and Wichita R. R. 23 miles South-west of Wichita.

Brethren and sisters from abroad will find the writer and other brethren living near the station to care for them.

THE GAKDUL WELLS.

In a former article we explained the importance of the wells in the desert to the British expedition in the Soudan. The Gakdul Wells are reached only by a circuitous path winding in and out of the rocks from below. They are on the road from Korti to Shendy, nearly midway between the two places, and in the desert almost entirely devoid of other water. For this reason possession of them was of the first necessity, in a strategical point of view, to Lord Wolseley's expedition, as without them it would be impossible to march a force across nearly two hundred miles of desert. The first stop, therefore, after arriving at Korti was to secure the wells. General Sir Herbert Stewart was intrusted with this duty. He marched two thousand camels the one hundred miles from Korti to Gakdul at the rate of little over thirty miles a day. Lord Wolseley's instructions to him were to leave four hundred of his men at Gakdul, where they were at once to entrench themselves; then to return with the remaining seven hundred to Korti, from whence, some days afterward, they advanced again, re-inforced, to Gakdul, and from that proceeded toward the Nile at Shendy. It should be added that these two thousand camels marched, with their riders, in five days, the whole of the two hundred miles, there and back, with a daily allowance of only two pints of water per man.

The mountains in which the wells are situated are absolutely destitute of vegetation. Dr. H. M. Field thus describes the mountains which he saw in his journey three years ago: "There is not one long chain, like the Pyrenees or the Apennines, of a general average height and form, but innumerable peaks, sharp and pointed, as if piercing the sky, while other summits are broad and dome-like, as if the very heavens might rest on the support of such everlasting hills." And these mountains are unlike those of other countries in being more barren and desolate. I have seen mountains in all parts of the world, and have found in almost every case that they had some feature of beauty mingled with their ruggedness, which took away somewhat of their desolate character. However lofty their elevation, their lowest sides were clothed with vegetation, which relieved their sternest aspect and softened their rugged grandeur. Not so here. They rise up abruptly from the plain, and as their substance is the hardest granite, which affords little support to vegetation, they have an aspect of savage desolation which I do not remember to have seen in the Alps or the Himalayas.

"Between these awful mountains, and winding round among them in countless turnings, are the Wadys. In studying the geography of the desert, the first lesson to be learned is to know what is meant by a Wady. Destitute as are these vast plains of water, yet at times they are swept by storms which furrow deep channels in the sand. The dry beds which they leave behind are Wadys. Several of these were crossed in which the half-dried mud showed that there had been recent rains."

It is appropriate in this place to quote the opinion of the distinguished traveller on the general aspects of this terrible campaign in the Soudan. A mistaken view has been industriously promulgated by ignorant newspaper writers in America, who, desiring to propitiate the Irish citizens, lose no opportunity of assailing England, whether she is right or wrong. Dr. Field, who has travelled over the whole of that region, and knows well the condition of the people there, thus writes of the work England is trying to do:

"As an American, I am not likely to be swayed from a sense of justice by the haughty English pride. What I say is the result of a good deal of reflection, aided by my own personal observations. The first question which an American who undertakes to offer an apology or defense for the course of England, is sure to have thrown in his face, is 'what business have the English in the Soudan or in Egypt?' I answer: Suppose they have not any special rights, have they not the common rights of strangers in a foreign country, to go about their business or their pleasure, and to have the protection of the laws? But there was a time, and not very long since—indeed, only a few weeks after I left Egypt—when I could not have gone about in safety; when quiet travellers like myself were killed in the streets of Alexandria by a mob—an outrage for which the government of Arabi Pasha made no reparation whatever, but showed, on the contrary, that it was in full sympathy with murderers. Is it so very strange that, after waiting a whole month for some atonement for that fearful massacre, the English fleet should let the Arabs hear the roar of their guns?

"Beside this, it is a matter of vital necessity in the interests of civilization that England should keep her hand on the Suez Canal, the great highway between the seas. This necessity abundantly justified England in landing an army, overthrowing Arabi, and occupying Cairo. But here, in my humble opinion, she made a fatal mistake—not in what she did, but that she did not do more; that is the stern necessity of the case she did not take Egypt absolutely, and make it at once and forever a part of the British Empire."

Dr. Field then shows that Egypt cannot be held and governed in peace with the Soudan hostile, and that the conquest of the Soudan was therefore a necessity. He thus concludes his argument: "The war, as it now stands, is a war between barbarism and civilization. Let England retreat now, and the Mahdi be uncontrolled and unchecked master of the Soudan, and Africa will be plunged into deeper darkness than before. The slave trade, which Livingstone called 'the open sore of the world,' will be set running afresh, and the wail of the captive, the sighing of the bondman, will rise up again from all along the waters of the Upper Nile. This I cannot believe is to be. With my religious faith, I cannot but feel that all this complication of affairs has been permitted by the Great Ruler of the world for some good to Africa; that in some way it will be a means of driving an entering wedge into the Dark Continent. Lord Salisbury says sneeringly in the House of Lords, that when England leaves the Soudan he hopes she will leave behind her some traces of her occupation besides the bones of her soldiers bleaching on the desert! The best way to leave a fit memorial of her presence, is not to give up the Soudan, but to hold it with 'a mighty hand,' to take Khartoum, and keep the English flag flying over it, to build railroads across the desert, and put steamers on the Blue and the White Nile; and thus she may create a civilized State in the heart of Africa."—Christian Herald.

The Young Lions in Prophecy.

In the course of an address recently delivered in London, the Rev. Henry E. Brooke referred to the critical condition of English foreign affairs. He called attention to the unexpected offers made to the British Government by India, Australia, Canada, and other English colonies of military assistance in the event of war with Russia and the existing war in the Soudan. He dwelt on the spontaneous character of these offers as an evidence of identity of feeling and a remarkable fulfilment of prophecy. In the course of his address he said:

"I have been very much struck by the critical character of the times in which we live, and their evident connection with God's purposes. Who would have supposed that England—I believe I may say very much against her will—would have been involved in a war of this sort in Africa, and in this peculiar part of Africa? It seems to me that we are engaged in this war against our own will and against the will of our rulers. We have been obliged to go to war, to make war on this great power; a great power, which is a religious power, not a political power; and a religious power which has great influence in India, and which may be used, we know not how extensively, in bringing about God's purposes with regard to the Jews.

"At this critical time one cannot help seeing how Russia is involved, and from Ezek. xxxviii., we find that Russia has largely to do with the events of the future. You are aware that the word rendered 'chief' is Rosh, or in modern language Russia, while Meshech and Tubal seem to be identified with Muscovy and Tobolsk, and that the power thus indicated is to come up against Israel. Now I had my attention called yesterday to a curious illustration which has just appeared, with no prophetic allusion, of a statement in the chapter. We read, in verse thirteen, that when the Prince of Rosh comes up to take a spoil, 'Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto him, Art thou come to take a spoil?' I think all interpreters are agreed that Tarshish means England, and that 'the merchant' is an allusion to the commercial character of our country; but what about 'the young lions thereof?' It has been timidly suggested it might mean our colonies; but there was this difficulty, nobody would have supposed our colonies would have mixed themselves up with our wars. What, however, have we seen? The colonies throwing in their lot with England in the war in the Soudan.

"And now for the unexpected illustration. In Punch's cartoon for this week, prepared, we may feel sure, without any thought of a prophecy, England is represented as a lion, looking on at a number of young lions being drilled as soldiers. The lion is our national symbol, and here we have in the natural language of symbol the very truth expressed in Ezek. xxxviii. 13—England, 'the merchants of Tarshish, with her colonies, the young lions thereof.'

"The question, too, is identical with that addressed by England to Russia. Lord Granville's first inquiry was as to the meaning of the Russian advance into Afghanistan. He demanded to be informed what was the design of the movement, and whether it indicated an intention on the part of Russia to annex the country—'Art thou come to take a spoil?' I only mention this as a by-way illustration of how prophetic events are being fulfilled in these days.

"Meanwhile these events seem to say to us, it becometh us to be upon the watch-tower. While, therefore, we have specially in view at such a time the critical condition of things, the critical state of our soldiers and sailors in the East, and while we are praying for them, do not let us forget to pray that the people of God may be stirred up to use the opportunity afforded them of being to the nation around as a river that maketh glad the desert places of the earth, so that we may make glad in every sense of the word. We pray there may be a blessed result from such a state of things, while we also pray our rulers may be guided aright, and that the present unbelieving age may be taught to know that there is a God who ruleth in the earth, even while they are so ready to reject him.

"And in the midst of all let us hear the words, 'Be still and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.'"

There is one thing that the enemies of Christ cannot do. They can reject, scoff, rail, and blaspheme, but they cannot let him alone. The press is burdened with attacks upon him. Unbelievers who cannot agree on anything else, do agree in this to continue their warfare upon him. Why do they not let him alone? They can not. He is forcing himself into the thoughts and discussions of men everywhere, and it is impossible to silently ignore him and his claims. "What shall I do then with Jesus?" said Pilate. Do with him? Why not "let him go" and pay no more attention to him? Because they cannot. He stands before every soul in silent majesty, claiming the homage and obedience of the heart. He stirs the world to-day as never before, and around his person the battle rages continually. He is in the world's thought, in its literature and philosophy, in its science and art, the one living, vital power. To banish him is out of the question. He is in the midst of friend and foes, and there he will remain.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAFLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, April 15, 1885.

THE Editor does not have charge of any of the business matters connected with THE RESTITUTION. On all matters of this nature address the agent.

PLEASE write no more articles on the Sonship of our adorable Lord for awhile. We have contradictory ones enough for the present. We incline to the opinion that when the glories of the Divine nature and character of the Son of God are openly revealed in the coming day, as they were to the Beloved John in Patmos, that then some writers of our times will entertain a very sorry estimate of their productions and criticisms.

THE signs of the times surely indicate the nearing end of this dispensation. Never was the political world agitated with graver turmoils. An unrifted war-cloud overshadows three quarters of the globe. The perils of the last days are here in their dismal incipiency. Evil is going forth from nation to nation, and the whirlwind of fury is about to sweep over all the earth, leaving the multitudinous slain to rot above ground. Jer. xxv. 33, 32. The Mahdi calls the Moslem millions to arms. The Muscovite hordes are thundering at the mountain gates of India. Gog marshals his hosts in the inaccessable north, and Tarshish covers the seas with her mighty fleets. Prophetic periods that measure the duration of dynasties are now expiring. The Heavenly Bridegroom has everything nearly in readiness for his Queenly Bride. He is coming soon to take her to the New Jerusalem. The midnight hour is about to strike, and what a multitude are sleeping with burnt-out lamps. O, be watchful and prayerful in these awful solemn times.

Literary.

"The Coming Age, its nature and proximity." The International Standard in noticing this work says:—"The author has devoted many years of careful study and profound thought to the preparation of this work. It treats of topics which of late years have more and more commanded the profoundest study and interest of Christian thinkers. The writer believes that the great increase of knowledge, the rapid strides of modern inventions, in machinery, railroads, telegraphs, telephones, navigation, etc., coincide with the prophecies of God's word in showing the near approach to the grand consummation of the world's history, the coming of our Lord to establish his kingdom and millennial reign with his saints over the earth. He reviews the history of the earth from its first formation, through the six geologic stages of progress, the past ages and dispensations, and God's government in their political and religious history, the fulfillment of prophesy, and his plans and purposes brought out therein in those six past ages. The coming seventh age is to be ushered in by great geologic and atmospheric changes, to be purified and renovated by fire for the reception of the church, the bride and her bridegroom, the Messiah, the Second Adam. It unfolds the meaning of Daniel's vision of the five monarchies, and the symbols and visions of St. John in the apocalypse. Many passages are of thrilling interest. We commend the work as a valuable acquisition to any Bible student or thoughtful seeker of truth." In this commendation we fully coincide. Price $3, in cloth.

THE REVISED OLD TESTAMENT: A FORECAST.

The Revised Version of the Old Testament is expected to appear in a few days. We are looking for it with great interest. Of its merits we can give no opinion until we see it, and even then we shall prefer to give the opinion of others rather than our own. Meantime, however, it cannot be amiss for all Bible students to prepare themselves to profit to the utmost by the publishing of this long-looked-for contribution to the right understanding of the Old Testament.

We certainly count that the Revision will possess great value; and that it will on the whole exert an influence beneficial even beyond its intrinsic worth, however great this may be. That it will be perfect—as perfect as some individuals on the Revision Committees could have made it—we do not for one moment suppose. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link; and over-conservative influences will, we doubt not, be found to have relegated many best renderings to the margin. That there will be numerous strong-minded and independent Hebrew scholars who will have many and grievous faults to find, goes without saying. That specialists who have given long and nearly exclusive attention to peculiar topics with which the Old Testament deals will not find all their fond hopes realized is nearly as certain. Then, too, there is a large number of persons whom nothing can please—for some of whom the changes will be too few, for others, too many. On the whole, then, it may be regarded as inevitable that the forthcoming Revised Old Testament will by no means be greeted with a chorus of universal approbation. Even if, in the opinion of the best and most candid judges, it deserves to be so welcomed, nevertheless, by no possibility can it be equal to what a similar and further revision may be fifty years hence. It would be unwarranted for this reason to conclude that this present work should have been postponed for half a century longer; on the contrary, the better opinion undoubtedly is, that public Bible revisions should, as a rule, be undertaken much more frequently than they have been hitherto.

Having indulged in these introductory reflections, let us now ask what we may not, and secondly what we may reasonably expect to find in the forthcoming Revision.

We speak entirely without private information when we venture to set down, among the things which we may not expect, the substitution of the name "Jehovah" for Lord printed in small capitals. A generation ago, perhaps, this change might have been very naturally counted upon, but not now. The general opinion among Hebrew scholars at the present time is that, whatever may have been the correct pronunciation of the sacred, covenant name of God (technically called the tetragrammaton, or four-lettered name, from the four consonants Y H W H) certainly "Jehovah" is not it. The consensus of opinion seems strongly to favor the pronunciation "Yahweh," as Mr. Driver spells it in his work on the Hebrew Tenses. But we think this decision is not so unanimous and fixed as to warrant our looking for it in a coming Revision. We reason that if the Revisers could not act in the confident assurance of being right, they naturally would not act at all in the way of disturbing the A. V. And so, for example, we shall probably still have not before us to read, as we have read from our childhood: "The Lord (not Jehovah or Yahweh) is my shepherd," "Bless the Lord, O my soul," "The Lord said to my Lord," etc. For our own part we are prepared not to blame the Revisers should they have left this matter as it was. We cannot see what other course was open to them. Notwithstanding this, we are bound to say that, practically speaking, it will be a great pity. The present device of printing the word "Lord" in small capitals wherever "Jehovah" or "Yahweh" occurs is very inefficacious. It never addresses the ear; and thousands of eyes to which it acutely appeals never see it, or, seeing it, do not know or forget what it means. And yet, that this name does not mean the same thing as Adonai in the Old Testament or Kurios in the New, is universally agreed. Now when we recollect the exceeding frequency with which this precious divine name occurs throughout the Old Testament (about 7500 times); and when we arrive at the moral certainty that it is a peculiarly expressive name—a covenant name—a memorial name; the especial verbal exponent of divine grace, almost amounting to a promise within a promise, or a command within a command, according to the connection in which it is employed, we cannot but regard it as a calamity that anything should have stood in the way of disclosing to the common eye this line of loving light running from Genesis to Malachi.

Turning now to what we may expect, in all reason, in the Revision,—it will surely be unpardonable if the Revisers have not given us "Hades" for sheol in all 65 of its occurrences. That this latter word should appear in the A. V. 31 times as "hell," 31 times as "grave," and three times as "pit" is unsatisfactory in the extreme. English readers can never know what the Bible teaches at this rate. If in the Revision this improvement shall have been made, there is no telling what gains it will bring. There will be little or no need to go to the classics to learn what "Hades" is. Whose traces "Hades" through the Bible from Genesis to Revelation may feel warranted in the assurance that he has a pretty clear notion of what prophets and apostles intended by the term. One notable New Testament passage (Matt. xiv. 18) will then receive its best side-light from a corresponding passage in Isaiah (xxxviii. 10) —the gates of Hades being found in these two passages alone in all the Bible; Hezekiah's use of the expression, nevertheless, being probably quite sufficient to show in what sense our Lord employed it. The consideration to which as a consequence we expect most readers will be led regarding the passage in Matthew, will be much simpler, more striking and more tenable than that generally entertained. The Messiah, overcoming death for his Church as well as for himself, "the gates of Hades" cannot prevail against it:—a very different conclusion from that which binds us to discover an unbroken Church Succession on this side of Hades.

It will be very strange if the Revision does not throw considerably increased light on the constitution of man, and on all that pertains to the grave issues of destruction and immortality which are habitually discussed in the magazine. Of course nephesh will be more constantly rendered "soul" than it is in the A. V., even if the time has not yet come when, in English, a corpse can be called a "soul." Precisely how it came to pass that this could be done in Hebrew, is a question we could wish to see briefly and discreetly discussed. Of course also the nephesh ought to find some recognizable place in English, whether as "shades" or otherwise. On these and on similar points we count upon so keen an interest being excited amongst our readers as may even embarrass us with the abundance of the communications we shall receive in regard to them. The less need to poise in dubious expectation now.

There are two or three small changes in connection with the terms "nations," "heathen" and "people" which, if uniformly made, will render material service to the English reader of the prophetic word. Every one who has thoughtfully looked into the word is aware how large a place the nation of Israel occupies therein. He is also aware of the presence of other nations—in many cases of the Gentile nations collectively—appearing oftentimes simultaneously with the nation of Israel. But he is not aware—he cannot be aware from the A. V. only—of the extent to which the distinction between the two is carried: i. e., between the one nation and the remaining nations. In the Hebrew this distinction is extensively maintained. So long as the Hebrew word is goyim, and the English rendering is "nations" (distinctly in the plural), all is well. When, the Hebrew remaining the same, the English becomes "heathen," there is a loss of perspicuity and precision; for the plurality of nations no longer lies evident in the word "heathen" and further the moral quality and standing of the nations is apt to be quite misrepresented—"heathen" conveying the notion of pagans, men or communities sunk in darkness and idolatry; whereas in reality merely non-Israelites are meant, and such nations as England and France may very well be included. We do not count ourselves "heathen:" we cannot escape being among the "nations"—useless indeed (as we have no idea to the case) we do after all belong to the Twelve Tribes. So also, when the Hebrew word is ammim (a synonym of goyim) and the English is merely "people," then too the idea of plural nationalities is lost. The context, of course, may still point that way, but on the other hand it may not, at any rate with sufficient clearness to make up for the loss. Numberless examples might be given illustrating these varying obscurities. For instance, who cannot see the immediate and sustained outlook from the "us" with which the sixty-seventh Psalm begins to all the nations of the earth when an adequate version is used? Take that Psalm as given in Eyre and Spottiswoode's "Revised English Bible:"

God be merciful unto us and bless us,
And cause his face to shine upon us. Selah.
That thy way may be known upon earth,
Thy salvation among all nations.

Let the peoples praise, O God,
Yea all the peoples praise thee!
Let all the nations be glad and shout for joy:
For thou wilt judge the peoples righteously,
And the nations upon earth, thou wilt guide them. Selah.

Let the peoples praise thee, O God,
Let all the peoples praise thee!
The earth hath yielded her produce:
May God, our own God, bless us.
May God bless us,
And let all the ends of the earth fear him.

Or, again, while it is quite clear from Zech. xiv. 2, that all nations will be gathered against Jerusalem in the yet future siege of that city, the same thing is by no means so clear from the A. V. of chapter xii. 2, 3, though there also the fact at length peeps out. It ought to have been just as plain from the first, as it is in any adequate version: "Behold I make Jerusalem a bowl of trembling unto all the peoples round about; and against Judah also shall it be, in the siege against Jerusalem. And in that day I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all the peoples; all that lift it shall be wounded: and all the nations of the earth shall be gathered together against it."

We have thus indicated one or two out of the many directions in which we cannot doubt the Revised Old Testament will bring us gain. We may add in conclusion that, over and above any special subject mentionable beforehand, there can be no doubt whatever, considering the advancement of Hebrew learning in our midst, and the number of years spent by able men on this work, that in ways innumerable light and force and beauty are about bursting upon appreciative English readers in the Revised Old Testament. —Rainbow.

JEWISH NOTES.

JEWISH COLONIZATION OF PALESTINE.

At a recent meeting in London, of the Central Committee of the Jewish Society recently formed for colonizing the Holy Land, correspondence was read that had taken place with eighty-five branches of the "Friends of Zion" in Russia and Poland, all of which promised co-operation with the London committee. All these Societies have been started since the Conference at Kattowitz, recently noticed in these pages. The report significantly adds: —"It was not considered judicious to mention the names of the correspondents, nor of the towns whence they wrote, for fear of interference on the part of the Russian authorities!" In the same connection, the Jewish World announces that a Mr. Rabbinowitsch, of Warsaw, had purchased, on behalf of the same Society, a fine piece of land between Safer and Tiberias. "This embraces 2600 hectares of arable land, vineyards, gardens, and house property. The purchase money was 20,000 marks. A delegation of Jews in Suwalk (Russia) has purchased a village called Gosch-Chalab; the sale has been ratified by the Turkish Government, and the colonists have become Turkish subjects."

THE KISCHINEFF REFORMER.

We are glad to learn from the Jewish Herald (the organ of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews), that the report of the murder of Josef Rabinowitsch, mentioned last month, is unfounded. According to a letter from the Society's Mission Secretary in Leipzig, the reformer is still alive, and his work progressing. Dr. Adolph Saphir, Honorary Secretary to the above-named Mission Society, and himself a converted Jew, speaks of the movement led by Rabinowitch thus:—"In one aspect this movement takes us back to the days of the apostles; in another it seems an indication of the approaching end, when Israel shall be brought to deep repentance and true faith in the Lord Jesus. It is important to regard this community in connection with the widely-spread spirit of inquiry into the truths of Christianity, especially among the Jews of Russia, Poland, the Austrian dominions, etc. The attitude of the Jews towards Christianity has undergone a marvellous change. There are many thirsting souls in Israel. Their are many who read the New Testament, some, like Nicodemus, by night. Only a few days ago a friend, laboring on the continent, a man of sound judgment as well as zeal, wrote to me:—'The movement in Kischineff continues sound and good. I receive wonderful letters from Polish Jews, and I hear also that the movement extends to Transylvania.'"—M. W. S., in Messenger.

England's Quarrel with Russia.

Editor Sun: What are England and Russia going to fight about, any way?

W. F.

England, everybody knows, has an immense empire in India. Russia has of late years been pushing her conquests in the direction of India, and about two years ago, when the Russians seized the oasis of Merv, and got control of the great Turcoman desert, they came right up against what has always been regarded as one of the bulwarks of India—Afghanistan. Then England became alarmed.

Look at a map of Asia and you will see that all along the northern edge of India, like a wall of defence, runs the gigantic chain of the Himalayas, the greatest mountains in the world. At the northwestern corner of India this range of mountains splits up, and, turning toward the southeast, spreads out into a number of diverging ranges which cover Afghanistan, the backbone of the system being the colossal Hindoo Koosh Mountains. This rugged country of Afghanistan, therefore, forms a sort of natural breastwork for India toward the northwest, the direction from which an invasion by Russia would come, and so England has for years kept a sharp oversight of things here. In the northwest corner of Afghanistan lies the fortified town of Herat, which on account of its commanding position has long been known as the key to India. Right over against Herat on the north, and only some 200 miles away, is the new post of the Russians at Merv.

After the Russians had got control of the country thus bordering on Afghanistan the question immediately came up as to where the exact boundaries of the latter country were. England was so anxious to keep the Russians from advancing farther, and fearful that their next step would carry them to Herat, that she lost no time in demanding that these boundaries be definitely settled, and a joint Commission of Russians and Englishmen was appointed to deal with the question on the spot. This Commission has been on the ground during the past year, but has not reached an agreement. The Russians, it appears, claim a piece of territory between the Rivers Murghab and Heri Rud, issuing from the Afghan mountains, the control of which, it is alleged, would give them command of the road, and, to Herat. The town of Penjdeh, which, it is said, the Russians have just captured, lies upon the road, and, according to English claims, within the edge of the Afghan territory.

The recent negotiations between England and India relate to the question as to where the line should be run, and what should be regarded as debatable ground for the purpose. Two or three weeks ago the Governments agreed not to make any further advance on either side pending the negotiations—that is, Russia promised not to push her troops further into the debatable ground, and England undertook to restrain her friends, the Afghans. The recent battle between the Russians and Afghans, however, shows that one side or the other has failed to keep back.

As England believes that the safety of her Indian empire depends upon the keeping of the Russians out of Afghanistan, the world looks on to see her aid the Afgans against Russia with all the power and prestige of her arms.—N. Y. Sun.

Youth's Column.

Our Heroes.

He is afraid to be a boy who has courage
To do what he knows to be right.
When he falls in the way of temptation
He has a hard battle to fight.
Who strikes against strife and his comrades
Will find a most powerful foe:
All laugh at him if he conquers,
A cheer to the boy who says "No!"

There's many a battle fought daily
The world knows nothing about;
There's many a brave little soldier
Whose name never gets a legion to shout.
And he who fights single handed
In spite of a sneer, I say,
That he who fights conquers to conquer
And overcomes more in the fray.

Be steadfast, my boy, when you're tempted
To do right as you know you're right,
And drive by the powers of manhood,
And you will overcome in the fight.
The fight for the right is the best fight ever
Fought in the warfare of life,
And God bless those who are the bravest,
We'll give you the credit for the strife.

Carriage of a Lady in Public.

A lady walks quietly through the streets, seeing and hearing nothing that she ought not to see and hear, recognizing acquaintances with a courteous bow, and friends with words of greeting. She is always unobtrusive. She never talks loudly or laughs boisterously, or does anything to attract the attention of the passers by. She simply goes about her business in her own quiet, lady-like way, and by her self-occupation is secure from all the annoyance to which a person of less perfect breeding might be subjected.

The Truly Honorable.

The truly honorable man takes pains to remain ignorant of things that concern him not. He turns aside from the confidential gossip, glances away from the open desk, shuns the place where a whisper is audible, with just as much care as he would use to avoid profiting by a mistake in the change. His curiosity does not crave the knowledge of such matters. It has the whole wide world for its area, and seeks its satisfaction in a more wholesome direction. After all, the information to which we have no right is the poorest and least valuable to us of any that we can obtain. Let us cultivate a worthy curiosity on subjects that shall enlarge our minds, deepen our feelings and strengthen our purposes; we shall shrink from the ignoble inquisitiveness that revels in dishonest gains.

Home Friendships.

If we cultivate home friendships with the same assiduity that we give to those outside, they will yield us even richer and fairer returns. There is no friendship so pure and beautiful in its nature, so rich and full in its power of blessing, or so singularly rare in its occurrence, as that between parents and their grown up sons and daughters. Where the parental and filial instincts are supplemented by that higher and more spiritual affection that binds together minds in intellectual communion and souls in heartfelt sympathy, few deeper or more delightful friendships can be imagined. The guardian and dependent gradually lose themselves in the dear companion and true friend of later life; and youth becomes wiser, and age brighter, and both, nobler and happier in this loving and abiding union.

Dear Children,

I sometimes think you may grow weary in reading grandma's long letters, and when I consider how weak and inefficient they are, compared with the one I am going to write about, I feel I must lay my pen aside, and forever be silent, but for the command given, "Forget not to communicate." The beautiful letter of which I speak was written in the gloomy cell of a prison in Rome. The writer was a Jew of unusual talent, full of zeal, "an Israelite indeed in whom there was no guile." Although his decaying form was bent with old age, his dear trembling hand under a pressure of cruel circumstances, penned this very touching epistle. The brother in Christ to whom it was addressed was a man of influence and wealth, but one greatly beloved, affording much joy to the aged prisoner, because his tenderness and warm affection had refreshed the faithful in Christ Jesus. It gave solace and joy to the aged writer whenever he thought of him; remembering him in every prayer. Such an exquisite character was an offering of sweet savor to God. The meaning of his name is very suggestive, and unfolds exactly what his disposition appeared to be, "An Affectionate One." In his hospitable home, those of like precious faith used to hold sweet fellowship together. His beloved wife was one who also feared the Lord. The meaning of the name of the place in which they lived was, "Punishment." The Affectionate One owned a slave, who could not endure to be controlled. So he ran away from his kind master, no doubt in a rage, feeling he never would return to him again. Perhaps he had heard the aged one "exhort" to all longsuffering and patience," for while wandering, and his poor mind full of trouble, he evidently thought of him, or would not have sought him in prison. The aged one being in bonds himself could feel more keenly for the poor dejected runaway, who was unprofitable, because he could not govern himself. He could not possibly have gone to one more capable of instruction than this aged prisoner. No doubt he listened most earnestly to his kind advice, for he soon changed his mind, and resolved his future course should be both "profitable and useful," which is the meaning of his name. When the aged one began to show him the way of life, he gave his heart to the Lord, and was baptized into the all saving name of Jesus, which is "a strong tower, into which the righteous run, and are safe." This was a source of great joy to his instructor, who when he sent him back to his master, wrote the following beautiful letter to him.

"I beseech thee for my son, whom I have begotten in my bonds, which in time past was unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me, whom I have sent back to thee, receive him therefore as though it were myself, whom I would like to retain with me in the stead, that; he might minister unto me in the bonds of the gospel, but without thy mind I would do nothing. For perhaps 'this dear slave' departed from thee a season, that thou should'st receive him for ever. But not now as a slave, but above a slave, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more to thee both in the flesh, 'because he is thy property,' and in the Lord. If thou therefore count me a partner, receive him as myself; if he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee aught, put that on my account. I, the aged worker, have written this with mine own hand. I will repay it, but I will not tell thee what thou owest me. Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord, refresh me in the Lord. Having confidence in thy obedience I wrote unto thee, knowing thou will do more than I ask of thee. Prepare me also a lodging for I trust through your prayers I shall be given unto you. Salute my fellow-prisoners, and my fellow-laborers in Christ Jesus. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.

Children beloved, what tender sympathy, what touching love is expressed for the poor wandering slave in these few lines! Not one word of censure, or discouragement; but love, unbounding, undying love, placed the poor wandering slave right in the same position as the faithful aged prisoner. He promised to pay all his indebtedness—and bear the burden of his wrong doings. He diligently instructed him until he had him in the right way; he counted him no longer a slave, but a beloved son, remembering the words of Jesus, "If the truth make you free, ye are free indeed," for he was then one with the faithful household everywhere. Let us follow Christ as this aged follower did.

Your affectionate teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

Exegetical.

The White Stone.

"To him that overcometh will I give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."—Rev. ii. 17.

Reference is here made to a stone divided into two parts, as a sign of hospitality, upon each of which one of the parties wrote his name and interchanged it with the other. This gave a mutual claim to contracting parties and to descendants for reception and kind treatment when travelling. It was carefully and privately kept so that no one might claim the privilege besides the person for whom intended. Or, according to Matthew Henry, this "White stone" means absolution from the guilt of sin, alluding to the ancient custom of giving a white stone to those acquitted on trial, and a black stone to those condemned. "The New Name" is the name of adoption. Adopted persons took the name of the family into which they were adopted. None could know evidence of a man's adoption but himself.

There is a sort of economy in the ways of providence that one shall excel where another is defective, in order to make men useful to each other and mix them in society.

WITNESSES.

"I am working alone, and no one heeds!"
Who says so does not know;
There are clear eyes watching on every side,
And wherever our feet may go,
We are "compassed about with so great a cloud."

That if we could see,
We could never think that our life is small,
Or that we may unnoticed be!

We seem to suffer and bear alone
Life's burdens and all its care;
And the sighs and prayers of the heavy heart
Vanish into the air;
And we do not suffer or work alone.
And after a victory won,
Who knows how happy the hosts may be
Who whisper a soft "Well done!"

Oh, do not deem that it matters not
How you live your life below;
It matters much to the heedless one
That you see go to and fro;
For all that is noble and high and true
Has an influence on the rest,
And the world is better for every one
Who fighting at his best.

But even if human eyes see not,
No one is unobserved,
There are unseen ones deep and plentiful high
As each may be deserved;
We cannot live in a secret place,
There are watchers always by,
For heaven and earth are full of life,
And God is ever nigh.

O, for a life without a pause,
For a heart of earnestness!
For self forgotten for its whole train,
For hands well used to bless!
God raise us far from the little things,
And make us there to be
Skilled workers here in the place we fill,
And servants unto Thee!

Communications.

Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. Mark xvi. 15, 16.

I choose this for a subject because I deemed it of the utmost importance. If the apostles had not been commissioned to proclaim the good news to the kingdom to the world, none could have been saved through the preaching of the gospel. Paul declares 1 Cor. ix. 16, "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of, for necessity is laid upon me, yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." And again Romans i. 16, he says, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

Here is a very important question, namely, if the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, how are we saved by it? It is really surprising when we come to converse with the professed Christians of the day in regard to how we are save by the gospel of Christ. One says you must be born again, and then you are converted, according to the gospel. Paul says, 1 Cor. iii. 54. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put immortality. In John iii. 3, Jesus says, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. This shows most emphatically that we cannot even see the kingdom until we are made immortal, and that by a resurrection from the dead. Let us try to understand this one great truth and that is this; to be born again is one thing, and to be begotten by the word of truth, is quite another thing. James says, i. 18, Of his own will begat he us by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures. When he are begotten by the word of truth, is when we have complied with the requirements of Christ and the apostles. But we are subject to sin. Why? Because we are in a state of mortality. Question. When will we be in a state that we cannot sin? Ans. When-ever we are born of God. Proof John iii. 9. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. Why? For his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin. Why can he not sin? Because he is born of God. Reader, can language be made more plain?

Paul says, by grace are ye saved. Eph. ii. 8. O yes, says a voice, of course we are saved by grace. I ask how are we saved by grace? Grace is one thing, and how to be saved by grace is another. Well says a voice, that is one of the simplest things in the world. Please explain, I asked.

"When we had our revival meeting over at the church there were about two hundred came forward to the anxious bench and embraced religion." So you can see how we are saved by grace, (said the voice) we come to the mourners' bench and kneel down, and ask God to forgive us of all our sins and iniquities. One of the easiest things in the world to understand how to be saved by grace, says the voice. Were you not baptised for the remission of sins? I asked. Certainly not, says the voice; that is just a form, it does not matter if you are not baptised, that is nothing very essential to salvation. And this is the way that the majority believe and talk, that profess to be followers of Christ. Now let us compare the gospel plan of being saved by grace, with the modern plan of being saved by grace.

First. How was Paul saved by grace? Acts xxii. 6, 10, 16, here we see that Paul was on his way to Damascus, and it came to pass that while he was journeying, suddenly there shone a great light around about him, and about that time he heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And Paul answered and said, What shall I do, Lord. And the Lord said, arise and go to Damascus, and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for you to do. So when Paul arrived at Damascus, one Ananias, a devout man, came unto Paul and said, Brother Saul, receive thy sight; and the same hour he looked upon him. And Ananias said unto Paul, why tarriest thou, arise and be baptised, and wash away thy sins calling on the name of the Lord. Here we have a slight history or narrative of Paul's conversion. We see that they give no history of any mourners' bench, nor that they prayed God to forgive Paul's sins, or that Paul was commanded to pray for the forgiveness of his sins. Please notice how Paul's conversion agrees with those at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. Acts ii. 37. Here we see the after the multitude heard the apostles proclaim the gospel, as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, stating that this same Jesus that they had crucified had risen from the dead, and was sitting at the right hand of God. Now when they heard this they were pricked in their hearts and cried out, Men and brethren what shall we do? Then Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptised every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Verse 41. Then they that gladly received the word were baptised: and the same day was added unto them three thousand souls. Here we have another conversion of about three thousand souls, no anxious seat spoken of, nor were any of the three thousand called upon to pray to the Lord for the forgiveness of their sins and still they were saved by grace because they obeyed God, and in return God favored them on account of their obedience to the truth of the gospel. Acts xvi. 14, 15. Here we have another apostolic conversion, please read it and notice how essential it was that she should be baptized. Also 29 to 33, of same chapter. Here we see that Paul and Silas were put in prison, and they sang and prayed, and all at once there was a great earthquake, and immediately all the doors of the prison were opened, and all the prisoners' bands were loosed. Then came the jailer trembling, and fell before Paul and Silas, and said, What must I do to be saved? And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house. And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house. And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes, and was baptized, he and all his straightway. Acts viii. 27 to 39. Here we have a narrative in regard to the conversion of the Eunuch. We see by this that in order to his salvation he was not commanded to bow or humble himself at any mourner's bench, as is the custom at a great many of the popular revivals of the day. Nor was he ordered to pray for the forgiveness of sins. Question. Why not? Because when the Eunuch read the 33 verse, "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth." And the Eunuch answered Philip and said, I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself or some other man? Then Philip opened his mouth and began at the same Scripture, and preached unto him Jesus. Please notice the effect the gospel had on the Eunuch.

And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water, and the Eunuch said, See here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptised? And Philip said, if thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. And he commanded the chariot to stand still, and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the Eunuch, and he baptized him. Now here are examples showing the primitive plan of salvation, and the same plan should be adopted at the present day, because Christ says, the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life. Paul also was commanded by Christ what to preach that the people might receive forgiveness of sins. Phil. iv. 9. Paul declares, those thing which ye have both learned and received, and heard, and seen in me, do; and the God of peace shall be with you. Furthermore Paul says, the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting. 2 Cor. xi. 10.

Gal. iii. 27. Here he declares that as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. This is the only plan of adoption mentioned in the gospel by which we can become initiated into the family of Christ. Faith and obedience to the gospel are prerequisites in order to salvation through Christ. If we sin after we have complied with the requirements of the gospel, John ii. 1, commands us to sin not, but if we sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, he is the propitiation for our sins.

2 Peter i. 5 to 12. Speaking of those who have been obedient to the truth, he says, Besides giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity. If these things are in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things, is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure; for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall. For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, that ye know them and be established in the present truth.

E. O. NELSON.

Sister H——

We will continue where we left off in our last. We will now quote Ex. xxiv. 12. "I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them." Here is positive evidence that they (Israel), had not this before. 1. "That thou mayest teach them." How can you teach a child the A B C's that already knows them? 2. "I will give thee tables of stones and a law," shows conclusively that the law and tables of stone were given simultaneously, i. e., at the same time. Who will contend that the tables of stone were given to Adam? thence to the entire human race? The Lord says, "that thou mayest teach them." Teach what? The tables of stone or the law written on them? The answer is the law, of course. But, why teach them? if they, with all other nations, already knew and were observing them? Nehemiah says: "Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai, and speakest with them (Israel) from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws; good statutes and commandments; and madest known unto them the Holy Sabbath." How could God make known something that was already known? Presumption! Did Nehemiah state a falsehood? Can you; will you contradict him? Are you prepared to do this? This will close this part of our subject for the present.

You say, "That the Ten Commandments must have been in existence from Adam to Moses, for Abraham kept God's laws." Are the Ten Commandments ever called laws? See Ex. xxiv. 12, and parallels. "A law." In Young's Am. Concordance the phrase "laws," in your quotation as found in Gen. xxvi. 5, (and of course you left me to hunt it up) is from the Hebrew word, torah, and means direction. That direction as given, is found in Gen. xii. 1-2, and xiii. 14 to 17, xv. 2, etc., xvii. 10, and the entire xxiii. chapter. Here you will see what laws—directions—Abraham obeyed. Abraham's righteousness consisted not in keeping the Sabbath, but in believing God—faith. Heb. xi. 8-12, and Rom. iv. 3-9, etc. Read these citations and let them settle it; perhaps they make known more about it than you do(?) You also say: "When God delivered the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, he commanded them to keep his Holy Sabbath." But why command them to do what they were already doing? Can't you see such blunders? Again you say, "because Israel broke their covenant which they made with God; that did not destroy his law; by no manner of means." Why not say laws, here, as well as when you tell what Abraham did? This is a miserable little hand-car switch. But suppose it as you say, viz., that by their breaking the covenant which they made with God it did not destroy the law "which they had agreed to obey;" does that prove that you, a Gentile, are under any obligation to keep a law that "Israel promised to obey?" "Not by any manner of means." Here you acknowledge that Israel, at least, had not previously, been keeping this law that they bore, for the first time in their history, "agreed to keep." But you continue. "But that (law) will condemn them in the day of judgment." Does that prove that the Sabbath is binding on you or me? Paul says, "by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified.....but now," since the law was nailed to the cross, "the righteousness of God without the law is manifested;" also "that the gospel—not law—is the power of God unto salvation." Do you believe it?
